

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

Chronology of Hansard's Debates.

The PARLIAMENTARY HISTORY contains all that can be collected of the Legislative History of this country from the Conquest to the close of the XVIIIth Century (1803), 36 vols. The chief sources whence these Debates are derived are the Constitutional History, 24 vols.; Sir Simonds D'Ewes' Journal: Debates of the Commons in 1620 and 1621; Chandler and Timberland's Debates, 22 vols.; Grey's Debates of the Commons, from 1667 to 1694, 10 vols.; Almon's Debates, 24 vols.; Debrett's Debates, 63 vols.; The Hardwicke Papers; Debates in Parliament by Dr. Johnson, &c., &c.

The PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES commence with the year 1803, and the contents are set forth in the following Chronological Table:—

DISCHARGED AND RESERVED SOLDIERS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will favourably consider an increase in the grant to the National Association for the Employment of Discharged and Reserved Soldiers, taking into consideration the fact that the Inspector General of Recruiting attributes the falling off in recruits to the want of employment for old soldiers, and that this is the only institution in the country which provides employment for Reserve and discharged men?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I am sorry to say that I must ask the hon. Gentleman to put the question at a somewhat later date. I am in communication with the Treasury on the subject, and if he will give me another fortnight I shall be able to give him an answer.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in order to enable County Councils to frame definite schemes of a permanent character for the provision of technical education in their respective counties, he will be good enough to state if County Councils are justified in acting on the assumption that they may reckon with certainty on receiving in future years the like sums, to be appropriated under the like conditions, as that set forth in Section 7 of "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1890," and Section 1 of "The Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act, 1890?"

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): My hon. Friend will perhaps allow me to refer him to the answer I gave in this connection to my noble Friend the Member for the Rosendale Division on the 4th of December last. I should not feel authorised to make any definite announcement till I make my Budget speech.

MR. HINCKES (Staffordshire, Leek): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Council whether a Local Authority may supply technical instruction to scholars still receiving instruction at an elementary school, but who have passed the standards fixed by the bye-laws in force in the district for total exemption from attendance at school?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Technical Instruction Act forbids the grant of aid by the Local Authority for the instruction of scholars in any of the obligatory or standard subjects prescribed by the Education Department, and not merely in the standards fixed by the bye-laws of the district for exemption from attendance at school.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if, and how, the sums paid into the various county funds under "The Local Taxation Act, 1890," and available for technical education, will be distinguished from the sums paid out of the Exchequer into the same funds under "The Local Government Act, 1888," and when the first-mentioned sums are likely to be paid?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board, in making payments to the Councils of counties and county boroughs, have distinguished the sums derived from Beer and Spirit Duties from those in respect of Probate and Licence Duties. The authorities have, therefore, the necessary information as to the amounts received by them, which are available for technical education. Up to the present time, the sums thus available, which have been paid to the authorities, is £242,761. As soon as the necessary adjustments have been made by the Local Government Act Commissioners in the case of counties which include county boroughs, further payments will be made.

GOLD AND SILVER MINES IN WALES.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what number of Crown leases and licences have been granted to persons to work for gold and silver in private lands and Crown lands in Wales since the year 1885; how many of the lessees or licencees have proceeded to develop their mines to such an extent as to produce gold and pay royalties, and how many have paid Crown royalties; what is the aggregate amount of Crown royalty paid on gold and silver obtained in Wales since 1885, and by whom was it paid; what is the value of the silver acknowledged to have been obtained from the mines of Great Britain since the year 1875, and what amount of royalty has been paid to the Crown upon such production; does the same prerogative apply to silver as to gold; is it a fact (as sworn to in the Court Chancery lately by the Receiver of Crown royalties) that the amount received by the State by way of royalty on gold, during a period of 22 years preceding the year 1886, was in the aggregate £17 2s. 2d., or an average of 11s. 9d. per annum; does the Crown claim not only to be entitled to the gold and silver in private land, but to grant licences to work the mines in such land, and to erect machinery on such lands, and to divert and utilise the water running through such lands for mining purposes, and if it claims the right to erect machinery, and utilise such water, by what right are such claims made; and will the Government consider the advisability of reducing the royalties as suggested by those interested in mining, for gold and silver in Wales, either to such a share of the profits as will not be prejudicial to them, and prohibitive of the industry, or, failing that, to 1 per cent. of the gross product of the gold obtained in private lands, and 2 per cent. of gross product on gold obtained from Crown lands, as also suggested by those interested in the industry, and thus allow the mines to be worked for the mutual advantage of the mine owners and the State?

MR. GOSCHEN: The number of Crown leases and licences granted to persons to work for gold and silver in private lands and Crown lands in Wales since 1885 is 447. Crown royalties have been paid in respect of five of these, and the aggregate amount of Crown royalty paid in these cases has been £1,578. The value of the silver obtained from the mines of Great Britain since 1875 amounts to £1,155,000 in round figures.

But it is impossible to state the exact amount of the royalty received, as the Crown has not found it expedient to insist on pre-emption of the lead ore containing silver obtained from lead mines belonging to the subject. The same prerogative applies to silver as to gold. The hon. Member is in error in supposing either that it was a fact or that it was sworn to by the Receiver of Crown royalties that the amount received by the State as royalty on gold between 1864 and 1886 was only £18. The Receiver's statement had reference to one mine only, and the total amount received in the period has been £2,150. As regards the seventh question, the Crown not only claims mines Royal of gold and silver, but also the necessary easements for working them. Certain proposals have been made for reducing the royalties in the Morgan mine, but these proposals will be best understood from the correspondence between the hon. Member and the Woods and Forests, which I am prepared to lay on the Table if the hon. Member will move for it; but I may say generally that the Government are not prepared to reduce the royalties, the proceeds of which go into the pockets of the taxpayer, if the reduction of the licence should simply enable its holder to sell his rights at a higher price to a mining company.

ALLEGED PERJURY.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to an alleged case of perjury said to have been committed on the 6th June, 1890, before George Gordon, land surveyor, Elgin, when acting as referee under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, under a minute of reference between Robert Mackessack of Ardgry and Roseisle, and John Knight, sometime farmer at Bruntland; whether he has seen a Memorandum, lodged by John Knight, in the hands of the Procurator Fiscal of Elginshire, in which he charges two tenants of Mr. Mackessack with having given false evidence against him, and in which he gave the names of four witnesses besides himself who could disprove the said evidence; was John Knight allowed any opportunity to produce these witnesses; and has the Procurator Fiscal refused to take proceedings; and, if so, upon what grounds?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The case referred to in the question was reported in the usual way to Crown Counsel, who decided that there was no cause to justify a charge of wilful perjury being brought against the two tenants of Mr. Mackessack. I have also seen the Memorandum referred to, along with the statements of the four witnesses named in it, and entirely concur in the decision arrived at.

PLYMOUTH AND DEVONPORT DOCKYARDS.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I had intended to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the wages of the carpenters employed in Her Majesty's Dockyards at Plymouth and Devonport, in the Department of the Director of Works, have been reduced; if so, to what extent; and whether he can state what are the wages paid to carpenters in the Chief Constructor's Department, and the hours of labour as compared with the wages and hours of those employed in the Department of the Director of Works? At the request of the noble Lord, I beg to postpone the question until to-morrow.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER AND THE REV. H. MARRIOTT.

MR. FURNESS (Hartlepool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the correspondence in the Western Morning News, of 24th January, and other publications, between the Bishop of Exeter and the Rev. Herbert Marriott, from which correspondence it appears that, in consequence of the Rev. Herbert Marriott having attended a Baptist chapel, the Bishop of Exeter has peremptorily withdrawn from the reverend gentleman his licence; whether he is aware that the action of the Bishop in thus suspending a clergyman for attending a Nonconformist chapel has given rise to grave dissatisfaction in the country; and whether the Government intend to do anything in the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have been supplied with a copy of the newspaper containing the correspondence, from which it appears that the Bishop of Exeter requested Mr. Marriott to resign his licence as public preacher in the diocese on the ground that he was in the constant habit of attending a Baptist chapel and taking part in the services. I have no means of knowing whether dissatisfaction has arisen in consequence of the course which the Bishop, in the exercise of his discretion, has thought it right to pursue. The matter is quite outside the jurisdiction of the Home Office, and I have no authority to interfere.

ARDCHATTAN AND MUCKAIRN SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is the case, as stated by the School Board of Ardchattan and Muckairn, that they were compelled by the Scotch Education Department to erect the present Board school on a site between Kennacraig and Bonawe Quarries instead of at Kennacraig, which the School Board considered the more suitable site for the wants of the district generally; whether the Board school was built to accommodate, and is sufficient to accommodate, all children of school age in the district; whether the fact that the Department had informed those who had urged a site nearer the quarries that the Department would be prepared to take into consideration any claim for recognition which might be made on behalf of a voluntary school in such a position had been communicated to the School Board before the Board school was erected; and whether he is aware that the Episcopal school is only 600 yards distant from the Board school?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: When the proposal to erect a new public school was before the Department, strong representations were made against the proposed site at Kennacraig, as being distant from the centre of population at the Bonawe Quarries. The views of both sides were carefully considered by the Education Department as constituted in 1883, and finally with some hesitation the Department sanctioned, as a compromise, a site between the other two. The Ardchattan Public School contains accommodation for 50, and this would not, if the representations made to the Department as to the number on the registers of both schools are correct, be sufficient to accommodate all the children in the district. It was intimated to the objectors in 1883 that, although my Lords were unable to refuse sanction to the compromise, a proposal for a voluntary school would receive consideration. This intimation was conveyed, not to the School Board, but to those who were then urging the necessity of further accommodation at the quarries, namely, the lessees of Bonawe Quarries on behalf of their employés. I have no reason to doubt that the facts as to the distance between the two schools are as stated by the hon. Member.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOP ACT.

MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will consider the advisability of issuing an abridged version of the present lengthy and complicated Abstract of "The Factory and Workshop Act, 1878;" and of furnishing to occupiers of factories and workshops in the Principality a Welsh translation of the same?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am disposed to concur with the suggestion of the hon. Member that a shorter abstract of the Acts, and possibly a Welsh translation, may be advisable. The present moment would not, however, be opportune, as a Bill for amending the existing Acts will shortly be presented to the House. I will not lose sight of the matter.

BORSTAL PRISON, KENT.

MR. EDWARD KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that a Petition was addressed to the Prison Commissioners by the Prison Warders of Borstal, Kent, having regard to pay, pensions, and hours of duty; and, if so, why no notice was taken of their Petition?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; such a Petition has been received. I have recently appointed a Departmental Committee to inquire into this and other similar representations that have reached me from subordinate officers of the Prison Service, and I shall be assisted in the reply, which in due course will be made to them, by the conclusions at which the Committee may arrive.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

MR. TUIITE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, with reference to his observations on the 12th of last August on the discussion of the Civil Service Estimates, it was contemplated to request the heads of Departments to recommend for promotion writers of long service, engaged upon superior work to copying, to the new established class which was being created in a few offices under the name of statistical abstractors?

MR. JACKSON: It is clearly not the office of the Treasury to request heads of Departments to recommend copyists for appointment to an intermediate class below the Second Division. Clause 29 of the Treasury Minute of the 10th of August, 1889, should, it appears to me, be a sufficient guide to any head of a Department wishing to make such a recommendation. I may, perhaps, add that it is obvious that statistical abstractors can only be employed in offices where there is work corresponding to the title.

SECOND DIVISION CLERKS.

MR. TUIITE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, having regard to the fact that the Order in Council of 21st March, 1890, was devised to secure uniform conditions of service for all Second Division Clerks, the head of a Department has power to issue regulations setting aside any of the provisions of that Order?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; the head of a Department has no power, as far as I am aware, to vary any of the provisions of the Order in Council of the 21st March, 1890, relating to the Second Division.

MR. TUIITE: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is intended that all those Civil Service writers now in the Service, who were recommended by the heads of their Departments for promotion to the Second Division, and not promoted, will form the nucleus of the new class of clerks for which an open competitive examination is to be held on the 17th March?

MR. JACKSON: The question of the hon. Member appears to have been suggested by a notice for a competitive examination for the situation of abstractor, which was given in the London Gazette of the 30th January. As the hon. Member will have seen, that notice was withdrawn by an advertisement in the Gazette of the 3rd instant.

POSTAL DELIVERY NEAR SHEFFIELD.

SIR FREDERICK MAPPIN (York, W.R., Hallamshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can furnish to the House any instance (other than that of Bradfield, near Sheffield) where a district situated six or seven miles from a town with more than 300,000 inhabitants is restricted to a postal delivery only on three days per week; whether it is laid down as a principle in the Post Office that a daily delivery is never extended to any district where the revenue does not exceed the cost of distribution; whether any district in which there is an excess of expenditure over receipts enjoys a more frequent delivery than three days a week; and whether he will consider if the small cost involved may be incurred, in order to give better postal facilities to Bradfield?

*MR. RAIKES: I am unable to say whether there exists a precisely similar case to that mentioned by the hon. Member. It is laid down as a principle that the cost of a delivery must be covered by the revenue from the letters delivered, but no doubt there are deliveries in existence which have ceased to be remunerative. I can scarcely regard as relatively small the expense involved in improving the delivery in question, the cost of which is already 87 per cent. in excess of the revenue, and that cost would be doubled if the delivery were increased in frequency from three to six days a week.

INSPECTOR OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is lawful for an Inspector of Weights and Measures to stamp the beam only without the scales being attached or adjusted to the beam; is it necessary for a merchant before selling a beam to have it stamped and adjusted by a Public Inspector; and is it probable that the use of swan-necked beams will be continued in the future, say next year?

Mr. Jackson

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am informed that in cases where the model regulations of the Board of Trade under the provisions of the Weights and Measures Act have been adopted by the Local Authority it is not allowable for an Inspector of Weights and Measures to stamp the beam only, without the scales being attached or adjusted to the beam. It is unnecessary for a merchant before selling a beam to have it stamped and adjusted by a Public Inspector; and in regard to the last part of the question the Board of Trade, as at present advised, do not propose to make any additional regulations dealing with the use of swan-necked beams.

CUSTOMS OUT-DOOR DEPARTMENT.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the inquiry by him into the Customs Out-Door Department is concluded; and, if so, whether he can state how soon the decisions arrived at are likely to be made known?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, Sir. I have practically concluded the inquiry, and I am now engaged upon a Minute dealing with its results, which I hope to issue before long. I may say that the inquiry has been very protracted, owing to my desire to examine thoroughly the very numerous and difficult questions connected with the complicated organisation of a large service dispersed throughout the United Kingdom, and presenting many local differences of remuneration and conditions of work.

SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT CLERKS.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Postmaster General to what extent he has availed himself of the assurances of the recently suspended clerks of the Savings Bank Department with regard to voluntary extra duty in excess of the nine hours' compulsory duty; whether such assurances have enabled him to withdraw the Order compelling the staff to do two compulsory hours' overtime daily beyond the hours laid down by the Order in Council of 21st March, 1891; if not, how long will it be necessary to continue that Order; and whether there is any limit to the number of hours' overtime which the male staff of the Savings Bank Department can be ordered to perform?

*MR. RAIKES: I have limited the total amount of extra duty for clerks of the male staff in the Savings Bank, including those who were recently suspended, to three hours a day. I am unable at present to say how long the arrears caused by the insubordinate action of the clerks, referred to by the noble Earl, will render it necessary to maintain the Order for two hours daily extra duty; but I shall be glad to rescind it as soon as I am in a position to do so. Overtime is not limited by any regulation of the Department. The requirements of the Public Service must be provided for, subject, of course, to a reasonable consideration of the capabilities of those engaged in its performance.

*EARL COMPTON: Do the three hours of work they do extra include the two compulsory hours laid down by the Order which the Savings Bank clerks objected to?

*MR. RAIKES: Certainly, Sir.

FOREIGN OFFICE AND DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, [S.]): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take steps to carry out the recommendations contained in the recent Report of the Royal Commission of Civil Establishments, by which various changes in the organisation of the Foreign Office and Diplomatic Service have been suggested; and, if so, when a statement as to the changes intended to be made will be given to Parliament?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Portions of the recommendations of the Commission have already been carried out. Others are under consideration. Full information will be given to Parliament whenever required.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he is aware that many County Councils and Municipal Corporations and other Local Bodies, coming under the definition of "governing bodies" in Section 1 of "The Municipal Corporations (Borough Funds) Act, 1872," are desirous of exercising the powers conferred on them by "The Municipal Corporations (Borough Funds) Act, 1872," and by "The Local Government Act, 1888," by appearing as petitioners, or contributing to the cost of an appearance, to oppose "as in the case of a Private Bill," the Bill to confirm the Provisional Order about to be made by the Board of Trade under Section 24, Sub-section 8, of "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," when referred to a Select Committee or Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament; whether he is aware that it is considered a matter of great importance by large bodies of traders and others that such bodies should be enabled to appear, or join in the costs of an appearance, before such Committee; whether it has come to his knowledge that doubts have been entertained as to whether, in consequence of the fact that the Act confirming such Provisional Order is by Sub-section 10 of Section 25 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act defined to be a Public Act, such Governing Bodies and other Local Authorities are entitled to expend any money in or about such appearance; whether he would recommend that such doubts should be cleared up by passing a declaratory Bill; and whether he will be prepared, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, to introduce and press forward a Bill for the purpose of remedying the defect, if any, in the wording of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): As far as I can understand, there is no doubt as to the right. If any persons think there is a doubt, those persons should bring in a Bill on the subject. It is scarcely a matter for the Government.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can now make any statement with regard to the numerous Memorials received from, and resolutions passed, at public meetings in the North East of Ireland, and lately presented to the Treasury, in favour of the establishment of an accelerated Mail Service between England, Scotland, and the North of Ireland vid Larne and Stranraer?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am afraid that the Treasury cannot make any statement with regard to the numerous Memorials and resolutions forwarded by my hon. Friend in favour of the Larne and Stranraer Mail Service until we have received, and have had time to consider, the full Report on the subject which my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General has in preparation.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As this question has been pending since June last, may I ask whether the Postmaster General has yet fulfilled his promise to make a proposal to Derry?

*Mr. RAIKES: I hope to be able to make a proposal next week.

TENANTS' HOLDINGS IN IRELAND.

*Mr. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he would state how many holdings were, during the financial year ended 31st March, 1890, sold by the Irish Land Commission, subject to charges made for advances, for the sum of £306 Os. 4d., entered in the accounts of the Commission as received from that source; and what was the total purchase-money paid to the landlords for the holdings so sold?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Land Commissioners report that the number of the holdings referred to in the question is four—one being the case of an advance under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, and three under the Purchase of Land Act, 1885. The original advances to the tenants in these four cases amounted to £5,365. The re-sales were subject to the annuities charged in repayment of these advances. No loss whatever has accrued to the State in respect to these cases, nor in respect of any other under the Purchase of Land Act, 1885.

FAIR RENT APPEALS.

Mr. KNOX: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that the number of appeals lodged re fair rent to the Chief Land Commission during the year ending August, 1890, exceeded the appeals disposed of by 400; whether he is aware that the total number decided during November last was 106, and that at this rate it would take rather more than six years to dispose of the appeals now pending, without taking into account appeals which may hereafter be lodged; and whether he will consider the expediency of inserting provisions in the Land Department Bill to prevent any further business being assigned to the Land Commissioners under the Act of 1881 until they have disposed of the arrears of the work they are now engaged upon?

Captain M'Calmont

*Mr. MADDEN: During the year ending August 21, 1890, 4,289 appeals were disposed of by the Chief Land Commission, as against 2,781 appeals lodged. The total number of appeals disposed of in November last was 283, and, as the total number of appeals lodged during the month in question was but 20, it is not anticipated that it would take anything like six years to dispose of the number of cases unheard, which on the 21st of August amounted to 6,412. At the same time, the Government will carefully consider any reasonable suggestion which may be offered for more rapidly disposing of appeals in respect of judicial rents.

GLENGELVIN AND DOWRA POST OFFICES.

Mr. KNOX: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will connect the post offices of Glengelvin and Dowra, in the County Cavan, with the post office at Blacklion, in order to save the time and money now lost by sending the letters by a circuitous and inconvenient route?

*Mr. RAIKES: I have instituted an inquiry into the subject to which the hon. Member refers, and I will acquaint him with the result as soon as possible. But, from the nature of the arrangement suggested, some little time must elapse before the inquiry can be completed.

DESTITUTION IN THE KANTURK UNION.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, having regard to the destitution prevailing over a great portion of the Kanturk Union (County Cork), and the scarcity of employment in the district, the Irish Government will take steps to suspend temporarily the Gregory or Quarter-Acre Clause, which prevents the Board of Guardians from giving outdoor relief to destitute persons, whether labourers or small occupiers, who hold more than a quarter-acre of land?

*MR. MADDEN: The condition of Kanturk Union has been the subject of recent inquiries. As the result of these inquiries, the Government have no reason to suppose that there is any exceptional distress which cannot be dealt with under the existing Poor Law, and they do not propose to introduce legislation in the direction suggested in the question.

IMPRISONMENT OF MR. LONG.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what (if any) are the circumstances calculated to interfere with the prison discipline at Clonmel Gaol in the case of John Long, editor of the Nationalist newspaper; and is Mr. Long, as a bail prisoner, afforded any facilities in Kilkenny Gaol for receiving visits from relatives or friends?

*MR. MADDEN: The transfer was made in pursuance of the general practice explained in my answer to the previous question on this subject put by the hon. Member on the 2nd instant, and to which I have nothing to add. The General Prisons Board report that bail prisoners in Kilkenny Prison are afforded like facilities as in any other prison in Ireland to receive visits from their friends in accordance with Prison Rules.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether he is aware that Mr. Long is confined to his cell for 22 hours each day; and, if so, under what regulation this is done; and that he is also prevented from writing or receiving any communication referring to his journalistic business, although at his trial the prosecuting solicitor called upon the Magistrates to take a note of his admission of responsibility for the management of his newspaper, the Nationalist; and whether he can see his way to recommend any modification of this treatment?

*MR. MADDEN: The General Prisons Board report that this prisoner gets the usual two hours' exercise per day allowed to prisoners of his class under 7 George IV., Cap. 74, Section 109, Sub-section 9, further relaxation not being considered necessary on medical grounds. The prisoner is imprisoned in respect of intimidation contained in publications in his newspaper. When at Clonmel Prison the Governor appears to have informed him that no communications of an improper character would be permitted to go in or out of the prison. Since then the Board have not had any application from the prisoner for permission to edit his newspaper.

MR. CHANCE: Am I to understand that Mr. Long is prevented from receiving and replying to communications in reference to his journalistic work?

*MR. MADDEN: No, Sir; certainly not.

MR. CHANCE: Has not the Chief Secretary the power of modifying the treatment to which Mr. Long has been subjected?

*MR. MADDEN: No, Sir.

FAILURE OF THE POTATO CROP.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen the resolution passed by the Bawnboy, County Cavan, Board of Guardians, in which they urge the Government, in consequence of the almost total failure of the potato crop in this union, to start public works in this union, and point out to the Government the necessity of extending the Cavan and Leitrim and Roscommon Light Railway from Dromod to Stokestown and Roscommon; and whether he will say is he prepared to carry out the terms of the above resolution?

*MR. MADDEN: The condition of Bawnboy Union is being carefully watched, and also the Poor Law Relief Returns for the Union relief works will, of course, be started should necessity for them arise. The Government have no means at their disposal to enable them to make the railway extension suggested.

MR. O'HANLON: May I ask whether any official Report has been received?

*MR. MADDEN: Yes; and my answer is founded upon it.

THE LAND PURCHASE BILL.

MR. O'HANLON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen the resolution, passed unanimously at a meeting of the glebe purchasers held at Cormeen, County Cavan, on the 14th January last, requesting the Government to grant glebe purchasers the right of appeal to the Land Commission for the re-valuation of their lands under the new Land Bill, and the revision of their future instalments according to such valuation; to give glebe purchasers the power of obtaining an advance from the Government of one-fourth of the purchase-money of their holdings at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; to pay off the money originally paid down in cash; and to extend the benefit of the 25th section of the Act of 1887 to all glebe purchasers; and whether he will take into account the justice of the above resolution, and provide for the glebe purchasers in the new Land Bill?

*MR. MADDEN: I have seen the resolution referred to in the question. The question of purchasers of glebe lands was dealt with in 1887, and certain relief given, and I am not in a position to hold out any expectation of further legislation on the subject.

IRISH SPECIAL JURORS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is true that an Order has recently been issued by the Irish Judges, directing in future, whether there be business for special jurors at Assizes or not, that the attendance of 48 special jurors be required?

*MR. MADDEN: I cannot find that any Order has been made by the Irish Judges in reference to summoning of special jurors; but I am informed that the attention of the Sheriffs in one or two counties, where an illegal custom had grown up of not summoning special jurors, has been directed to the requirements of the law, with a view that they should take the necessary steps to have special jurors in attendance at Assizes.

THE WATERFORD MAIL.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that late delivery of the English mail in the City of Waterford is now a matter of constant occurrence; and how soon it may be expected that the advantage is likely to be realised of the Dublin Loop Line Railway in securing the earlier and more punctual delivery of said mail in Waterford?

*MR. RAIKES: I am aware that there has been irregularity in the delivery to which the hon. Member refers, but this has arisen from causes beyond control, and I am informed that it is too much to say that the late delivery is a matter of constant occurrence. Every effort is being made to secure punctuality as far as possible. As regards the Loop Line in Dublin, I understand that no working arrangement has yet been come to by the Railway Companies interested, and I am not, therefore, in a position to say what advantage is likely to be realised if it should be decided to make use of the line for the conveyance of mails. I shall continue to give my careful attention to this matter.

DISTRESS IN DUNMORE.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if his attention has been directed to the distress in Dunmore, County Galway, and to the advisability of employing labour on drainage works in that locality; and what action the Government propose to take in the matter?

*MR. MADDEN: The condition of the people in Dunmore Electoral Division has been receiving attention. The question of opening relief works there is at the present time under consideration.

SOLDIERS' CHILDREN IN KILKENNY.

MR. CHANCE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Military Authorities require the children of soldiers stationed in Kilkenny to attend the military school, and refuse to permit such of them as are Roman Catholics to attend the local schools under Roman Catholic management; and, if so, under what Rule or Statute do the authorities act in the matter?

*MR. F. STANHOPE: By the Regulations the children of soldiers must attend the garrison school, unless specially permitted to attend an efficient civil school for the purpose of obtaining a higher class of education. But on the representation of the parish priest the Rule has been specially relaxed, so as to allow Roman Catholic soldiers at Kilkenny to decide for themselves whether their children shall attend the garrison or the civil school, on condition that their attendance at the latter is regular, and the education given is satisfactory.

MR. CHANCE: Is it since last month that the Order was made?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir. I think it was made two or three months ago.

THE LITTLE BROSNA RIVER.

DR. FOX (King's Co., Tullamore): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, with respect to the scheme of drainage by lowering the bed of the Little Brosna River, adopted by the Board of Works, Ireland, whether the Board subsequently agreed to give power to a Railway Company to alter the course of the river, and to build a bridge across it, with the result that the bed of the river was raised two and a half feet, and the lands above the bridge were flooded; and whether the Board are now pressing the occupiers of the flooded lands for payment of charges for the drainage which was thus neutralised with the consent of the Board?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the Little Brosna River was deepened under the Drainage Act in 1852-3. In 1856 the Board of Works furnished to the Great Southern and Western Railway Company the dimensions as to breadth, depth, and height of all bridges on their Ballytrophy and Parsonstown branch, which was planned to cross the Brosna. In this schedule the depth for the bridge at Bunowan was fixed at the full depth of $8\frac{1}{2}$ feet below the level of the land. No complaint was made either as to the depth at the bridge or in the river diversion made by the company near it for 28 years, and no evidence has been produced to the Board of Works that the company did not carry out its obligations. The Board of Works are not pressing the occupiers for any payment, no payment being due to the Board.

THE CRIMES ACT—ARRESTS AT CASTLEREA.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can explain upon what charge, and upon whose authority, 11 women have been arrested in connection with an inquiry held at Castlereas under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act?

MR. MADDEN: An inquiry being proceeding at Castlereas under Section 1 of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887, the Resident Magistrate holding that inquiry issued, pursuant to the powers given by that Act, and by Section 13 of the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, warrants to compel the attendance of a number of witnesses, including those referred to in the question. These warrants were issued, as there was reason to believe that the attendance of the witnesses could not otherwise be obtained.

MR. SEXTON: What was the sequel of the case?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to put the question tomorrow.

MR. SEXTON: I will do so, but I think it is strange that the right hon. Gentleman is not able to answer it now.

DESTITUTION AT CLIFDEN.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has received a letter from the Very Rev. P. Lynskey, of Clifden, Galway, complaining of the destitute condition of the poor people; and whether he will take immediate steps, by providing relief works or otherwise, to prevent these people being compelled to leave their homes and enter the workhouse?

MR. MADDEN: A letter has been received complaining of the insufficiency of the labour given on the Clifden line, and drawing attention to the distressed condition of Sillerna and other districts. Relief works are in progress at several points in the localities mentioned. But, with regard to Sillerna, the works which were started there had to be suspended in consequence of opposition shown by the people.

DISTRESS IN GWEEDORE.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that of the 1,000 families in the district of Gweedore 800 are necessarily dependent for food for four months in the year, from May to August, upon meal supplied on credit by merchants and shopkeepers; that, owing to the failure of last year's potato crop, this meal supply on credit commenced in October last, and has now exhausted the resources of the shopkeepers, who are being compelled to refuse further credit; and that some 5,000 persons are in absolute destitution; whether the Government intend to start any railway works in the neighbourhood; and, if so, when; whether any employment of any kind has yet been started on relief works, such as roadmaking or otherwise; and what steps have been taken to avert starvation within the present month?

MR. MADDEN: I have called for a Report upon the subject, but have not yet received it.

PURCHASE OF LAND BILL.

MR. KEAY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, under the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, the "additional advances" provided for by Clause 6 (3) may continue to be made to the full extent of the capital value of the Sinking Fund after default has been committed by the tenant purchasers, and when the Sinking Fund is consequently being kept up and further increased by payments out of the Consolidated Fund, as provided in Clause 1 (3)?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member is putting question after question across the floor of the House, raising issues of policy as well as of fact and of explanation. I have endeavoured to answer them fully and courteously; but I must now suggest to him that a question as to when additional advances should cease to be sanctioned is essentially one for Committee. I may simply remind the hon. Member that it would always be optional, and not compulsory, to the Treasury to sanction additional advances, and I must further point out that the last two lines of his question do not correctly represent the case, in that they suggest that the Sinking Fund is kept up by payments out of the Consolidated Fund, suppressing the fact that the Consolidated Fund is at once recouped by the Guarantee Fund.

*MR. KEAY: With reference to the right hon. Gentleman's remarks on my questions, does the right hon. Gentleman recollect that I raised these same points on the Amendment to the Second Reading, and got no reply, and that I again attempted to raise them on the main question of the Second Reading, but was closed by the First Lord of the Treasury?

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE RIVER BARROW.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has received the copy of a resolution passed by the Mountmellick Board of Guardians, praying the Government to undertake the drainage of the River Barrow, and basing their request on the unhealthy condition of the towns through which the river flows, and the general want of employment among the people; whether he is aware that great poverty exists in Mountmellick and the neighbouring district among persons who are in want of work and cannot obtain it; and whether, in view of the forward state of Government business, he will re-introduce his Bill for the drainage of the Barrow?

MR. MADDEN: I have not received a copy of the resolution, but will make inquiry.

MOTION.

CASE OF WALTER HARGAN.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

(4.15.) MR. JAMES LOWTHER, Member for the Isle of Thanet, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, "the sentence and reduced sentence upon Walter Hargan;" but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. Speaker called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen:—

*MR. J. LOWTHER: It is unnecessary for me to detain the House at any length in referring to the circumstances under which this case comes to be brought forward. Perhaps it will be in the recollection of hon. Members that before the adjournment for the Christmas holidays a Motion stood on the Paper in my name, to the effect that a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying her to grant a free pardon to Walter Hargan, but I postponed that Motion in consequence of an appeal from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. I deferred to the wishes of my right hon. Friend, but not until it had been pointed out to me that I could obtain the object I desired in another way, namely, by moving the Adjournment of the House. On that understanding I postponed the Motion. The case is fortunately a very simple one. There is, practically, no dispute as to the facts or any controverted question of law. The prisoner Hargan was a soldier who had served with distinction in the Army, and having got his discharge had gone to America for the purpose of pushing his fortune. Hargan had returned to this country only five days before this unfortunate occurrence took place. In a public house in the Kingsland district he found himself called upon to intervene on behalf of the landlady of the public house, who was being threatened with personal violence by a gang of bad characters who were drinking in the house. Hargan, who had taken no part in the dispute, gallantly came to the rescue of the landlady, and thereby incurred the hostility of the ruffians congregated in the house. During the altercation a revolver which Hargan had in his possession was shown to those present, and it had the momentary effect of quelling the disturbance. The landlord came downstairs and intervened, and the leaders of the disturbance were ejected, and order to a great extent restored. Wishing to avoid being the occasion of any further disturbance, Hargan very properly made his escape by a back window, and made a circuit round the back of the house, but, in order to get to his lodgings, he was obliged to pass the front door of the public house, which he did on the other side of the road. As he passed, attention was called to him, and he was followed by three of the men who had been ejected, who signified their hostility by imprecations and otherwise. Hargan had already shown these men that he was armed, and it was only likely that he should imagine that they would provide themselves with some weapon of offence. Consequently, when they came within a very few yards of him he produced his revolver, and, failing to deter them, he fired with fatal effect as regarded two of the men. The taking of human life by means of weapons of this description is, I own, a matter upon which I myself have a very strong feeling. When first my attention was called to this case, I did not see my way to taking any action upon it, but in cases of this kind some regard must be had to the character of the persons concerned. Upwards of 20 years ago I urged upon Mr. Ward Hunt, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, the propriety of imposing a heavy duty upon the carrying of revolvers, and I recently made a similar suggestion to my right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. What are the facts of the present case? I should like the House to hear what is the relative record of the prisoner and his assailants. Hargan was a soldier of good character, educated at the Hibernian School in Ireland, from the commandant of which institution a character was produced giving the highest possible testimony to his reputation. He was for some years in the 1st Battalion Queen's Royal West Surrey Regiment, in which regiment his father and four brothers had likewise served; he was rapidly promoted to the positions of lance-corporal, corporal, colour-sergeant, and finally acting sergeant-major. His officers give him the highest character. He served in the Burmese campaign, obtaining the medal and clasp. Unfortunately, no witnesses were called to speak to the character of the prisoner, but I think the testimony of the officers has been before the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. [Mr. MATTHEWS was understood to dissent.] The dissent of my right hon. Friend encourages me to hope that I am placing new matter before him which will lead him to review the case. I will, however, only read the character given to Hargan by his Colonel, Colonel Holt. That gentleman writes—

"I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the excellent character of Walter Hargan. He served under my command in India, and as commanding officer I have the highest opinion of him as a most trustworthy, good, and brave soldier, and I cannot imagine him capable of injuring any man except in his own defence."

That opinion of the Colonel's was fully endorsed by the Major, the Adjutant, and other officers under whom Hargan served. It was also endorsed by an authority to whom I think my right hon. Friend will be prepared to listen, namely,

Mr. Justice Charles. That learned Judge, in summing up, said—

“The prisoner bore an excellent character hitherto as a steady and well-conducted man, as well as a good soldier.”

At the same time, I ought to point out what was the character of the persons by whom Hargan was assailed. I will not weary the House by going through the long category of offences recorded against them. I will again confine myself to the authority of Mr. Justice Charles, who said—

“Although he did not care to apply hard language to persons who were no more, it would not be going too far to say that the character of the deceased men was about as bad as it could be.”

One of these men appears to have gone by the name of “Half-pint Jack.” He was in the habit of going to public houses, calling for drinks, refusing to pay for them, and assaulting the persons defrauded. I am perfectly well aware that the good character of the man assailed, and the bad character of his assailants, are no excuse for having recourse to a greater amount of violence than was necessary; but did Hargan use a greater amount of violence than was necessary? He did no more than he was bound to do, unless he was prepared to hand his life over to those who attacked him. I know that those who took the armchair view of the subject say that Hargan ought to have given notice that he was going to shoot, somewhat in the same way that a four weeks’ Notice of Motion is given in this House; but I have already stated that he had shown these men that he was armed, and he was justified in thinking that men who knew they were pursuing an armed man had provided themselves with some effective means of dealing with him. Thus, he must have known that if he allowed his assailants to grapple with him at close quarters he would not have much chance. Indeed, they would have found ready at their hands Hargan’s own means of defence—the revolver. Who in this House would have acted differently in such circumstances? I, at all events, would have acted in an exactly similar manner, with this unfortunate difference, that I should very probably have missed the men. I undertake to say that if the Secretary of State for War, under these circumstances, should have been walking, with one of his magazine rifles in his hand, he would have availed himself of the opportunity of testing the accuracy of the weapon. It is notorious that this unfortunate man was obeying a law far older than any Statute Law—he was obeying the instinct of self-preservation, which I have always understood to be a law which would override any Statute Law of any civilised nation. But, for a moment, I would ask the attention of the House to the character of the district where this took place. Many people would say, and, in fact, friends of mine have said outside the House, “Why did not this man call for the police, or ask bystanders to assist him?” Well, the Secretary of State will be in a position to confirm what I am now going to say, namely, that the inadequacy of police protection in this district had long been a matter of notoriety. Amongst the documents that my right hon. Friend had recently before him I have no doubt he had his attention drawn to a communication addressed to the Commissioner of Police by a Special Committee, appointed by the Parish and Vestry of St. John’s, Hackney, complaining of the inadequate arrangements made for the preservation of order in that neighbourhood. It is notorious in that district, and I defy any one in any part of the House, or out of it, to deny that this is a neighbourhood where a respectable person who had incurred, by any means, the hostility of the roughs, who apparently hold supreme power in that neighbourhood, would have a very poor chance unless he took adequate means for his own protection. Now, this Committee, composed of the Vestry of the parish to which I have referred, drew the attention of the Chief Commissioner of Police to the following state of affairs:—They say, “The numerous cases of highway robbery, burglary, and other crimes that have appeared in the public papers, together with the difficulties in obtaining ready assistance from the police in cases of immediate need, is conclusive proof that, certainly in this parish, we are undermanned.” They go on to place before the Chief Commissioner of Police the fact that, whereas, taking the whole of the Metropolis together, the proportion of the police to the population is as 1 to 646; in that particular district it is only 1 to 1,185—that is to say, that the police force is about in proportion, roughly speaking, one-half of what it stands in the Metropolitan area at large. I will not detain the House by referring to other documents, which I might do, in a similar sense. The Debenvoir Park Ratepayers' Association, a body which represents a portion of the same neighbourhood, has also addressed a very strong representation to the Home Office, or rather to the Chief Commissioner of Police, upon this subject. The disturbances which have continually occurred in that neighbourhood, leading to scenes of violence, the right hon. Gentleman will be able to confirm from the official evidence he has at his disposal. He will know that within 24 hours of the melancholy occurrence when these men were killed the landlady of the same public house in which Hargan originally intervened was very seriously wounded by an instrument called a "muller," which I understand is a kettle, and a very formidable, heavy engine. This was thrown at her head by a dastardly person, who was believed to have been a member of the gang with which the deceased men associated. I could mention innumerable cases of assaults which have occurred in this district, but it is enough for me to say this: that the neighbourhood was an extremely disorderly one, and that life and property were in an extremely insecure condition there. There is another essential difference between that and other portions of the Metropolitan with which hon. Members in this House are more familiarly acquainted, in so far as the public opinion of the district and of ordinary passers-by is by no means disposed to aid in protecting the life and limbs of attacked persons; but is rather, for the most part, in favour of the organisers of disorder. That is a most important element of consideration in regard to this case. You have here a disorderly district; you have a man who finds himself surrounded by hostile elements; you have an attack made upon him, he is known to be armed, he avails himself of the only means he has for his defence, with the unfortunate result that human life is lost. I can only ask the House, in conclusion, to believe that I am taking up this matter with no desire to obstruct the administration of justice. Throughout the time that I have been in this House I cannot recall to mind having taken up more than two other cases in which remission of sentence was asked for. In one of these cases a free pardon followed the discussion, as I hope it will to-night after my right hon. Friend has had further opportunity, which he has intimated he shall be glad to have, of considering the case I now put before the House. Nor shall I be accused of in any way under-rating the enormous responsibility, and the very trying character of the duties which are cast upon the Home Secretary in connection with this matter. I have had myself to share responsibilities of that kind, and I am fully aware that they are perhaps the most trying duties that any Minister has to discharge. My right hon. Friend, I need hardly say, has my entire sympathy in the great difficulties with which cases of this kind inevitably are surrounded. I trust, however, my right hon. Friend will look once more into this matter, and will consider points which probably have not hitherto been brought before him, and I trust that the result will be that a grievous miscarriage of justice will be redressed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Mr. James Lowther.)

*(4.39.) COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N.R., Thirsk): I rise to second the Motion. I am one of those who concur with my right hon. Friend that Hargan no more deserves 12 months' imprisonment with hard labour than 20 years' penal servitude, and that the sentence ought to be remitted altogether. In the first place, it must be remembered that Hargan did not voluntarily enter into this fray. He was not in the bar when the attack on the landlady commenced, but gallantly came from a back room to defend her; but it is clear that he had no desire to provoke the roughs, for, finding that his interference was making matters worse, he allowed himself to be smuggled out of the house by the kitchen window. This, on the part of an ex-colour-sergeant of the Royal West Surrey Regiment, is a convincing proof that he did all in his power not to provoke a breach of the peace. It is said that the men were too drunk to be dangerous; but the fact that they pursued Hargan and caught him up in spite of his efforts to get away shows that they were quite sober enough to commit a murderous outrage. And it must be remembered that most of the evidence given against Hargan was most unreliable, being mainly that of witnesses who were friends of the men who were shot, while the landlady, who was the principal witness for Hargan, was so broken in body and mind by the brutal assaults upon her, and so terror-stricken that her evidence was almost worthless. Grave injustice has been done to Hargan by a letter of Lord Bramwell's which appeared in the Times of December 26, in which he said that "Hargan, without any warning and when the men were almost touching him, fired in their faces." But against this one of the hostile witnesses swore that Hargan did give warning before he fired, and Hargan's own account was that he only fired after seeing the glitter of what he thought was a knife. However, the fact remains that it was only when the men were close to him, and he was in fear of his life, that he fired. Lord Bramwell appears to think that it is a point against Hargan that he did not fire till the men were close on him, but that rather shows that he waited as long as he could before defending himself. These men were not ordinary ruffians, but ruffians of a most desperate description. They had previously threatened the life of the landlady of the public house where the disturbance commenced; they were described by Mr. Justice Charles himself as men of the worst possible character; and the fact of their waiting for and following Hargan outside the public house shows that they had a deliberate and deadly intention. Hargan had to decide in one moment whether he would submit to be murderously assaulted and most likely murdered, or whether he would defend himself, and it was because he chose the latter alternative that Mr. Justice Charles, after summing up dead for "wilful murder," and failing to carry the jury with him, sentenced him to 20 years' penal servitude. Lord Bramwell described Mr. Justice Charles as a kind and considerate Judge when he sent Hargan to 20 years' penal servitude. If this be an example of Mr. Justice Charles' kindness and consideration, Heaven help the prisoner who was brought before him when in one of his sterner moods! It is said that Hargan ought not to have carried a revolver. Perhaps not. I do not think it is illegal to do so, but I quite admit that it ought to be; however, so long as the Police Authorities fail to provide adequate protection in these dangerous neighbourhoods it is not astonishing to find people taking measures themselves for their defence. The Coroner's jury were only induced to return the verdict they did by the intervention of the Coroner. Of the Grand Jury, 13 to 10 only were in favour of finding a true bill; and of the petty jury, four jurors were originally in favour of an acquittal; and I believe that since the trial the other jurymen have stated that if they had known what the verdict would have been they would have been in favour of an acquittal. Hargan fell amongst the Philistines, and had nothing to trust to except his own right hand. The case ought not to be judged from the West End point of view—for you see plenty of policemen in the fashionable quarters—but it should be considered from the Kingsland Road point of view. At the West End serious breaches of the peace are comparatively rare; but in the Kingsland Road brutal, unprovoked attacks are looked upon as common occurrences. Hargan was the last man to give way to unreasoning panic, for he had looked death in the face in his military career, and that he had risen from the ranks to the position of colour-sergeant and acting sergeant-major proved that he was a good soldier. Only a few weeks ago in Dublin a man was convicted of throwing vitriol over a girl, thereby destroying her sight and every feature in her face, and dooming her to life-long misery, and yet the sentence in that case was only seven years' penal servitude. What, I ask, is Hargan's guilt in comparison with that of this scoundrel? By remitting 95 per cent. of the terrible sentence passed on Hargan the Home Secretary has shown that his opinion and that of the supporters of the present Motion are almost identical with regard to the injustice of the sentence. We ask the right hon. Gentleman to go a little further. We ask him not to condemn a man who has served his Queen and country faithfully and well; not to allow his life to be blasted and his character to be ruined; not to condemn him to bear the brand of a convicted felon for an act of self-defence which most people consider justifiable, and which even at the worst has already been punished far more heavily than it deserves.

*(4.47.) MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead): I hope the House will pause before it takes upon itself the function of criticising the judiciary and the conduct of the Executive in these cases. The course which we are asked to take would constitute a most dangerous precedent. I cannot agree that there are no facts in dispute in this case. The main fact in dispute is as to the amount of provocation that was given. And as to that, there is no doubt very considerable difference of opinion, as some seem to say that Hargan was fully justified in the shooting, whilst others consider that he was guilty of wilful murder. For myself, I cannot but think that the case is one of those that point out the need for a Court of Criminal Appeal, and I cannot but think that the Home Secretary would have been glad to be relieved from this duty, and to have the assistance of another Court, which would have had the advantage of seeing the demeanour of the witnesses. But while I consider that the tribunal of the Home Secretary is a necessary one, even where there is a Court of Appeal, it is an imperfect one, because it works, and must necessarily work, secretly, and because those who criticise it can have had no opportunity of seeing the facts on which it has acted. Notwithstanding that, I cannot but remember that the Home Secretary has the advantage of trained assistants in sifting the evidence brought before him, and has not only ex parte statements of one side, but the evidence on both sides, as well as the assistance of the Judge. Notwithstanding the fact that the Home Secretary probably thinks the sentence was excessive—and I entirely agree with him that the original sentence was excessive—I cannot allow the language used respecting the learned Judge to pass unnoticed, having myself had his personal acquaintance for so many years, and believing as I do that no more humane man sits at this moment on the judgment seat, whether or not in this particular instance he was betrayed into an excessive sentence. The last speaker said that 10 out of the 13 Grand Jurymen were in favour of throwing out the bill. I ask him, what bill? The bill the Grand Jury found true was a bill for murder. I do not believe any portion of the Grand Jury was in favour of throwing out the bill for manslaughter, which was all this man was punished for. I look with extreme suspicion upon the secrets of the jury box being thus brought before the House of Commons. I may be asked, is the House never to interfere in reference to the conduct of an Executive Officer? Of course it has such a right, but I say it has no right to interfere, and ought not to interfere, unless we are prepared to dismiss the Executive Officer, who has, in the exercise of his discretion, done the best he could. Some Members of the House may be prepared to take that extreme course. If so, I entirely disagree with them. The exercise of the prerogative of mercy is the most difficult and anxious duty any Executive Officer has to fulfil, and my right hon. Friend has before this withstood the bullyings of the Press, and in the end has turned out to be perfectly right. I believe, myself, that as he was right then so he is right now. I give Hargan credit for all that has been said with regard to his good character; but I hope this House will never try in this extreme way to justify the deliberate shooting of two men at close quarters with a revolver, and the bringing into our Institutions of that which is the great blot of American Institutions. My right hon. Friend has said that he believes that if he had been in the same position as Hargan, he would have acted in the same way. I remember the story of a Sheriff of Kent, who was entertaining the Judge of Assizes, telling the Judge how he had driven a man out of his house like a ferret and shot at him. The Judge thanked the Sheriff for his hospitality, and said, "If you had killed that man, I am afraid you would have been in very great danger of being hung." With all respect for my right hon. Friend, I am afraid that if he had acted in the same way as Hargan under similar circumstances he would have incurred something like the same danger. We have heard a great deal about this "band of ruffians," and a great deal of pity has been expressed for the man who is now undergoing a sentence of imprisonment. I cannot but think that some, at least, of that pity might have been bestowed upon the two men who, without a moment's warning, met their doom at the hands of Hargan.

*(4.56.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Although I cannot go to the length to which my hon. Friend who has just sat down is prepared to go in barring the way to Motions of this kind, I cannot but think that the present circumstances prove the great inconvenience in cases such as this of the course which has been taken. This is a case in which a minute examination of the evidence is necessary in order that a right conclusion may be arrived at. There have been four inquiries—an inquiry before the Coroner, when the jury found a verdict of murder; an examination before the Police Magistrate, an experienced, learned, and kindly man, who committed Hargan for murder; an inquiry before the Grand Jury, as to which we have heard I know not what gossip to-day; and the inquiry before the petty jury, and as learned, conscientious, and kindly a Judge as any that sits on the English Bench. Against the prisoner, who was defended by a most able and skilled counsel, this jury returned a verdict of manslaughter. Now the House of Commons is asked, upon hasty and imperfect statements, and upon documents which are not before the jury and have not come before myself, for my right hon. Friend had not had the courtesy to submit his materials to me—

*MR. J. LOWTHER: I was told that the documents had been laid before the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. MATTHEWS: All I can say is, that the particular documents which have been read to-day have not previously come before me. It is an inconvenient course to take to ask the House of Commons, after these four inquiries, to overrule the result upon ex parte statements. I propose to point out some of the misleading statements that have fallen from the Proposer and Seconder of the Resolution. In the first place, it has been said that the two unhappy men who met their death at Hargan's hands were ruffians of the worst type, men in whose presence it was hardly safe to be. The real truth, as far as I have been able to ascertain, is that these men were public house loafers, who did bear a bad character, and deserved to bear it, but whose misdeeds were for the most part of a trivial, insignificant kind, and certainly were not worthy of the strong language used by my right hon. Friend. Now, against Lambert, one of the two men shot, there were eight convictions; but all these were of a trivial character except one, which was a case of assault, occurring 20 years ago. For this offence he received six months' imprisonment, and therefore I apprehend the assault was of a rather serious character; two of the other convictions were for being drunk, and being drunk in charge of a horse and cart; the rest were trivial, and the last was committed as far back as 1886. Lambert, no doubt, was disreputable enough; he was a public house loafer; but to describe him as a ruffian against whom the use of a deadly weapon was necessary is an exaggeration against which I must protest.

*COLONEL DAWNAY: The Judge himself said the men were of the worst possible character.

*MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, and I dare say the prisoner had the benefit of that statement. But when we find the Mover and Seconder of the Motion amplifying the words of the Judge by describing the men as ruffians of the worst type, and as men whom it was justifiable to shoot at, I say that that becomes an exaggeration. Wheeler, the other man who was shot, had only two convictions recorded against him, the last of which was in 1881, just 10 years ago, for breaking a public house window. That is hardly a record which makes it right or fitting to help out an argument in this House by blackening the character of this man. With regard to the neighbourhood itself, my right hon. Friend has represented that Hertford Road is a place where police protection does not exist—

*MR. J. LOWTHER: I said it was inadequate.

*MR. MATTHEWS: And not only that, but he also implied that it was necessary to go there armed, and that to use weapons upon such provocation as Hargan received was justifiable homicide. These appear to me to be assertions more suited to the atmosphere of a South American bar than to any district of London. I have taken pains to inquire as to what the condition of this district is, and from the Report I have received I find that it is by do means so bad as has been represented. It is anything but a specially criminal district. It is rough, no doubt, but nothing more, and it has never been thought necessary to employ extra police there, or to take extra precautions such as are taken in certain parts of London. It is not nearly so bad as some parts of Whitechapel, and is not worse than Islington. Therefore the crime is not justifiable from the nature of the district. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion stated that attacks in this neighbourhood were so common that most of them were not worth mentioning.

*COLONEL DAWNAY: The landlady of the hotel was attacked three times in one month.

*MR. MATTHEWS: With regard to the landlady, some of the assaults followed these particular events. The information I have received is that there was a strong feeling against the woman after the trial, and that this led to a stone being thrown at her by one of the witnesses who was examined at the trial, and to other assaults which took place in her house. But to say that there was a strong local feeling, such as has been referred to by my hon. Friends, really seems to me to be an exaggeration. I trust there is no part of London so bad, so disorderly, and so riotous that there should be an exceptional licence for the use of firearms in that part such as does not exist in any other portion of the Metropolis, nor such as to justify anything which the law does not justify anywhere else. I have very little to add to the statement of the facts given by my right hon. Friend, but I have some corrections to make. I believe that Hargan behaved extremely well at the beginning of the row. The landlady got into an altercation with three or four drunken men in the bar. They wanted more drink, although they had no money to pay for it. She refused to give it to them, and they became violent, abusive, and offensive to the highest degree. One of them began to clamber over the bar to get more drink; and Hargan, hearing words of distress from the landlady, came to her assistance in a very manly way, and thereupon did what I am bound to say seemed to me to be more in accordance with American than English manners. He produced a revolver and threatened to shoot the men at that early period of the transaction. Of course, that was a proceeding which was entirely unjustifiable, because at that time there had been no assault or violence practised. But the unfortunate landlady appeared to be much more frightened by her protector than by the men, because she proceeded to push Hargan out of the bar and away out of the back premises, to get rid of him and his pistol. On this Hargan was cut off from the scene and proceeded to do what my right hon. Friend has stated—and this is a point on which chiefly I thought it my duty to commute the sentence—to escape by the window and make the best of his way off. Had it not been for that circumstance I should have thought once, twice, and thrice before venturing to review the Judgment of Mr. Justice Charles. This, no doubt, was strongly in his favour, as there was doubtless something in his mind which made him feel that he was in danger from the other men in the public house; and, therefore, he made his escape in that secret way. Now, what followed it is important to notice. The landlord, who had been asleep upstairs, came down and turned the three “desperate ruffians” out of the house without their committing any assault upon him—all three of them, the men who were shot and the man who providentially escaped the second shot! They were at the time so drunk that the witnesses say they were falling about outside the public house. They were, therefore, certainly not in a dangerous condition. [Laughter.] I do not know the cause of the laughter, for if a man be so drunk as to be almost unable to stand, and falls about, he cannot be a very dangerous antagonist.

*MR. J. LOWTHER: Who made that statement?

*MR. MATTHEWS: This particular statement was made by Corcoran the cooper, who had been drinking at the bar with these men. He came to the door to see them turned out, and in his deposition before the Magistrate he alluded to having seen them falling about through drink. The right hon. Gentleman did not do me the honour of asking to see the depositions which were taken before the Magistrates and the Coroner. Had he taken the trouble to read up all these sources of information he might have come to a different conclusion.

*MR. J. LOWTHER: I read the depositions made before the Magistrate.

*MR. MATTHEWS: If the right hon. Gentleman read the depositions he would have found that the deposition of Corcoran was almost conclusive. The right hon. Gentleman, over and over again, has spoken of these ruffians having attacked Hargan. There was no attack at all, and it was really on this point that my decision turned. Therefore, I think, it is singular that the right hon. Gentleman omitted all notice of that fact. There was absolutely no attack upon Hargan. He was seen making off, very properly and wisely, as well as he could, and that again is much in his favour. He was seen by one of the three companions who pointed him out, and then these three drunken fellows followed. It is a little doubtful, and the fact is one that requires minute examination of the evidence, whether they could have overhauled him. It is said that all they did was to cry "Hi!" twice, to attract his attention. Hargan turned round on the first cry, he being some 30 or 40 yards in front of them. He turned round once and they followed, and he heard them cry "Hi!" again. Hargan turned round, stepped forward a few paces, drew his revolver, and at a distance of 12 yards fired three times, bringing down the first man with his first shot, missing the second only because he dropped on his hands and knees, and killing the third man with the third shot. This, it must be remembered, was when the men were 12 yards off. It is highly probable that had these three drunken men got hold of Hargan they would have hustled him. There had been a quarrel, they had been irritated by the production of the revolver in the public house, and, therefore, it was extremely probable that if they had got up to Hargan they would have assaulted him; although they might have done no more. But for the extravagant conclusion which my right hon. Friend drew that they would not only have assaulted Hargan, but would have killed him, there is absolutely nothing in the evidence to support. Was the act of Hargan under these circumstances a perfectly justifiable one, for that is the proposition which my right hon. Friend has put before the House. Assuming that Hargan was a man of excellent character, is it to be declared by the House of Commons that such a man is entitled to shoot down two others who have done no more than I have described? That is the question, but it is one not for me but for the law to determine. It is perfectly true that the law does not allow a man to use a lethal weapon even in self-defence except it be to save his life or to save himself from some such grievous bodily injury as may endanger his life. That is true, but it is also true that the right of self-defence does not arise unless an assault on him is not merely apprehended or likely to occur but is in actual progress, and is of such a nature that loss of life or grievous injury to life, or limb, or body would be the inevitable consequence. I should like to know, if the right hon. Gentleman's doctrine were accepted by this House, what answer I should be able to make if the police were armed with revolvers and were to use them? Constables come in contact with these loafers, and not only in contact but in conflict with them, often being assailed by these bad characters, and my right hon. Friend's contention involves this consequence, that a policeman might shoot his assailants in order to shake them off. As to hon. Members below the Gangway, who rose in support of this Motion, I invite them to apply the law, which they apparently approve, to Ireland. Suppose an Irish constable were followed by two drunken men, of however desperate a character—moonlighters, if you please—of any type you like; and suppose that these two men simply shouted "Hi!" twice to attract his attention, would he be entitled to turn round and at once shoot these men at 12 yards distance? Would the hon. Members below the Gangway consider that act perfectly justified, and allow the constable to go scot free? I put the example of a constable in the discharge of his duty because he is entitled to greater protection and favour in the eyes of the law than any other single individual. It seems to me that the proposition of my right hon. Friend would lead to consequences which we could not entertain for a moment. It is true that a man is justified in inflicting death when his own life is actually in danger. But my right hon. Friend actually used this proposition—that Hargan fired his revolver at the two men lest they should get hold of it and shoot him with his own weapon. That is really a most extraordinary doctrine. Why, it would lead to this: that if an armed poacher came in contact with an unarmed gamekeeper, the poacher would be entitled to shoot him, lest the gamekeeper should get hold of his gun. I do think that is an extravagance which my right hon. Friend will not defend. It is not for me to attempt to defend Mr. Justice Charles, who is far above any words that I can use in his praise. But, as he has been criticised, I would draw attention to this: that there were circumstances in the case which might lead to a conclusion very hostile indeed to Hargan. When he had shot these two men, he used an extraordinary and unpardonable expression. ["Oh!"] That excites the merriment of the hon. Member for Northampton. "Lie there dead," he exclaimed, using a foul expression. That is an expression which might legitimately lead a judge of the facts to the conclusion that he fired in anger and irritation, on being followed, and if he fired in anger and irritation he was undoubtedly guilty of murder. I myself took a different view from that which appears on the statement of the learned Judge. I should be sorry to allow the House to suppose that there were not circumstances in the case which supported the learned Judge in the severe view which he appears to have taken after a most careful, complete, and anxious consideration. I think, on the whole, the safer conclusion was that Hargan fired because he believed himself about to be attacked, because there was a reasonable probability that he would be assaulted, badly assaulted, if you please, by men who certainly had shown that they could not be trusted or relied upon. That was, therefore, in his favour; that took from his act the character of malice, which alone could justify the severer sentence. I believe, myself, that I should be deserving of the greatest censure, and unfit for the duties I have to discharge, if I allowed, without punishment following, two men to be shot in the London streets in broad daylight, in a neighbourhood where there were many respectable shops, where the people, so far from having sympathy with crime, at once assisted the police in securing Hargan, and where there were many witnesses of unimpeachable character, bystanders who saw the occurrence, and who would undoubtedly have assisted Hargan against any attack that might have been made upon him. In such a neighbourhood, with such surroundings, and to allow two men to be shot without an attempt having been made to escape, for me to advise Her Majesty to grant a free pardon to the person who fired would be to imperil justice and to commit a most blameable act.

(5.22.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Mr. Speaker, for some years I shared the heavy responsibility now lying on the right hon. Gentleman, and, after the discussion that has taken place, I, at least, have come to the conclusion that he arrived at a right decision, and I think I ought to support him. I speak of this matter really with the knowledge principally derived from the statement made in this Debate, and I agree that it could only be in cases of high necessity or of gross and palpable error that the House of Commons could be induced to review those cases. We here have conflicting statements made on very many particulars between the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State and others, and we are very little able to find a verdict or pass a sentence in such cases. If we did so, we should reverse the decisions of four tribunals which had previously heard evidence. I take it that the only cause which brought this case under the recognisance of the House of Commons, was the unfortunate sentence passed by the Judge upon the prisoner in this particular case. I have long entertained the opinion, which I have expressed in public and private on several occasions, that in a great deal too many instances, I should say in the majority of instances, criminal sentences in this country are far too heavy. When I was at the Home Office, I addressed to the Judges a paper on that subject through the Lord Chancellor (Lord Selborne), which was supported by the Chief Justice of England, and which unfortunately did not have the results I had hoped. But I was able to say on that occasion, upon the authority of the Chief Commissioner of Prisons, that probably sentences of a lighter character would have a more beneficial effect than those now passed in this country. I remember an admirable Judge, a friend of mine, asked me to give him an order to see Portland Prison. He wrote me afterwards saying:—

“If I had had the remotest idea of what a sentence of penal servitude was, I should never have passed the sentences that I have passed whilst I was on the Bench.”

I think when you consider and know what a sentence of penal servitude is, you will feel that it is only the extremest crimes to which sentences of that magnitude ought to be applied. There is another habit of making jumps in sentences from 5 to 10, 10 to 15, and 15 to 20 years, which is totally irrational, and has the worst possible effect. And if this Debate has the result of inducing the Judges more carefully to consider the legality of the sentences which they pass, I think it will be a very useful Debate. What the House is now asked to say is, that Hargan has committed no offence at all, and unless we are of that opinion we cannot support the right hon. Gentleman in his Motion. The Home Secretary has most truly laid down the law that no man is to take the life of another except in circumstances of imminent danger to his own life. The question of whether a man is of good character or bad has nothing whatever to do with the case. The best man in the world has no right to take the life of the worst man in the world unless he is in danger of his life. To do justice to my right hon. Friend, I understood him to say that the badness of the character of this man led to the probability of Hargan's life being in danger. But I have heard of no facts to prove that there was imminent and immediate danger to justify Hargan in shooting the men. I heard one suggestion by my hon. Friend, which was that Hargan, having exhibited his revolver, might have believed that the men had armed themselves with revolvers or some other weapons.

*MR. J. LOWTHER: I did not say with revolvers, but with some weapon or other.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I confess that that seems to me a strange assumption. I listened with some alarm to the dangerous doctrine propounded by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet. If the object of his Motion is to induce the House of Commons to affirm such a doctrine as he has laid down in regard to the use of dangerous and mortal weapons, that would be in itself a reason for rejecting the Motion. It is impossible to be too careful in this matter of the use of firearms. We know that in some other countries the practice has grown to an undesirable extent, but, happily, the practice of “shooting at sight” has not yet extended to this country. The question is simply this: Is it absolutely certain that Hargan was in imminent, immediate, inevitable danger of his life? I am not satisfied that this was so, and if it were not so Hargan was guilty of manslaughter. Then, of course, the question of character comes in, and it rests with the Secretary of State to say what ought to be the mitigation of the sentence passed. We are dealing with the case of a man whom you cannot declare to be absolutely innocent, whom you cannot say was guilty of justifiable homicide, who has been convicted of manslaughter, and I earnestly beg the House, as long as it leaves the responsibility of determining the remission of sentences in the hands of the Secretary of State, not to interfere with it. Of course, if the Secretary of State were to take some course which clearly demands the censure of the House, it is in the power and it would be the duty of the House to pass that censure. But I am not, in this case, prepared to support such censure. The men who followed Hargan were not armed with lethal weapons, and therefore Hargan acted rashly, and was guilty in the law. Some punishment ought to be inflicted, and I am not prepared to say that the commutation of the Home Secretary is an improper one. Therefore, I shall vote against the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet.

(5.34.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): This Debate has been infinitely refreshing to me, as I have often complained of the want of independence on the Government benches. I was, therefore, pleased to hear one hon. Gentleman opposite telling another that he ought to be hanged, and a right hon. Gentleman saying to another right hon. Gentleman that his sentiments were only fitted for some American bar. I have also remarked often upon the deterioration of our best men through having occupied public office. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby is an instance of this. Any right hon. Gentleman who has been a Home Secretary seems to regard the office as a species of sacred priesthood which ought never to be attacked in the House, and rarely have I heard one Home Secretary attacked without an ex-Home Secretary getting up to defend him, however widely they may differ in politics. I have arrived at quite a different conclusion from that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby. If I may venture to criticise the right hon. Gentleman, I think the Home Secretary would do well if he realised more that the House of Commons is not an Old Bailey jury. The right hon. Gentleman is 'perpetually exaggerating, and he seems to be under the impression that he is either defending or bringing an accusation against somebody in the dock. He assails every one who disagrees with him. The right hon. Gentleman declared it to be monstrous that the men who followed Hargan should be styled ruffians; but he admitted that they were of very bad character; that they had tried to assault the landlady; and that they had been periodically put in prison. It is true the Judge said they were men of the worst possible character, but, says the Home Secretary, "to call them ruffians in this House is monstrous." It seems to me that their conduct was ruffianly. The right hon. Gentleman said that the men who followed Hargan, and who had already attempted an assault in the publichouse, were not dangerous because they were drunk. This was an extraordinary doctrine. I can understand that a person who is absolutely dead drunk may not be dangerous, but the person excited with liquor was always the most dangerous of any. It is in evidence that Hargan was walking along, and that the men were running after him; and the counsel for the prosecution himself stated that the men were only three yards from Hargan when he fired, not 12 yards, as the right hon. Gentleman stated. That makes all the difference. Two Home Secretaries have laid down the law that a man may not take life unless he is in immediate danger. I agree with that. But surely a man who has been already assaulted, who has been compelled to get out of a back window, and who is being followed by his aggressors, may legitimately consider himself in danger. When is the danger to begin? Is a man to defend himself after he has been killed? Hargan knew the men from their previous behaviour to be desperate characters; and, under the circumstances, the police not being present, he was perfectly right to shoot the men. I deprecate the practice of carrying pistols as much as any one; I think it would be well if the law forbade the practice. But it does not, and therefore you must not punish this man for being in possession of the weapon. He had the pistol in his pocket, and, as I think, he properly used it in self-defence. I shall vote for the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet.

*(5.45.) SIR F. MILNER (Nottingham, Bassetlaw): I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet will not put the House to the trouble of dividing. I have always looked upon him as a veritable pillar of the Constitution, and never expected to see him joining hands with the hon. Member for Northampton in attacking the prerogative of mercy exercised by the Sovereign of these realms, or combining with hon. Members from Ireland in an attack on the law of the land. There is little doubt that in passing the original sentence of 20 years the Judge made a grave mistake; and there is a practical unanimity of feeling that in reducing the sentence to 12 months the right thing has been done. It has been made abundantly clear from the evidence that the attack on Hargan was made by three men the worse for liquor, and unarmed. Under the circumstances, Hargan ought first to have had recourse to his fists instead of at once using a lethal weapon. Whether there was criminal intent or not, Hargan showed a most reckless disregard of human life, and it would be impossible to pass over his offence without a severe sentence. Otherwise a most dangerous precedent would be set. It is the custom of people in the House and out of it to attack the Home Secretary on every opportunity; but I think events have shown that in the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, or otherwise, the Home Secretary has been generally right. Subsequent events have always borne out the correctness of the judicial decisions given by the Home Secretary in such cases as this. No one who knows me would consider me to be a hard-hearted man, indeed my known dislike to sending first offenders to prison has made me a greater favourite with the gentlemen in the dock than with those at the bar. But in this case I hold that a grievous offence has been committed, and that it was necessary to mark its seriousness by imprisonment. I hold that the course which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has taken has been the right one, and I do trust the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet will rest satisfied with the explanations given.

(5.47.) Mr. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I cannot congratulate the hon. Member who last spoke on the way in which he follows his own precepts. He asked that the time of the House should not be wasted by pressing this matter to a Division, and yet all the time he was speaking I was at a loss to discover the relevancy of his remarks to the subject under discussion. I was one of those who signed the original Memorial to the Home Secretary, asking him to mitigate the very severe sentence passed by Mr. Justice Charles. Now, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that when I signed that Memorial I had a thorough knowledge of the neighbourhood where these men were shot; and I cannot help thinking that the hon. Members who have brought forward this subject have been guilty of a little exaggeration, possibly because they do not know the locality. I agree to a large extent with the description of the locality given by the police. The neighbourhood where the crime was committed is a very bad part, but it is surrounded by a very respectable district. It is not a neighbourhood that needs a special police force, but the inhabitants assert that, taking an average with the rest of London, the district is undermanned by police. I know the right hon. Gentleman may say that many other parts of London are in the same position. We are aware that, unfortunately, outer districts are denuded of police in order that the centre of London may be overmanned with the force. That is one of the grievances we have against the present administration, and that will have to be altered when any new form of administration is obtained. I listened to the defence of the right hon. Gentleman with astonishment. I had hoped to hear some sober remarks on so serious a matter, but the Home Secretary treated it with much levity—at least, so it seemed to us on this side of the House. But if the defence was a sound one, how is it that the right hon. Gentleman made the extraordinary reduction in the sentence of from 20 years to one year? Does not that show that he went as far as he thought it judicious to go? I must repudiate his suggestion that we on this side believe in people carrying revolvers and using them as they do in the wildest parts of America. I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that if he will bring in a Bill making the carrying of revolvers illegal, I will support the Second Reading. I believe this unfortunate man if he had not been armed would have been seriously assaulted, and I have strong testimony that the loafers at this spot have been a disgrace and terror to the neighbourhood; and now I ask the Home Secretary and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby whether this case does not show the necessity of a Criminal Court of Appeal? I hope that the First Lord of the Treasury, before the Debate closes, will, on behalf of the Government, promise to bring in a Bill constituting such a Court. Finally, I will ask the Home Secretary to consider whether this man Hargan has not suffered enough already, and whether he cannot now see his way to set him at liberty? I hope that a fair number of police will be put in the district of Hackney in future.

(5.58.) Mr. T. FIELDEN (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton): Are we going to divide on this question or not? That is what I want to know. I am in favour of prohibiting the carrying of revolvers in this country. The hon. Member for Northampton appears to argue that Hargan was justified in shooting the two men because he thought they were ruffians. Seeing the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney sitting opposite, I should like to ask whether I would be justified in shooting the hon. Member for Northampton if I thought him to be a ruffian? What difference is there in the argument? This Debate has been brought on by a right hon. Gentleman who is a Yorkshire man by birth, but who has had to seek a seat in Kent. He says it is quite right to use a revolver to shoot ruffians; but if he is going to argue on the basis that a man is justified in shooting anybody whom he supposes to be a ruffian, I am afraid it will be a very bad time for England. Again, his Seconder says this man ought not to be imprisoned because 10 of the 23 grand jurymen were in favour of this man. How does he know that? It is not usual to disclose the secrets of the grand jury room. Did he get his information from the papers, or from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet? I do hope the House of Commons will come to its senses to-night. This is simply a sentimental question. The Secretary of State for the Home Department has gone into the matter: he knows more about it than any of us, and he has acted upon his information. I shall not vote for the Resolution of my right hon. Friend, simply because I protest against men carrying revolvers in this country.

*(6.1.) MR. J. LOWTHER: I have been asked whether it is my wish to take the sense of the House on this subject. It is for the House itself to decide whether it will go to a Division. I personally have no wish to ask the House of Commons to give up at 6 o'clock the opportunity of discharging business which lies before it, and therefore I shall not urge it to go to a Division. I desire to say, however, that I fear several very important documents affecting this question have been withdrawn from the right hon. Gentleman's perusal. My right hon. Friend talked of Hargan as having for some time had more experience of South American bars than of the service of his country.

MR. MATTHEWS: No; I did not say that. I said the carrying of a revolver was more suited to a South American bar than to London.

*MR. J. LOWTHER: My right hon. Friend very properly drew attention to the circumstance that Hargan was in the habit of carrying a revolver, owing to the fact that he had been in America. The right hon. Gentleman also said that Hargan had seen more of South American bars lately than of the barracks of his country. But the facts are that Hargan had had a distinguished service in the Army, and had risen rapidly as a non-commissioned officer, and that he purchased his discharge, and then joined the Corps of Commissionaires, into which, as is well-known, no one is admitted without a good character. Through the instrumentality of that corps he obtained employment with a contractor. He only left that employment in June, 1890, when he went to America. There he stayed only a few weeks, and this catastrophe took place in July, only five days after his return. There was only one witness who spoke of his assailants as being drunk; that was not confirmed by the other witnesses, and the witness himself was one who, my right hon. Friend said, was in the house drinking with the men. There being certain documents which the Home Secretary is not in possession of, I will supply my right hon. Friend with them, and I trust that the result of his perusal of them may lead to a re-consideration of the case.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

NAVY (SHIPS LOST OTHERWISE THAN IN ACTION).

Return ordered—

"Of the number of Her Majesty's ships which have been lost otherwise than in action since 1840; giving in each case, where possible, the date, locality, and occasion of the loss; the description of ship; the finding, or an Abstract of the finding, of the official Court of Inquiry where such inquiry was held."—(Mr. Herbert Gladstone.)

INSPECTORS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (APPOINTMENTS BY COUNTY COUNCILS UNDER PROVISIONS OF ACT OF 1889).

Returns ordered—

"By Counties (England and Wales), of numbers of Inspectors appointed, or proposed to be appointed, by each County Council, and salaries offered in each case."

"And of numbers of persons so elected who have passed, and who have failed to pass, the examination of the Board of Trade."—(Sir Richard Paget.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.—(No. 184.)

As amended, considered.

*(6.8.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I rise to move the new clause which stands in my name. Clause 2 provides for the transfer of the collection of tithe to the County Court, and for the making of rules to enable the collection to be made. The clause I propose to add to the Bill is as follows:—

"The rules of Court shall provide for including in one and the same application to the County Court any number of separate claims against separate parties for the recovery of tithe rent-charge on land in the same parish, and for the apportionment between such parties of the costs."

It has been generally conceded that tithe is a property which should be preserved. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have contended that it is the inalienable and sacred property of the Church. We on these benches—at all events, many of us—have contended that it is public property which is only enjoyed at present by the Church, but which sooner or later will be taken possession of by the public, vested interests, of course, being compensated. Whether it is the property of the Church, or whether it is public property, which is only used for the time being by the Church, it is equally property that ought to be preserved, and that position has been recognised most emphatically and explicitly by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian when he has on more than one occasion warned the public against allowing this national property to be lost or frittered away. The object of the Bill is to provide for the recovery of tithe, and I venture to submit it is desirable that the machinery should be practical and workable, that the provisions of the Bill should not be such as would result in a good deal of the property being uncollected and in process of time lost. As the Bill now stands there may be a separate application to the County Court in the case of each tithe rent-charge, and on each separate application there must be a separate receivership and a separate collection. There are, no doubt, in every parish many tithe rent-charges paid by one person, and in such a case there will be under the Bill as it stands only one proceeding or application. But in some parishes there are many separate owner-ships, indeed there may be a separate owner of each tithe rent charge. At the present time there is a tendency to increase the number of landowners, so that we have to look forward to a multiplication of the number of tithepayers. The House will probably be surprised to learn the number of separate tithe rent-charges; on a former occasion I referred to a case by way of illustration. If I may do so without wearying the House I will mention one or two more instances. The subject of tithe rent-charge was recently discussed at the Surveyor's Institute, and a gentleman addressed the meeting with considerable authority. He had obtained a good deal of information, and was able to form a very accurate idea as to the number of tithe rent-charges throughout England. He ascertained that in one parish in Wiltshire there were 573 tithe rent-charges not exceeding 20s. each, and 371 of them were less than 5s. each. There were 27 of between 20s. and 40s. each. So that there were in the parish 600 separate tithe rent-charges not exceeding 40s. In a parish in Yorkshire this gentleman stated that there were 684 tithe rent-charges not exceeding 20s. each. I have particulars of the sale of tithe rent-charges for £59 18s. fixed upon 40 separate parcels of land, and the charge on some parcels is as low as 1s. per annum. The gentleman who spoke at the Surveyor's Institute made a very careful calculation, and gave a summary of the answers he had received from all parts of England in response to advertisements for information. From these returns it appears that in 25 parishes, some large and some small, there are 534 tithe rent-charges up to 20s., only 147 between 20s. and 40s., and 518 over 40s. If these figures are multiplied by four and then by 100, you would have an average for the 10,000 parishes, the number of parishes in England with tithe rent-charge upon them. The result is that there are 213,600 tithe rent-charges not exceeding 20s., 58,800 not exceeding 40s., and 207,200 exceeding 40s. It will thus be seen that we have to provide for the collection of an enormous number of small tithe rent-charges. If you apply to the collection of these small rent-charges a separate application, a separate order for a receiver, a separate receivership, and a separate dealing all through, you will find your machinery will be very difficult indeed to work. If you make the collection so troublesome, and relatively so expensive, as possibly you may by this Bill as it stands, the result may possibly be that tithe owners will hesitate, in some cases, to resort to the Court to recover their tithe, and, if they do, a very heavy penalty in expenses will be inflicted on those who are brought to the Court. I say, then, that in the interest of the tithe owner, as well as of the tithepayer and of the public, you should, as far as possible, minimise the costs and expenses. The Government have recognised the desirability of doing so by putting into the Bill the Schedules suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James). I suggest that they should proceed further in the same direction. The jurisdiction you are giving to the County Court is much more ministerial than judicial. If the course I suggest be adopted, the County Court Judge will appoint a day on which he will deal with the tithe cases. The tithe owner, having applied in the usual way for payment, will put the defaulting tithepayers into a list, which will be taken into the County Court. One set of notices will go out, and by one process the Judge will dispose of all the matters, and will appoint one receiver to deal with all the cases. The costs and expenses can be easily divided, and the result will be that they will fall lightly on the tithepayers. I know I shall be met with the serious objection that, if this course were adopted, tradesmen would claim the right of adopting similar procedure, and issuing one process against all their debtors. We are not, however, dealing with private rights and private debts, but with property of a national character, and property which has formed the subject of special legislation over and over again. I do not know that after all the proposal is a very great advance on the custom of the County Court. Looked at without reference to legal technicalities, I do not know that it very seriously differs from the custom that prevails at the present time in County Courts with reference to the consolidation of actions. I find it laid down in the Annual County Court Practice that if several actions be brought in the same Court by the same plaintiff against several defendants, and the event of the actions depends upon the findings of the Judge and jury on some question common to all of them, the Judge may at any time (apparently either with or without application) select one action for trial and stay the others, and the stay will operate until judgment is given in the selected action. The object is to prevent unnecessary litigation and useless expense. I cannot see why, even if my proposal goes a little further than the consolidation of actions, the House should not, to meet special difficulties in this special case of the recovery of tithe rent-charge, extend the principle of consolidation of actions, and so practically facilitate the recovery of tithe rent-charge.

Clause (Inclusion of several claims in one application.)—(Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

(6.28.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I sincerely hope the Government will not entertain this proposal. When it was made suddenly the other night I thought it was objectionable, and the more I have considered it the more objectionable it has appeared to me. It violates altogether the principle on which we have proceeded on this Bill, namely, that we are not to place the tithe owner in a better position or the tithepayer in a worse position than at present. The hon. Gentleman says it will place the tithe owner in a position he does not at present occupy, and will enable the tithe to be easily and compendiously recovered, but he appears to be desirous of acting in the fashion of the Roman Emperor, who expressed a wish that the people had only one neck in order that he might cut off all their heads with one blow. There is no other body to whom this power of taking victims en bloc has been given. The parish cannot do it in respect to the rates; the rates are collected in small sums, though, of course, it would be exceedingly convenient to club the whole parish together and sue for the rates by one action. Why should we do this for the tithe owner? Not even the powerful Chancellor of the Exchequer can do this for his taxes. It would be highly convenient to the owner of a number of small tenements that he could issue a writ to which all his tenant occupiers would have to appear. The hon. Member has referred to the consolidation of actions, but surely he will see the difference from this case. The very essence of consolidation of actions is that they shall all arise upon the same question. But in these cases under consideration debtors may have totally different grounds of defence. Actions are often consolidated by consent of parties, but seldom by the Court, unless the absolute identity of the case is proved. Now, I saw the other day the prospectus of a Joint Stock Company—the “Tithe Rent-Charge Collecting Company, Limited”—whether the hon. Member is Chairman of that company, and proposes this Amendment in the interest of that company, I do not know—

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman and the House that I have no connection whatever with the company, nor indeed did I, until the right hon. Gentleman mentioned it, know of the existence of such a company.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Of course, I was only speaking in joke, and did not mean it seriously; but if that was the object the Amendment would serve the purpose admirably; it would give to them on behalf of tithe owners a power, a screw, not possessed by any other owners of property in the country. The hon. Member has not concealed the fact; he avows it is an exceptional proposal not now to be found in the law, but he says it is for [an exceptional object, namely, the collection of tithe. But I ask the Government not to treat this in such an exceptional manner. We have gone on tolerably amicably on the basis that we are to alter the nature of the property as little as possible. We have throughout joined in keeping out of view personal liability, keeping this as a charge on the land as it was originally, dealing with it in every respect on that principle, making the charges as small as possible, with the idea of making the liability fall upon the owner, not the occupier. But now the hon. Member, at the eleventh hour, proposes to place the whole of this property, in respect to collection, in a preferential and exceptional position occupied by no other property. I hope the Government will not depart so widely from the principle they have hitherto recognised, and that they will not encourage this Amendment.

(6.35.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I think the right hon. Gentleman has left out of view one or two arguments which can be used in support of the Amendment. It is, of course, a matter for the House to determine. If I thought it could be fairly represented as a favour to the tithe owner, then I should agree it is a change we ought not to make. But when the matter comes to be understood it really is not a favour to the tithe owner. The proposal is that, wherever there are a number of small sums of 2s. or 2s. 6d. due for tithe rent-charge, then the owner should be able to include them in the first preliminary notice to the County Court, and that being done, the defendants will give notice of their defence, and action will proceed. The saving in fees will be a slight advantage, but I do not see how this can be said to increase the remedy of the tithe owner, or put him in a better position. In regard to rates it may be mentioned that a distress warrant does issue for a number of cases, and, that being issued, a separate summons is sent in each case. This initial step is extremely like the issue of a distress warrant in the first instance. There is no analogy between this case and that of the Exchequer cases. Just let us appreciate the case. The tithe owner has tithe due to him from a number of small occupiers who hold land under the same title, hold land practically under the same circumstances. What harm can it do that the title owner can carry out his desire to include some 10 or 15 names in the same list and in one statement? But we have no very strong feeling about it. The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken, I think, in considering it is a proposal in favour of the tithe owner simply, but I leave it to the House to decide.

(6.38.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The Attorney General has fairly recognised the position, and the understanding that the tithe owner is not to be placed in a better position, and is not to have an additional advantage conferred upon him. If the proposition of the hon. Member was for dealing only with the occupier, I could quite understand the convenience of this mode of proceeding, though I should still entertain objection to it, but this procedure is directed against the owner who may happen to be occupier. Under the present law, where tithe is collected from a large number of occupiers in amounts of 3s., 5s., or 7s., of course the argument of the hon. Member for St. Pancras would apply, but it will not apply under the present Bill. It is not on the face of it likely that a large number of small owners in the parish will be in arrear in respect of tithe and under similar conditions. You will be dealing with owners. Under the rules of Court there will be one remedy against an owner in respect to tithe assessed on separate fields, but what the Amendment will do will be to club the whole of the owners in a parish together, though they may hold under different titles, and there may be no analogy between the different cases, and there can therefore be no test case. No analogy is offered in the case of a number of newspapers printing the same libel, and when the actions are consolidated in order to obtain one decision affecting the whole. This proposal contains an altogether new principle, and unless we are prepared to extend the principle to cover all debts and obligations, allowing a tradesman as plaintiff to combine a number of debts, for instance, in one action, I do not see how we can agree to this clause.

(6.41.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I am afraid the hon. and learned Gentleman has not considered all the inconvenience and injustice that may arise from the adoption of such a clause as this. The proposition amounts to this, that a number of defendants, each of whom may have a separate defence, may be consolidated in one action. It must not be assumed that the same questions will be involved in each case; the defences may be wholly different. One man may claim that he had sold his land before the tithe was due, another may contend payment already made, a third that the amount should have been allowed in account between the parties, or another that the charge is excessive. Are all these people, each with a separate defence, to be included in one common action? Each defence must be separately heard by the Judge, and every one of the parties will have to be present. Imagine the confusion that must arise among principals and counsel. I am inclined to think the proceeding would increase and not lessen costs. It may well happen that in some cases there will have to be certain interlocutory proceedings, and notice of special defence in others. Now, suppose 40 defendants joined together in one omnibus action, is a notice that really affects only one defendant to be served also on the other 39? If one of the number desires the case to be tried by a jury, are the others also to be tried by jury—a much more lengthy procedure than by Judge alone—simply because one of 40 desires it? Then there is the question of appeal. The decision may be such that only one defendant wishes to appeal; are the other 39 therefore to be dragged to the Court of Appeal? I am quite sure such a cumbersome procedure cannot be contemplated. My hon. Friend seems to draw a distinction between these cases and ordinary cases, say of a tradesman combining his debtors and firing one shot at all, on the ground that this is public property. That is true, so far as the nature of the property is concerned, but it is not true as to the action. Actions will be taken by private individuals, in whom for the time being the property is vested. Therefore it is private property in that sense; it is the right of the individual to put money into his own pocket; it does not partake in any way of the nature of public property, in so far as recovery in these particular actions are concerned. Taking all things into consideration, the confusion that would result in the endeavour to carry this thing through would exemplify the truth of the old adage, "More haste worse speed." I cannot conceive a method by which it would be more easy for recalcitrant tithepayers to delay recovery than by thus joining claims together in one action. We know how constantly it happens that in County Court actions a defendant is unable to appear from illness or other causes, and asks for an adjournment. In this number of 40 defendants, how likely it will be that one may be unable to attend, and will send a certificate of illness. Then, as it will not be possible to hear the case in the absence of one defendant, the whole action will have to be adjourned. The practice of the County Court is necessarily not carried on under the rigid rules of the High Court, that parties must be present and ready to proceed or the case is struck out. In County Courts such a rule, is not possible. It would be unjust to a number of poor people who have not the means of employing a solicitor. The expedition with which actions are tried in the County Court at comparatively slight expense is due to the fact that rigid rules are not adhered to. I have known the fact of one of the parties having missed a train being held as a reasonable ground for adjournment, so that judgment should not go by default, with the possible expense of application for a new trial and waste of time. There are so many objections to the clause that I am astonished the Attorney General should have taken up this neutral attitude; and I trust, on re-consideration, he will put his foot down determinedly on an Amendment that must lead to so much confusion and inconvenience.

*(6.49.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): The hon. Member who has just spoken has not, I think, sufficiently remembered that the object of the clause is to compel the Court to frame rules, and no doubt the rules would be made sufficiently elastic to meet the varying circumstances and conditions. It may be that the rules might be so adjusted as to be free from the objections raised. But I rise chiefly in consequence of a remark made by the Mover of the Amendment, in which he bore testimony to the very small amounts which are collected by way of tithe in many districts. From my knowledge of the West Riding of Yorkshire, I am aware that the tithe is levied in very small sums—sometimes 6d. and 9d. Even as the law stands, many of these tithes are not collected at all. Within the range of my personal acquaintance there are many vicars who sacrifice a large part of their small incomes rather than collect these small tithes from their parishioners. Now, it is said we must not by our legislation change the law against the tithepayers; but we ought to remember that, so far as these small sums are concerned, we are altering the law seriously against the tithe owners, for these proceedings in the County Court will be more cumbersome, dilatory, and costly. I think it is only equitable, as we are increasing the difficulty for the tithe owners, that we should consider this facility suggested, and I hope that on consideration the Government may be induced to give a favourable ear to the proposal made.

*(6.52.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): After the practical speech of my hon. Friend (Mr. Roberts), who probably knows more about the working of County Courts than any other man in the House, I hope the Attorney General will consider the Amendment is not one that should commend itself to his judgment. I quite agree that tithe is national property that ought to be preserved; but I cannot see that as such it should be accorded special treatment to the advantage of the tithe owner, such as is not extended to taxes or to rates. See what the Amendment would come to. A tithe owner would club together from 20 to 50 defendants in one action, different owners with different properties held under different titles, raising different defences established by different witnesses! I imagine what it would be; what a confusion it would lead to. At present you can only consolidate actions when they are brought in respect to an identical matter. Moreover, if you begin to prescribe the course of proceedings for the County Court, then you should do so uniformly.

*(6.54.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. Hicks BEACH, Bristol, W.): I confess I address the House on this technical matter with a considerable amount of diffidence. I do not pretend to an intimate acquaintance with County Court proceedings, and I do not know that I quite appreciated, when the hon. Member for St. Pancras mooted the question, the full effect of his proposal. Certainly I had in my own mind rather the case of a number of tithe rent-charges due to a tithe owner from a tithepayer than a number of small tithe rent-charges due to some tithe owner from a number of different tithepayers, who might hold their property under very different titles. Looking at the objections that have been urged, I think the hon. Member for St. Pancras would be well advised not to press his Amendment.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

*(6.57.) MR. SEALE - HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I believe the Amendment which stands in my name will be accepted by Her Majesty's Government; and, therefore, in as few words as possible, and as I shall not have an opportunity of replying to objections, I will state the object of the Amendment. In consequence of a decision in the Law Courts it turns out that in the case of a tithe owner making default in payment of rates the only remedy is for the collector to recover against the occupier for a debt which is none of his, and the only remedy for the occupier is to recover from the landowner, and the landowner from the tithe owner. Only by this round-about process can the rates be collected from the defaulting tithe owner. Of course, the difficulties which arise, as can be easily imagined, are very serious. They have arisen in my own neighbourhood, and I have no doubt other Members know of instances elsewhere. The Amendment I desire to propose will be as printed in the Paper, but, in the third line, after "other," I would insert the word "occupying." The first part of my Amendment relieves the occupier from the liability to pay the rates of the tithe owner, and the second part makes the landowner liable to pay the collector the tithe rent-charge, in the event of the tithe owner's default of payment of rates, until the debt for the rate is settled. I have only to thank the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade for having put my Amendment in such order that it is acceptable to the legal advisers of the Crown.

Clause (Rating of owner of tithe rent-charge).—(Mr. Seale-Hayne),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause be read a second time,"—(Mr. Seale-Hayne),—put, and agreed to.

*(7.4.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): We are indebted to the hon. Member for proposing this clause; but I think the 2nd sub-section is objectionable, and I move that it be omitted. I think the 1st sub-section amply carries out the object the hon. Member has in view, and enables any rate on the tithe rent-charge to be recovered from the owner. The 2nd sub-section at the end says—

"And the order may be executed as if it were an order under this Act for the payment of a sum due on account of the tithe rent-charge."

I think that this instead of facilitating matters would create difficulties, and put the owner and occupier to inconvenience on the default of the tithe owner. I move to omit the 2nd sub-section.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Sub-section 2 be omitted from the proposed new Clause."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

(7.6.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: I think my hon. Friend is under a misapprehension in this matter. I do not think the effect of the sub-section will be to enable the rates to be charged on the property of the occupier. But in a case where the tithe owner resides away from the parish, or is abroad, and it is impossible to get the rate from him in the ordinary way, then a receiver can be appointed, not of the rent and profits of the land, but of the tithe of the owner. The landowner who has to pay the tithes, instead of paying them to the tithe owner will pay them to the receiver, who will deduct the rates, and pay over the residue to the tithe owner, who, as I say, may be residing abroad. It seems to me necessary that the sub-section should stand, for there would be no remedy in the case of a non-resident tithe owner, or a tithe owner who may be residing away from the country, or may be a lodger without goods on whom distress can be levied.

SIR R. WEBSTER: The object is to meet the case of the person responsible for the rates being out of the country. There is no possible danger of the clause in any way working otherwise than for the purpose of removing a blot in the law.

(7.7.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): So far as I can make out, the 1st sub-section makes the owner of the tithe rent-charge directly liable for the rate. Then comes the case of the owner of the rent-charge declining to pay the rate or the tithe. Because you cannot get hold of the owner you appoint a receiver to intercept the rate and pay it over to the poor rate collector. I do not see why, under the circumstances, we should complicate an already sufficiently complicated Bill by allowing this 2nd sub-section to stand.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added.

(7.8.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to move the following clause:—

“Whenever any proceedings of a criminal or penal character arising out of the recovery of tithe rent-charge under this Act shall be tried by a County Court Judge, the defendant may require a jury, and, if tried by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, the defendant shall, if convicted, have a right of appeal to the Quarter Sessions next ensuing after his said conviction, the enforcing of such conviction being suspended until the said appeal shall have been decided.”

The enforcement of this clause would carry with it the sympathy of the country. There is this much to be said against County Court Judges when adjudicating on questions affecting their own officers, that they would be liable to take an exaggerated view of any offence against a bailiff. They would rely to a great extent on the credibility of their own officer, and I do not think that in these cases there should be any presumption in favour of the prosecution. Apart from the judicial character of the County Court Judges, I think it important that a jury should be interposed between them and the defendants. Suppose there is a summons issued under the 48th section of the County Court Act—suppose a person is summoned for assaulting a bailiff. You may commit an assault without really being guilty of violence. There is such a thing as constructive assault—technical assault—such as the brandishing of a stick or the showing of the fist. I think it all-important that in such cases a man should not be sent to prison, in the manner contemplated by the Bill, without having the right of trial by jury. A man who is a trained lawyer would be liable to take too technical a view of that offence, whereas a jury would put aside technicalities and look at the common sense of the matter. I therefore submit that in such cases a jury would be a better judicial authority than a County Court Judge. Something was said the other night about juries in Wales being carried away by their sympathies when trying cases arising out of the present tithe agitation. But I would point out that the Registrar, on whom the duty of selecting the jury would fall, would not select persons who would be likely to be carried away by their feelings. I do not think anyone on a jury in the County of Carnarvon would be likely to be carried away by the prejudices of the anti-tithe men. With the exception of one Registrar, all the six in that county are Conservatives, and I believe the sixth is a Liberal Unionist. With such men it is a cardinal point in their creed that law and order must be preserved, and I do not think they would be likely to select juries who would favour disturbance of the public peace. I think the Government may rest assured that the Registrars would select jurymen who would be perfectly impartial. As to the other part of the clause—that relating to Quarter Sessions—I think it is highly necessary. The County Court Judges are not ardent partisans, and as judicial authorities they do not take it on themselves to interfere in politics, but that cannot be said of the Justices of the Peace. Whatever may be said about a jury, I do not think Justices of the Peace can be regarded as an impartial tribunal in matters of this character. There is this to be said with regard to a jury: In civil cases in the County Court where there is only a matter of £5 in dispute the defendant may demand a jury, and yet in cases which affect his own liberty he cannot at the present moment insist upon a trial by jury at all. I think this is a great inequality of the law which ought to be remedied, and I hope in this case the House will consent to remedy it.

A Clause (Appeal in proceedings of a criminal or penal character arising out of the recovery of tithe rent-charge.)—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

(7.16.) SIR R. WEBSTER: It is impossible for us to accept this new clause. I would submit to the hon. Gentleman, who has shown great acuteness in regard to this Bill, that, in the first place, the hon. Gentleman has made out no case for it; and, in the next place, it would be extremely unwise to introduce such highly controversial matter. The only cases to which the clause refers are cases which are met by Sections 48 and 162 of the County Court Acts, namely, assault, rescue, insulting the Judge, bailiff, or Registrar, or wilful misbehaviour in Court. It is the duty of those who desire to see justice properly administered to endorse the principle that the Court should have power to protect its own officers. The hon. Gentleman proposes that if an admitted breach of the law takes place—[Cries of "No!"] Well, the clause deals with proceedings of a criminal or penal character.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Not an admitted breach of the law.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I was not using "admitted" in the sense the hon. Gentleman understood me to be using it. I meant that if the offence were proved it would be admittedly a breach of the law. Well, the hon. Member proposes to alter the mode of dealing with such a case. I ask the House to endorse the decision it has persistently given not to take away from the bailiff the protection that is given to him in other Common Law cases. If it was a case of what happened before judgment it would be a different matter. It is practically conceded that the clause will affect misconduct either in the course of the proceedings, when the ordinary law ought to be enforced, or after judgment has been given, when of course it is to be assumed that the law will be obeyed. No exceptional privilege of protection from the consequences of misconduct ought to be inserted in this Bill, and I think we are standing on safe ground when we give the officers of the Court the same protection in this Bill as is given by the County Court Acts in other matters.

*(7.20.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I think the hon. and learned Gentleman has misapprehended the effect of the clause. The hon. and learned Gentleman says it is of the utmost necessity to keep intact the power of the Court to protect its own dignity and to protect its officers. We agree. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman argues that we propose to take away from the County Court the jurisdiction it now has in that respect. But that is not what this clause proposes. The first part of it deals with the question of the defendant being entitled to demand a jury in proceedings of a penal or criminal character in the County Court arising out of any proceedings under this Act. I hope the Government will re-consider their decision on that part of the clause. In a purely civil case involving a sum of £5 and having no penal consequences, the Government say there may be a jury. In a case, however, where the liberty of the subject is concerned, where the proceedings are of a criminal character, and the punishment of either fine or imprisonment can be awarded, the Government wish the House to say that the defendant shall not have a jury. There is no ill-feeling at present existing between the people in the Principality and the Judges in the Principality. Surely hon. Gentlemen opposite would deem it an unfortunate thing if anything should happen to place the Judges and the people in conflict. I venture to say that the County Court Judges would prefer that questions of this character, which no doubt involve political considerations to some extent, and in which at any rate political feelings will arise, should be left to a jury. There are no juries at all, except in peculiar cases, before the Justices, and therefore my hon. Friend proposes that if these offences are prosecuted before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction there shall be an appeal. Upon a simple question as to the annual value of the land the Government have rightly granted an appeal. and yet in a criminal case, where it may be expected that the Justices will have strong predilections on one side, the Government say there is to be no appeal. The Attorney General's argument was not as forcible as it was brief. Indeed, he had no argument to produce against the clause, and I trust that the House will agree to insert it.

*(7.27.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): The hon. Gentleman opposite has said political feeling attaches to these cases. Well, political feeling ought not to attach to them. These are ordinary debts, which ought to be treated in the ordinary way. It is perfectly true, nevertheless, that political feeling is excited by these cases, and what conclusions are we to draw from the fact? Well, that such cases ought not to be tried by a popular body like a jury. The County Court Judge, who, being a man of education and position, must recognise that political feeling ought not to enter into them, will be much more capable of deciding justly in such cases. Our position is that the collection of these ordinary debts ought to be enforced in an ordinary manner, and the contention applies both to the first and the second part of clause.

*(7.29.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The noble Lord says, in effect, that we ought not to have a jury in a political case. Surely if he had read English history he would have known that political cases were those in which a jury has always been held to be more necessary.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I deny that they are political cases.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I take issue entirely with the noble Lord on that point. The Attorney General has said it is the duty of the Judge to protect his own Court. Of course it is in common with every Judge in the land, and the Judge ought to have that power. What we say is that the power should also be exercised consistently with the protection of every person coming before the Court; whereas this Bill refuses that protection, because it prevents persons coming before the Court from having the right of trial by jury. I support this proposal for more reasons than one. It so happens that as I believe there is only one County Court Judge in Wales who understands the Welsh language, but everywhere the juries are familiar with the vernacular, and I may add that the Welsh juries are quite as impartial as the English juries. Again, although in civil cases a jury may be insisted upon when the stake is a small one, yet whenever a man's liberty is at stake he is to be denied to have the opportunity of being tried by a jury. Can anything be more absurd than to permit a jury in cases of more than £5, while it is refused in cases where a man's liberty is at stake, and where the result may be dependent on the view a Judge may take of the conduct of a man in waving a stick or even in shouting under circumstances of excitement? The County Court tribunal has hitherto been a very popular tribunal in Wales, and I, for one, strongly object to its being discredited by the slightest suspicion of partiality. I trust that, under all the circumstances, the Government will be able to see their way to the acceptance of this Motion.

(7.35.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I think the Attorney General, who I am sorry is not here, is under a misapprehension in thinking that we on this side are not as much as any other portion of the House in favour of a proper administration of the law. Even in the case of this peculiar tithe process and distasteful exercise of the rights of property, I claim for the Welsh people that they are most anxious to avoid any forcible disobedience to the law. We have more or less discussed in Committee the 48th section of the County Courts Act of 1888. That section provides that the execution process shall be put in the hands of the bailiff of the Court, and that penal and criminal consequences shall ensue where the officer is assaulted or resisted in the execution of his duty. The new clause proposed by my hon. Friend (Mr. Lloyd-George) attempts to put those persons who, if they have done anything criminal, we admit ought to be punished, in a position which is fair and equitable and common to everyone now charged with such offences, according to the principles of our Constitution and the administration of the law by the Criminal Courts. We say that the man who alleges that an offence has been committed should not be both judge and jury in his own case. As this Bill now stands, a bailiff may imagine that certain manifestations amount to resistance, and may there and then without any warrant arrest any number of persons and take them before the County Court Judge. Beyond this, he may call on the bystanders at their peril to assist him in these arrests, and, as far as I can make out, the arrested persons may be put in prison and kept there until they can be taken before the Judge, who will then have to decide whether the law has been broken, and what are the penal consequences that should ensue. We say that this is an inequitable mode of administering the law. [Cries of "Divide!"] Hon. Members who cry "Divide!" are mistaken if they think we are going to allow these clauses, which we have brought up after deliberate consideration, to be stifled without full and fair discussion. We say that persons placed in the position I have indicated ought to have the opportunity of submitting their case to a jury. I do not wish to go into the political aspect of this question, although the noble Lord the Member for Darwen (Viscount Cranborne), who has just spoken, never interposes in our Debates without introducing the political element. What we want are justice and fairness. We say that in justice to the man, and in fairness to the County Court Judge himself, the arrested persons should have the option of trial by jury. I agree with my right hon. Friend (Mr. G. Osborne Morgan) in thinking that there is not a County Court Judge in Wales who would not gladly welcome this proposal. I, therefore, earnestly entreat Her Majesty's Government to accept this clause. The only alternative presented is that of taking arrested persons before the Magistrates. I will not say one word against the unpaid Magistrates of Wales. We try to do our duty with justice and impartiality, and under the existing law persons charged before the Magistrates with serious offences are entitled to demand that they should be sent before a jury. Where a man's liberty and character are at stake, it does not matter how trivial the case may be, he is entitled to have his case tried by a jury. All these questions should be tried, if necessary, by a jury, and a man should have the right of claiming, if he likes, to go before a jury. I ask the Government not to cause a new source of irritation, as they undoubtedly will throughout the length and breadth of Wales if they refuse this proposition. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman seriously whether it is sensible, on a question of this sort, to stand out and create a new source of irritation and injustice throughout the length and breadth of Wales by refusing to accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend?

*(7.47.) MR. ABEL THOMAS (Cardmarthen, E.): I wish to call the attention of the President of the Board of Trade to a mistake made by the learned Attorney General, in an observation which he made with regard to Section 162 of the County Court Acts of 1888. My hon. Friend's Amendment does not in any way affect the jurisdiction of the County Court Judge under Section 162, and therefore insults to the Judge, jury, witnesses, the Registrar, or bailiff, would not be in any way affected. It goes to cure the effects of Section 48, which says for any interference with the bailiff, or assault or attempted rescue, the Judge may impose a fine, or send the case to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. It was admitted by a right hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House that this is a Welsh Bill, and it is thought that the effect of the Bill will be to cause the agitation to disappear. Hon. Members who hold that view do not remember that the strongest of the opponents of this measure are the small yeomen farmers, who will have the same opportunity of protesting under this Act as they had under the old form of proceeding, and the fact will remain that it will be a matter of political feeling if they do not pay their tithes. As this political feeling would exist, it would be more just that their causes should be heard by a jury rather than that they should be decided by the County Court Judge. The acceptance of this Amendment would satisfy the Welsh people; and if the Bill is specially directed towards keeping them in order, then the least thing the right hon. Gentleman can do is to accept this proposal.

*(7.53.) MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I cannot allow this discussion to close without making an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to accede to the representations that have been made to him from so many quarters of the House as embodying the wishes of the Principality. Though political feeling may unconsciously warp the views of the right hon. Gentleman, I feel sure it is his desire to meet the views and wishes of the people of Wales in as favourable a manner as possible. I really cannot understand the objection which induces him, against his better self, to oppose the wishes of the Welsh people. If the Bill is directed against disturbances in the Principality, it is of the utmost importance that nothing should undermine the belief of the Welsh people in the fairness of the new tribunal. Therefore, it is desirable that the right hon. Gentleman should make some concession, if he wishes to see the success of the measure which he has brought in. The noble Lord the Member for Darwen contended at one time that this was a non-political measure, and at other times that it was political. If it is not political, then surely none of those oppressive consequences which it is thought would result from the insertion of the clause could ensue. If it is a political question, then the noble Lord, and those who support him, are running counter to the whole current of political history. In discussing this question in Committee, I gave the illustration, which I repeat now, of Fox's Libel Act, in answer to the argument of the noble Lord that political matters ought to be withdrawn from the jury, and showed that the Libel Act pointed in the very opposite direction. We have not found any ill consequences result from the Libel Act, which was mainly due to the industry and public spirit of Mr. Fox. I do think it is a most dangerous thing that any one individual, however excellent a person he may be, should have the opportunity of unconsciously, no doubt, being biased towards creating a constructive offence, and then imposing a fine for the offence he himself has created. This Amendment avoids the great danger of the County Court Judge creating an offence and then punishing for it. I say it is important to satisfy the Welsh people that justice is intended to be done. The second part of the proposition seems to me exceedingly reasonable. Is it too much to ask that there should be right of appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions—a Court much lauded by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and one which, therefore, they should accept as appropriate? Though some of the arguments used on behalf of the people of Wales may be considered sentimental, yet I do not think they should be less regarded on that account, for the sentiment is such as should be considered at the hands of the Legislature. There is no desire on the part of responsible citizens in the Principality to commit unlawful acts, but they do object to the possibility of equivocal or lawful acts being construed into unlawful acts. That is a danger against which we desire to guard; it is not an imaginary danger. I earnestly appeal on behalf of the people of Wales, and especially of the constituency which I represent, and which is affected more than any other by this question, to the Government to re-consider their decision, and to adopt a course which will further their efforts in ensuring that peace and quietness which they profess to desire.

(8.0.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The great danger of this Bill should be that the persons most affected by it—the small owners—will feel that they are liable to be County Courted. County Courting may be a very light or a very severe matter, but if you allow it to be severe you will make the Bill odious to the people. At present it is impossible for criminal proceedings to be taken with respect to tithe, and without trial by jury. But you are going to alter that by transferring the jurisdiction to the County Court, and consequently the people who will be subject to the Bill will be put in a far more unfavourable position in respect of criminal proceedings than they occupy under the present law. We have been contending against that throughout these Debates. We have said let Parliament shift the burden as it likes from the occupier to the owner, but let it not make the burden heavier than it is at present. It is quite plain that any criminal proceedings which may arise and have arisen—we all regret the circumstance—by reason of tithe riots in Wales are brought under the ordinary Criminal Law. But by this Bill you are bringing the matter under County Court jurisdiction, and allowing the cases to be summarily disposed of without right of appeal. Under the 48th section of the County Court Act the bailiff will be able to take any offender into custody with or without warrant and bring him before the Judge. But suppose the County Court Judge is not to sit for a fortnight or a month, what is to be done in the interval with a person who has been arrested, with or without warrant, as he may be for the more serious offences? Where was he going to be kept? Is he to be imprisoned until he can be brought before the County Court without any provision for bail? You are placing the whole class of yeoman farmers in Wales under this serious liability. You are putting them under a harrow which they have never been under before; you are placing them in a disadvantageous position which they have never before occupied, and which they have done nothing to deserve. By all means, if persons act contrary to law, let them be proceeded against and punished in the ordinary course of law; but Parliament ought not to render such persons by exceptional legislation defenceless in comparison with the position they formerly occupied. I do hope that this Amendment will be accepted. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has so far met us in a very fair and reasonable spirit. I agree with him as to the general principle of the Bill, that it is only intended to make a new arrangement relative to the incidence and collection of the tithe, and that it is not desired to make the position of the tithe owners less favourable than before; but I repeat that unless you accept this Amendment you will impose fresh liabilities and commit a great injustice. (8.7.)

*(8.37.) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I do not propose to travel over any of the ground which has been occupied by my hon. Friends in stating the objections they entertain to the Bill as it stands, or in advocating the Amendment now under consideration. I rise for the purpose of taking up narrower ground, that of the personal experience of an ordinary Member of Parliament.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(8.40.) MR. STUART RENDEL: I believe that the object of the Government and of the Members from Wales coincides in one important particular, and that is that the Principality should not be any longer under the risk of becoming the scene of disorder or violence in regard to the collection of tithe. The tithe movement in Wales has been very much misunderstood. It is thought by some people to be a selfish movement, an attack upon tithe as tithe. It is nothing of the kind; it is simply a movement against the application of tithe, and the movement is undoubtedly one of strong religious conviction. It could not, in the view of those who forward it to the utmost of their power, be otherwise than seriously aimed if it were accompanied with anything like lawlessness and disorder. It is from that point of view that I entertain grave anxiety as to the portion of the measure now before the House, unless it is amended as suggested by my hon. Friend. I am afraid that the new power given to the County Court Judges to summarily imprison will afford a temptation to some persons to make cases for the exercise of such power. It would be rash to say this unless one had some experience to back his view or fear. It will be within the remembrance of the Attorney General that at a very early stage of these troubles in Wales, certain disorder did occur, that it was necessary to investigate the extent and character of that disorder, and take responsible opinion as to the mode in which it might be dealt with. I am sure my hon. and learned Friend will agree with me that, as a result of such investigation, it was discovered that there had been a somewhat too serious view entertained by tithe owners in the locality as to the extent and character of the disorder, and that, on the whole, the disorder was not of an aggravated kind. If disorder did occur at all it was, I fear, partly due to the action of those who were interested in converting legal protests against the tithe, as now applied in Wales, into illegal, and therefore punishable, methods of conduct. I believe this Bill will increase the inducement to persons who are interested in putting down display of any kind, however legitimate, of objection to the application of tithe in Wales, to press their remedy; not directly, by costly appeal to the County Court, but indirectly, by challenging, and secretly fomenting disturbances when the County Court bailiff levies distress. They will, I fear, be only too ready to secure the imprisonment of refractory tithepayers. Inasmuch as Welsh tithes are, as a rule, broken up into extremely minute sums, it will constantly happen that the remedy in the County Court will be worse than the disease itself. Under the circumstances, interested persons will have a stronger inducement than ever to look for, to hope for, to pray for, disorder in connection with the manifestation of public opinion, in order that they may go the shorter way of breaking down the manifestation, namely, that of inflicting, through the County Court, imprisonment upon any of the persons who engage in the expression of public opinion, and who may, by a little recklessness, expose themselves to what the law calls a constructive assault. The County Court Judge may feel that he has had thrust upon him the necessity of guarding the dignity of his Court by resorting to imprisoning. Once a case of imprisonment occurs it will be difficult for Members from Wales, whatever influence they may hitherto have been able to exercise in favour of peace and order, to answer for the maintenance of peace. I think that some of those who are interested in the promotion of this Bill are not fully aware of the efforts made by Wales in the interest of the agitation against the application of tithe—not in the interest of the tithe owner or the tithepayer—to prevent the agitation being marked by any unseemly proceedings. Whenever there has been anything like the faintest ground for charging upon the Welsh, in connection with the collection of tithe, a want of perfect peaceableness and order, a full and loud expression of opinion has been elicited on the subject here and elsewhere. Last Session I asked a question of the First Lord of the Treasury, in answer to which he made the frankest and fullest admission that in the county which I have the honour to represent, and where perhaps there has been as full, as free, as steady and important exhibition of the public objection to the application of tithe as in any county in Wales, there has never been the smallest case of disorder for the last two and a half years. If this measure passes unamended, what will be the case? At present, thanks to the tact, the good sense, and the good temper of the Chief Constable for Montgomeryshire, all these proceedings have passed off perfectly harmlessly and peaceably. I trust that the Government will re-consider the question of giving the County Court Judge power to imprison, and will remove the danger of creating a worse state of feeling and things in Wales than has existed hitherto. I feel the force of the reply the Attorney General has made, but it must be remembered that this is a special Bill, intended to apply to a special set of circumstances. It is in the nature of a political Bill. We are thankful the Government have transferred the incidence of tithe from the occupying tenant to the owner, but it cannot be denied that another portion of the Bill is distinctly political in its origin. On political grounds I think it would be well to relieve the County Court Judges from a most invidious position, and to take away from the owners of tithe in Wales the temptation to have recourse to an indirect and most pernicious mode of punishing refractory tithepayers.

(8.55.) SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN (Swansea, District): I do not rise with any hope of convincing Conservative Members, because it is rather a singular fact that there are only four Conservative Members in the House at this moment. At the same time, I feel constrained to appeal to the President of the Board of Trade to accept the most just and righteous clause of the hon. Member for Carnarvon. It has been said that County Court Judges in Wales visit their different circuits at least once in each month. I am informed that such is not the case, and that in many of the rural districts of Wales County Court Judges absent themselves for two and even four months. Under such circumstances, what may be the position of a man arrested under the operation of this Act? He may possibly be detained in prison without trial for two months, or even longer. Surely that is not a right or proper state of things. Then, I ask, how will this Act present itself to the inhabitants of Wales? If the clause under consideration is adopted the Welsh will know that they will be tried by a jury of their own countrymen, by an impartial jury, because I am quite confident that Welshmen on their oaths will try a case impartially. If the clause is not agreed to the people will say Parliament—in fact, Her Majesty's Government—have refused them trial by jury, and they will have no confidence that justice will be done them. I do not wish to cast the slightest slur upon the County Court Judges. I believe that, as a rule, they are men who act strictly in accordance with justice. At the same time, a County Court Judge is only a unit, and I cannot suppose that those who are tried will have the same confidence in his decision as in that of a jury of their countrymen. I believe it is the fact that in these cases tried under this Act for sums beyond £5 there is a right of appeal absolutely; but I have never heard it explained why it is right to admit the claim of suitors to trial by jury in cases above £5 and to deny it below that sum. It appears to me rather like a law passed for the rich and not for the poor. The average of cases that in Wales will arise under this Act will be something like £3, and so the greater number of cases will be excluded from trial by jury. If the House desired to have this Act freely accepted by the Welsh people, then this class of cases must not be refused trial by jury. This would in no way weaken the Court; surely it would strengthen it. Surely the presence of a jury makes a stronger Court than when there is only the decision of one man. I really fail to see how the argument of the Attorney General applies. The hon. and learned Gentleman appears to argue that the clause would weaken the Court and withdraw protection from the officer of the Court; but, really, I cannot see how that could possibly be. The effect of the other proposition in the clause is that if a defendant is convicted by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction he shall have the right of appeal to a Court of Quarter Sessions. Is that an unreasonable thing? Surely it is not a thing that hon. Gentlemen can reasonably deny. Is it wise or expedient to deny this right? Into cases of this kind it is admitted politics do to some extent enter, not perhaps Party politics, as usually understood, but politics as between Churchmen and Nonconformists. That being so, then as a means of giving confidence and of strengthening the Court give the right of appeal. How will the Bill appear when it comes to be applied in Wales? It will appear that the House deliberately, and after full discussion, denied the right to the Welsh people of trial by jury, and the right of appeal to the decision of a Bench of Magistrates. If the Government desire to carry the people with them in this legislation, they must see how unwise it is to oppose this most proper and just clause.

(9.5.) MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): I am still not without some hope that the little Welsh Party will be able to convince right hon. Gentlemen opposite of the justice of our plea in this instance. This Bill has over and over again been admitted to be a Welsh Bill, and it is now close upon being carried through, carried in this House supposed to represent the people, but still carried against the expressed opinions, wishes, and desires of five-sixths of the Welsh Representatives. That in itself places the Bill in an unfavourable aspect before the Welsh people. That being so, and the Welsh Members having failed in their attempt to get Wales exempted from the operations of the Bill, it becomes our duty to do all we can to provide for its smooth working in the Principality. Conscientiously and sincerely, it is our opinion that unless right hon. Gentlemen on the other side will consent to the use of this trial by jury the smooth working of the Bill will be impossible. There is no desire to evade the law when the Bill becomes law; our desire is to place the Welsh people on an equality with all other people. As it is, the Bill presents an unfavourable aspect. The Welsh people regard it, rightly or wrongly—rightly in our opinion—as a Bill to support a legal right, but to perpetuate a moral wrong. It is the duty of the House, then, to do all that can be done to ensure the Bill being received peaceably, at least, if not favourably, by the Welsh people. The changes in procedure give jurisdiction to County Court Judges, in whom the Welsh people have not confidence, and an indignity, an insult, will be added to injury. Again, there is the great difficulty of language arising, and the House must pardon me if I am considered to be bringing this subject forward too often. Its importance to the Welsh people can scarcely be over-estimated. If I could bring home to the minds of right hon. Gentlemen the real and substantial difficulties that arise in Courts in this connection, I am sure the Government would endeavour to meet them. In my capacity as Miner's Agent it has been my duty to attend Courts and inquests, and well I know the difficulties that arise from the Welsh people knowing their own language only, and the Court knowing the English language only, and the incompetence of interpreters produces the greatest absurdities. In one case I remember a Welsh witness, being told to give evidence in English, replied, "I cannot speak the truth in English"—his meaning being that he had not at command language to convey the exact facts to the Court. I earnestly appeal to the Government to re-consider their decision, and by accepting this clause to remove some spikes and thorns from the Bill.

(9.15.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: Our great objection is that innocent persons may be wrongly convicted of assaults of which they are not guilty. The circumstances may arise in the confusion of a large crowd, and all we desire is that the facts may be ascertained by a tribunal most competent to elicit them. In all criminal charges a jury is most competent for the purpose. It is most necessary for, say, the Judge to be able to maintain the dignity of his Court, and we grant that, but these proceedings we have in view are in respect to the operation of the Act, not to proceedings of the Court. A disturbance arises, and the question is, who is the guilty party? Now, there seems to be a feeling that if there has been an assault, it is, first of all, necessary in the public interest that somebody should be punished. If you can get hold of the right man, well and good, but if you cannot secure the right man then punish the wrong man rather than that there shall be no punishment inflicted at all. We are apprehensive that a Judge, feeling perhaps to an unnecessary extent that the dignity of his Court is in peril, may, in a conflict of testimony give the benefit of the doubt rather to the dignity of his Court than to the person accused. That we consider will not conduce to the dignity of the Court, and we are desirous that every safeguard should be adopted against such a proceeding. The only argument suggested against a jury is that in some—not in all—cases, some amount of political feeling may arise. But granted that may be the case, our course should be to provide the best tribunal under the circumstances. I am quite aware that where strong feeling exists, you cannot get a perfect tribunal, for any tribunal will be more or less affected by political prejudices; but is the jury more or less likely to be affected by this prejudice than the Judge? Less likely I think, for prejudices will be balanced. A jury will invariably include representatives of both Political Parties, Liberals and Conservatives, Nonconformists and Churchmen. These opinions meet in discussion of the evidence, and surely it is more probable that a verdict will be given free from political bias than a decision on the irresponsible judgment of one individual who may be as much influenced by prejudice as any man on a jury. It is a mistake to suppose that prejudice is less strong with the educated; that is often shown not to be the case. There will be the additional prejudice on the part of the Judge in favour of his own bailiff, a feeling that he ought to stand by his bailiff, and a disposition to believe all his bailiff may say. These are tendencies that may lead to great injustice, and I think it is perfectly excusable in us on on this important matter to insist on the clause. It is, I think, the most important Amendment we have proposed of this character. Other Amendments were of pecuniary importance, questions of costs important no doubt to poor persons; but this is far more grave, involving as it does criminal proceedings and punishment by imprisonment. Then upon the latter part of the clause the power of appeal from the Court of Summary Jurisdiction, I would insist most strongly. I maintain that the Legislature cannot err in granting the right of appeal too liberally. I do not think it is always desirable to appeal from a decision; but my experience is, that when the right of appeal does exist, there is a greater amount of caution exercised by the tribunal of First Instance; greater patience, more consideration to the arguments on either side. Go to any Court and contrast the summary manner in which Judges decide questions of costs as to which there is no appeal with the manner in which they deliberate upon questions of law; they decide questions of costs without vouchsafing an ear to either side. I do not wish it to be imputed to me that I say that our Judges are guilty of any misconduct in their proceedings. I simply say they share in the ordinary weaknesses of human nature, and the best men will be actuated by considerations of the same character under like circumstances. The whole object of law is to restrain the caprice of Judges. If we were certain that we could have men who would always decide in cases brought before them with absolutely sound judgment, then laws would be unnecessary, and we might trust the Judges to act from a sense of justice. I have known cases in Courts of Summary Jurisdiction arising out of the Tithe Act in North Wales, as to which, if an appeal had been granted, the decision would have been wholly different. I remember a case in which a respectable farmer, not a Nonconformist but a Churchman—I believe a Conservative, but certainly a Churchman—was distrained upon. A great crowd collected, and the farmer hearing a scream, and thinking that his little son was being crushed, pressed forward very forcibly to assist his boy out of the crowd. In doing this he pushed a policeman aside, with no intention of assault but simply in his eagerness to get to his boy. This the policeman construed into an assault, and technically it was so, and the man was convicted, and this, I believe, owing to the feeling that in the state of excitement and irritation then existing it was necessary to make an example. I am quite sure that if on appeal, and away from the passion and ill-feeling of the time, this decision had been re-considered, the conviction would have been quashed.

*(9.25.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I confess I am one of those led to believe that the safety of trial by jury is a great constitutional doctrine, and more especially where there is danger of political bias being imported into legal proceedings. But here we are constructing a new method of procedure, instituting a new mode of collecting tithe, a matter upon which much feeling has been excited, and yet in regard to offences that may arise the Attorney General declines to accept the principle of trial by jury. I am informed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Denbigh (Mr. G. Osborne Morgan) that under Clause 48 of the County Court Act of 1862, a County Court bailiff has power, with or without warrant, to take possession of a man and lock him up for a month before bringing him before Magistrate or Judge.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: No.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: Well, I speak as a layman, and I am speaking on the opinion of my right hon. Friend, who showed me the clause under which a bailiff of the County Court has power to arrest a man whom he thinks has committed an assault, and can actually keep him in custody for four weeks before bringing him before a Court of Law. If that is so, then I think it is monstrous to refuse to allow a jury in these cases under the Bill or to refuse an appeal to Quarter Sessions. The Justices, we know, are usually landed proprietors, and in Wales keen politicians. We are told that the Government are promoting this measure with the object of settling disturbances in Wales in connection with this vexed question of tithes, and I do not understand why the Government should refuse a proposal which will facilitate the object they have in view. I can see no cause at all why this should be refused not only in Wales, but all over England. This will be a crying defect in the law, and will make the Act most unpopular and unworkable. I think it is worth the while of Her Majesty's Government to re-consider their decision.

(9.31.) MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I should not have risen had it not been that the Welsh people throughout the Principality feel very keenly on this matter. I support the Amendment of my hon. Friend. At present the County Court has only a civil jurisdiction, except in cases of judgment summons, when it has penal powers.' We have been careful in this Bill to do away with these penal powers, and I hope the House will go farther and will refuse to confer on the County Court an additional jurisdiction—a criminal jurisdiction of a very severe character. If the Government decline to accept the clause, practically they will be conferring upon the County Court a criminal jurisdiction. In Pembrokeshire, Cardiganshire, and other counties where this agitation prevails, the County Court Judges hold their Court only about every two months. Is a man to be arrested, and is he to wait two months for his trial until the County Court Judge shall come round? I hope the Government will see their way to accepting the Amendment.

(9.34.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I am bound to say I differ more or less from the hon. Member for Glamorganshire in making an appeal to the Government to accept this Amendment. It seems to me it is not a matter of appeal, and that he is not bound to support his Amendment by argument, but that the onus is on the other side to show why people are first to be brought within the grasp of the criminal law, and then to be deprived of trial by jury. I submit to the House that the ordinary theory of the criminal law in this country wisely and properly provides that every one accused of a criminal offence shall have a right to be tried by a jury, with certain exceptions in the case of petty criminals, such as pick-pockets. That law exists for the burglars and wife beaters in your great cities. Will it be said that the persons who may bring themselves within the scope of this Bill are petty criminals? I would ask the House to consider how any Welshman will bring himself within the grasp of the criminal law under this Bill. Why will he do it? Not because he desires to evade a just debt, or because he thinks that tithes are in themselves an unjust and oppressive impost, but because he objects simply and solely, because he feels he is made by the State to support ministers and a Church, that, however admirable, are not his ministers and his Church. He sees on the one hand the ministers of the Established Church living on his money, and, on the other hand, he sees his own poor ministers very badly off, perhaps declaring the Word of God to him in some wretched hovel and supported by the money of the miner and agriculturist of the district. Therefore, the Welshman does not in any sense come within the ordinary category of criminals, and is a person who, of all others, ought to have the protection of a jury of his own fellow-countrymen. Under this Bill a new jurisdiction has been given to the County Court Judge. The object of the Bill is to put the arm of the civil and criminal law more strongly and decidedly behind the class of people who are engaged in what is really a religious conflict for the great body of the Welsh people. Before this Bill was introduced what was the position? The tithe owner who sought to recover the tithe was compelled to employ his private bailiff, and if there was resistance and an action ensued, the tithepayer had the protection of trial by jury. Now, however, you are not only taking away that right, but by lending the Criminal Court to the tithe owner the man who resists will be clapped into gaol summarily, without, practically, any form of law at all. That is a change in the law which should require the strongest arguments to support it. Where the debt is over £5 a man will have the protection of a jury, so that where the amount is only £4 19s. 11d. a man is to be in an infinitely worse position than one who has to pay £5 0s. 1d.

Mr. Randell

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That has nothing whatever to do with this Amendment.

MR. CHANCE: I am dealing with the argument on which the trial by jury has been refused. The Government say they will give trial by jury where £5 is at stake, but not in cases where imprisonment can be inflicted. I make the right hon. Gentleman a present of that argument. I trust the House will not permit this important change to be made in the law without hearing first from the right hon. Gentleman the declaration that he considers that the Welsh people who, on the ground of religious belief, refuse to pay this tithe ought to be treated with as much justice as the ordinary burglar.

*(9.42.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not quite understand the object of the last speech. The hon. Member evidently has not studied the particular proposal involved in this clause, and during the whole of his argument showed that he was thinking to some extent of an entirely different matter. Parliament has laid down a certain method of procedure for the punishment of offences against the County Court and its officers of a criminal nature in the recovery of debts. As lately as 1888, by the County Courts Act, it affirmed and sanctioned that method of procedure, and no one, as far as I am aware, has complained that any hardship has occurred or any one has been unfairly punished for assaults on bailiffs, or interfering with or insulting them. Nothing has been said in the course of the Debate by hon. Members to show that they desire any trial by jury or any appeal in the ordinary cases of debt dealt with by the County Court. Their own Amendment shows that the jury that is asked for and the appeal desired are confined to proceedings of a criminal character arising out of claims for tithe rent-charge.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Any other Amendment would be out of order.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Then why should we make a difference in this case? Why should we take from the power of the County Court Judge to protect his own officers and himself? The reason why we propose to give the officer of the County Court greater protection than is given to the bailiff under the present law is because now the bailiff is merely an agent of the tithe owner, but under the Bill he is an officer of the County Court, and is carrying out a decree of a Court of Law, made after hearing both sides. Therefore I submit to this House, as I submitted the other day to the Committee, that the bailiff is entitled to protection in carrying out the decree of the Court in cases of tithe rent-charge as in other cases. We do not propose to give him one whit more. There is no difference made between a Welshman who refuses to pay and a Cornishman. It is intended by the Government that this Bill shall make the law in this respect absolutely identical throughout England and Wales. I hope that I have shown myself willing to meet any reasonable wishes or arguments or proposals which have been put forward by hon. Members opposite, but I cannot consent to place the persons who attack, insult, or obstruct the Court bailiffs in Wales who are engaged in the recovery of tithe rent-charge in a better position than would be occupied by persons who do the same things when any other debt is sought to be recovered. On these grounds, therefore, I must ask the House to reject this clause.

(9.48.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman has treated this question in such a technical manner. None of us have occasion to doubt that in the discharge of their ordinary duties the County Court Judges act with absolute impartiality, and are above suspicion, but does the right hon. Gentleman for a moment imagine that the difficulties that will arise under this Bill will partake of the character of an ordinary debt? Unfortunately he has the sentiment of a whole nation against the scheme of the Government. The object of the Government is by this process to make the exaction of tithe a little less difficult and a little less odious to the Welsh people. I believe the whole scheme of the Government will be a failure. I believe the Welsh people are infinitely too well instructed upon the change that is proposed by this measure to in any degree make their objection to the exaction any less than it has been in the past. But, on the other hand, what is the position of the County Court Judges? The right hon. Gentleman cannot deny that in Wales, as throughout Great Britain, nine out of every ten of these officials are Conservatives, and they cannot altogether divest themselves of political and religious bias in the discharge of their judicial duties. If the purpose of the Bill is to make the Established Church in Wales more acceptable to the Welsh people, is the right hon. Gentleman taking the right course; is he likely to appease ecclesiastical feeling and prejudice in Wales by refusing trial by jury to a man who in a moment of irritation and from strong religious conviction may have thrown some difficulty in the way of the County Court bailiff? The right hon. Gentleman would be screening the Welsh County Court Judge from a very odious duty by casting upon a jury the obligation of deciding the guilt or innocence of a man charged with interfering with the County Court officer. I have a strong belief in the value of trial by jury. If there is any feeling on one side it is sure to be counteracted by feeling on the other, and you never will be able to satisfy the strong convictions of the people as to these exactions by the jurisdiction of a single individual. Nothing precipitated the final abolition of the Church rates so effectually as the sending to prison of one or two men who conscientiously objected to the legal exaction. For the same reason I would advise the right hon. Gentleman in the interest of the Established Church in Wales to show some consideration to people who in a moment of irritation may go further than they are entitled to go by allowing them trial by jury. If this demand is refused I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will find that he has not been well advised in his refusal.

(9.53.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I was somewhat surprised to find the right hon. Gentleman confine himself strictly to one single branch of the question. As a matter of fact, the Bill contains four means of punishment of those who obstruct the County Court officials. First, a man may be fined, and from that there is no appeal; secondly, he may be imprisoned, and from that there is an appeal; thirdly, he may be bound over to keep the peace, and from that there is no appeal; and, fourthly, he may be sent to prison for contempt of Court, and from that there is no appeal. So that now you are putting into the hands of the Welsh parsons or the Welsh tithe owners a scourge with four thongs to it, and except in one case out of the four the Welsh people will have no appeal from the punishment inflicted on them by Tory magistrates and Conservative County Court Judges. Is it, then, fair of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade—whose courtesy we are all anxious to acknowledge—to single out the exceptional case of the County Court bailiff, and to say—"In this case we are only doing what we do in all other similar cases under County Court procedure?" I would remind the Welsh Members of this—that in this particular form of procedure the Welsh parsons are taking a leaf out of the book of the Irish landlords. The Government say they are only allowing the County Court to collect tithe in place of requiring the tithe owner to collect it himself. They are doing that, no doubt, and that is exactly what the Irish landlords do when they put their estates in chancery. It is a common dodge of theirs, for trespass or making a wry face at an agent becomes not an offence against the landlord but a contempt of Court, and is visited with the severest pains and penalties. And imprisonment for contempt, remember, is bounded by no limit of time, although the House of Lords in 1883 made an abortive attempt to limit such imprisonment to three months. The Welsh people are smarting under exactly the same grievance that the people of Ireland used to smart under, and are addressing the same unavailing appeals to the great Anglo-Saxon race; and what makes their religious grievance all the stronger is, forsooth, the declaration of the Government that they are not legislating for Wales. If it had not been for the struggle in Wales this Bill would never have been introduced. Is it Yorkshire or Cornwall or Northumberland that has made this Bill a necessity? No, it is Wales. And now I come to consider the other three branches of the question. Under this Bill there will be the power of imprisonment in default of bail. Take the case of a Welsh Nonconformist minister—"some village Hampden" who is breasting the "tyrant of his fields," and conducting a Methodist chapel, in the endeavour to keep the people solid about him—a Welsh-speaking minister who, complaining of what he believes to be an injustice to his religion, says, "I will not bow the knee to Baal; I will refuse to pay tithe to a foreign and an alien Church. Having refused to pay tithe, and my people having refused, I will attend the auction, or sheriff's sale, or tithe execution," or whatever is the Welsh phrase for such a process. Well, he attends that sale, and, in the opinion of the County Court Judge, he is taking part in an unlawful assembly, because every duty which a few men endeavour to discharge against the technicalities of the law is liable to be construed into taking part in an illegal assembly. If in Ireland a man sympathises with the oppressed peasantry, he takes part in an illegal assembly. If in Wales he sympathises with the people in their quarrel with an alien Church, teaching a religion they do not profess, he takes part in an illegal assembly. So the Welsh Nonconformist minister is brought before the Magistrates. We have seen specimens of these Magistrates in this House. There was one who represented Carnarvonshire, but, as he has gone, I will not refer to him personally. The measure he proposed was that the Irish people should be flogged by the order of a Removable Magistrate. "Oh, but," he said, "I only mean the moonlighters." That, I suppose, will be the sort of Magistrate by whom this law would have to be administered. Probably when the Welsh minister was brought up for the crime of sympathising with his flock, the Magistrate might say, "I do not wish to inflict punishment on you, because you are a respectable gentleman. I will, therefore, only bind you over to be of good behaviour and to keep the peace." From this there will be no appeal, and the result will probably be that the Welsh minister will go to gaol for his sympathy with his own people. Thus, for the first time, you will have a Welsh minister in prison; but when you had the Rev. Bell-Cox and other Anglican priests in prison you were not so very happy. In your processes against the Rev. Mr. Mackonochie and other priests who adopted Puseyite practices, the English people were not particularly happy in imposing the penalties required by Act of Parliament. But these men, at any rate, affected to belong to the Church of England. They broke its rubrics, however, and you were bound to punish them. The same thing would happen in Wales. The Nonconformist ministers would be imprisoned, and would have no right of appeal. I ask, is that a tolerable state of things? I should have thought it was only suited to the backwoods of Connamara. I should have thought it was only where an Irish priest was to have been imprisoned that you would have refused the right of appeal. But it would seem that the law is to be worse in England and Wales than it is in Ireland, because in Ireland whenever a fine of over 40s. is inflicted we have an appeal, outside the Coercion Act. Will this be so in Wales? It will not. As I have already shown, the rope by which the Welsh people are to be bound is composed of four strands, and only in one case out of four is there any chance of temporarily cutting that rope by means of an appeal. Where imprisonment is to be inflicted the right of appeal is in a worse condition than in Ireland, where we only have an appeal in cases of more than a month's imprisonment. No Englishman can suffer a day's or even an hour's imprisonment without the right of appeal. The case of the Welsh people is most unhappy. They are spread over a number of counties into which, to a large extent, publicity does not penetrate. They are almost even more isolated from the centre of what is called civilization than the people of Connaught or Donegal. They speak a language which you do not understand, and you will have your new law administered, not under circumstances where what goes on is shouted from the house-tops, where everybody may hear, but in little corners of the Welsh mountains, where the inhabitants are shut out from the press and from all acquaintance with the external world. Is this a desirable state of things? Who are to be the judges of these people? Will they be Nonconformists or Wesleyans like the mass of the community. No; almost to a man they belong to the Established Church. ["No, no."] Well, I speak of the mass of these Magistrates. There may be such a thing as a white blackbird here and there; but if you take the entire Bench of Welsh Magistrates, it will be found that they are a Bench altogether out of sympathy with the Welsh people. On all these grounds I say the Welsh Members are entitled to the hearty sympathy of this House. They have shown a patience far greater than their fellow-Representatives from Ireland. They have granted the right hon. Gentleman the most extraordinary facilities for proceeding with this measure, as was shown on Tuesday night. I agree that it was a return for the courtesy which the right hon. Gentleman had extended to them, and that therefore he deserved it, and consequently, although a single voice would have barred the stage that was allowed to be taken, I would not, under the circumstances, have raised my voice for that purpose. But the right hon. Gentleman should remember that in this business we who address remonstrances from Ireland are absolutely desperate. He may say that this is no affair of ours, and if I were to say it was I should be jeered by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Still, I do beg of him to extend to these poor Welsh districts some chance of ensuring justice. What is it that is asked? It is not a great deal. It simply amounts to an appeal from a Tory Magistrate to a Tory County Court Judge. I do not say an appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober, but an appeal from Philip unlearned to Philip with a wig on. Is this an unreasonable demand to make on behalf of the Welsh Principality? I say it is eminently reasonable. Why do you refuse to give the appeal which is asked for, merely to bolster up in Wales an alien Church? If this were a case of imposing the law which we hear so much about in Ireland, if it were a case of enforcing the law to the common every day circumstances of life, if it dealt with railways, trade, or commerce, or any of the ordinary matters of out-door business, this Bill would either never have been brought in, or if it had been the feeling which it has excited would never have been in existence. Why is so much feeling excited by this measure? Why are the English Members struggling over this Bill, as they would not struggle in the case of a Recovery of Debt Bill? Is it because they are influenced by one of the deepest sentiments of human nature, and endeavouring to maintain one of the dearest objects of our lives? We all know that in Wales those questions which arouse religious discontent are those on which the keenest and bitterest feelings are entertained. I say that the Government are making a profound mistake, and the next year or the year after they will probably recognise this. The English people view with calmness the imprisonment of one or of a score of the Roman Catholic priests of Ireland; but they will not view with calmness the imprisonment of a score of Nonconformist ministers, especially if that imprisonment is inflicted because they have resisted the payment of tithe to an alien ministry. In my opinion, you are inflicting one of the greatest blows that could be aimed at the Church Establishment in Wales by refusing the Welsh people even a buffer between their landlord Magistrates and those who may be acting in opposition to the law. We must all deprecate the exciting scenes that are constantly taking place at these tithe executions. We know that the law will ultimately get the better of the poor people who resist it, although the law may be a bad one; but we also know that the masses of the people will most assuredly in the ultimate result get the better of a bad law. When you consider the badness of the law, when you find that scores and scores of the Welsh people will be sent to gaol for that which under present circumstances would not involve imprisonment, it is useless for the Government to say they are only availing themselves of the existing procedure. You might as well say it would be profitable gardening to graft cherries on to cabbage plants. You are availing yourselves of the existing procedure for purposes for which the existing procedure was never intended. This was the grievance of the Irish people when the Coercion Act was passed. A good old common law everybody loves, because it is for the protection of all men. Such is our ordinary Petty Session Law, but when you graft new processes on that law, and avail yourselves of a mode of procedure which arouses men's passions and excites their strongest feelings against your action, you are doing that which is impolitic in itself, and deserving of the just condemnation of this House. You are now in addition giving power to imprison for contempt of Court. Instead of a fine for assault, or at the most six months' imprisonment, you may have not six but 60 months' imprisonment availed of for the purposes of this Bill. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman not to impose this new grievance upon the people of Wales. Let me remind the right hon. Gentleman that he has accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for North St. Pancras which appears on the Paper.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not understand what the hon. and learned Gentleman means?

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is out of order to discuss it, but this is it:—

"Provided that where the lands, out of which any tithe rent-charge issues, are occupied by several occupiers who have contracted to pay the tithe rent-charge, any of such occupiers shall be liable only to pay such proportion of the sum paid by the owner of the lands on account of such tithe rent-charge as the rateable value of the lands occupied by him bears to the rateable value of the whole of the lands out of which the tithe rent-charge issues."

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I explained that on Monday. The hon. and learned Gentleman means the hon. Member for Peterborough.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, if the Government distrust juries on the ground that these are political cases, that is a question wholly separable and apart from the question of appeal. This Amendment involves the right of appeal from the Local Bench to the County Court, yet the noble Lord the Member for Darwen thinks he has disposed of it when he refers to that part of it dealing with the question of trial by jury. On the whole, I think the action of the Government on this matter is out of keeping with their general tone and policy throughout this Bill. I fully recognise that this Tithe Bill is far superior to its predecessors, but that only shows the value of discussion. It is possible if we killed the Bill of 1891 we might have a still better one in 1892. Still, we must not look the gift-horse in the mouth, and we must admit that the Bill of 1891 is superior to the Bills of former years. Speaking as an Imperial Member of this House, my anxiety is that if you pass this Bill it should be in a form to cause as little rankling and soreness in the breasts of the Welsh Members as possible. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, by his amenability, to accept this Amendment, which asks after all only for a small matter.

(10.23.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I disagree with my hon. Friend when he says that the policy of Her Majesty's Government in this Bill is not the same as in every Bill. Whenever it comes to the question of trusting the people, no matter what the Bill may be, you find the Government absolutely refusing to trust them. We know perfectly well that trial by jury is being suppressed in Ireland, and I always suspected that they would make the same attempt in England. It is because they have been successful in Ireland, and because the people of England and Wales have not risen as one man to protest against the conduct of the Government in Ireland, that the same system is now being applied in this country. What is this offence which is to be punished? We know that the vast majority of the Welsh people conscientiously believe that they ought not to pay tithes so long as they are not devoted to the proper use. They do not object to pay tithes provided they are devoted to some national purpose; but they do object to paying tithes for an alien Church. Suppose the Government proposed that we in England should pay tithe to the Roman Catholic Church. It would be an outrage. Yet I cannot abominate the Catholic Church—I am speaking theologically—more than the Welsh people abominate the English Church. There is generally a strong antagonism in Wales to the National Church. Suppose some respectable Nonconformist minister, from conscientious motives, refuses to pay tithes, he is subjected to a distress, and should he even raise his hands and say "Avast!" when the bailiff appeared, he would be deemed guilty of constructive assault. Or, supposing some old man, coming that way, raised his stick, even accidentally, he too would be held to have committed a constructive assault. Before whom are the offenders brought? In the first place the County Court Judge. And by whom are the County Court Judges appointed? A politician, respected by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and respected on this side of the House. Still, the Lord Chancellor is a politician. Now I happen to know something of a County Court Judge in the north of Wales, appointed by the present Lord Chancellor. That County Court Judge had never held a brief in his life, and probably knew less of the law than I do. He was a friend of the Lord Chancellor, and that covered a multitude of—ignorance. This Judge had before him three jurymen who, when he asked them could they speak English, answered "No." That was about all they did know of English. The Judge remarked, "You said 'No' when I asked whether you could speak English. Now you shall sit through the case, whether you understand it or not." Here you have these County Court Judges in Wales and England who cannot refuse to have a case tried by a jury if the debt is above £5, yet you actually say that they can send men to prison for constructive assault without giving them the option of a jury. Now, who are the others? The County Magistrates, in whom I said the other day I have little confidence. I do not believe in Magistrates who are appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, because in almost every case these Lord Lieutenants are Peers, and it is practically giving the right to the House of Peers to select the judges of the country, and to give those judges power and authority to send men to prison. We know perfectly well that the great majority of the Magistrates are Conservative. Those who are not are Moderate Liberals, which to my mind is almost as bad as being a Conservative. There are hardly any Radicals amongst them, whilst in Wales the vast mass of the population—thank God!—are good and stalwart Radicals. What is asked by the Welsh? I am astonished at their moderation, and if this clause passes I shall move an Amendment to enlarge its scope. The Welsh simply ask that from two of these Magistrates there shall be an appeal to five or six—that if in a Court of Summary Jurisdiction a defendant be convicted, he shall have the right to appeal to Quarter Sessions. Do you know—the House does know perfectly well—that if a liquor trafficker is deprived of his licence by a certain number of Magistrates he may go to a Superior Court, and has a right to appeal. Thus you give this liquor trafficker a right to appeal, which you refuse to honest, conscientious Non-conformists. An hon. Friend said to me just now, "There would be right to a jury;" but that is not so for appeals from Magistrates to Quarter Sessions. There is no jury. It is an appeal from Magistrates to Magistrates, and that is why I say that the Welsh are exceedingly moderate, and why, if this clause passes, I shall move the insertion of some words which will give the right to appeal not only to the Magistrates at Quarter Sessions, but, if desired by the defendant, to a jury. What is the sole reason we are told for this refusal? It is that it is a political question. What are the County Court Judges? I have shown what they are. They are essentially political appointments. What are the Magistrates? They are also essentially political appointments. We know that in England the magistracy in the counties has been stuffed with Conservatives. We know perfectly well that the Liberals do not have their fair share in the magistracy. We know, moreover, that the magistrates are taken from a particular class—from the landowners of this country. We know that there is the greatest antagonism in Wales between the landowners and the other classes of the community—that the landowners belong to one Church and are in the main Conservative, and that the people are in the main Radicals. There is the strongest political and religious antagonism, and I really can only call it effrontery in Her Majesty's Ministers not to give the right to a trial before a jury of 12 men honestly chosen from the community. Because the matter is a political one they place it in the hands of the County Court Judges, who are politically opposed to those they have to try. You might just as well tell me that you placed the trial of political offences in Ireland in the hands of Resident Magistrates because they have no politics. We know that would be pure nonsense. We know also that when 12 men, good and true, are sworn, they will give a just decision. I shall always support any proposal which has for its object an enlargement of the powers of juries. We now only ask that the Welsh shall be tried by their peers. It is an injustice to hand them over to the Magistrates as you propose, but I am not surprised at that, for I never knew you to bring in a single Bill which was not based upon injustice.

*(10.35.) MR. W. P. MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I think we have a right to expect from the Attorney General something in the shape of consistent legislation. But his present attitude is altogether inconsistent. We are to be allowed the assistance of a jury in Wales in small matters, but in cases in which the liberty of the Welsh subject is at stake no jury is to assist the County Court Judge in arriving at a right and proper conclusion. I thought that trial by jury was so appreciated in this country as to be adopted on all conceivable occasions, but in the case of tithe disputes we are to have the 48th section of the County Court Act applied to us in order to punish those who may obstruct the bailiff in the execution of his duty. The powers given under this section have prevailed for many a year, but hitherto have only been enforced in such a case as that in which a bailiff has been obstructed in collecting a debt due upon an unmistakable contract—a debt to which no sentiment attached. But this is a totally different matter to that which we are now considering. The sentiment of feelings of the Welsh people are outraged by the collection of tithes for the benefit and maintenance of a Church in which they never worship. We believe that if this clause is carried the County Court Judges will have to enforce it so often that the ordinary business of their Courts will have to be neglected. Every man who expresses an opinion adverse to a learned County Court Judge will be liable to be tried for contempt. That is a phase of the question on which I should like to say a few words. It has been said by some of our most eminent lawyers that a Judge ought not to be the tribunal to judge whether or not contempt has been committed in his Court. It does seem to be an anomaly that if a witness misbehaves himself in Court the Judge should be called upon to decide upon the question which has arisen between the witness and himself. But this is a thing you are now proposing to perpetuate by Act of Parliament, and notwithstanding the absurdity of giving a jury in cases in which the claim may only be 5s., you will not give a man the same privilege when his liberty is at stake. In the colonies, where I have lived for over 20 years, such a Bill as this would be looked upon as a most patchy piece of legislation. The Attorney General, who is in part responsible for it, may be a distinguished lawyer, but he certainly is not a consistent statesman.

(10.41.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I cannot but think that my hon. Friends near me are a little unreasonable in asking the Government to agree to this Amendment. The object of the Government in this Bill is to make the collection of tithe easier for the tithe owner in Wales, and if this Amendment is carried the existing state of things will continue. We wish the present state of things to continue, but the Government, from their own point of view, are right in not accepting the Amendment, because if it were passed they would not effect their object. Indeed, as an independent English Member of Parliament, I think they would be acting very stupidly if they consented to this operative clause in their Bill being amended in this direction. I repeat that I want the present state of things to continue, but I will not join in this appeal to the Government. We know that they mean to make the collection of tithe easy for the tithe owners in Wales, and if they do not pass the clause in its present shape they will not effect their object. The right hon. Gentleman who has been so willing to give way in other matters is strong in resisting this. He says he will not consent to the Court official being put in a worse position when collecting tithe than he is when performing his other duties. Very well, I do not know that he is far out from his point of view. But he also says there are no complaints as to the action of the County Court Judges under this 48th section of the County Court Act. How does he know that? I know of cases in many districts in which cause for grave complaint has been given.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Will the hon. Member excuse me? My argument was this: That in 1888 the County Court Procedure Act was revised, and if there had been any real complaint at that time it surely would have been raised by Amendments. At any rate, it would have found utterance in the speeches of some of the hon. Members who have spoken in this Debate.

MR. STOREY: My point is this: The cases of complaint are at present individual, and do not arouse any general feeling. But when this Act becomes law you will create a vast body of cases, which will give rise to a widespread feeling. I will ask the Government, in two or three sentences, to consider what they are going to do. They are going, in the first place, to leave the County Court Judge uncontrolled to deal with cases of contempt of Court and resistance to the law. In political cases that is a dangerous course, and has always ended in mischief and the repeal of the evil law. I am not going to press the Government to alter their position. They must carry out their bargain with the Welsh clergy, although the result may be much friction, trouble, annoyance, and agitation. In the next place, they are going to refuse to the man who comes before the Magistrates the right of appeal. My hon. Friend who last spoke said this was merely an appeal from two Magistrates to five or six Magistrates. But it is more than that; it is an appeal from Magistrates living on the spot, and personally interested, perhaps, in the social conflict, to a wider body of Magistrates not specially interested in the case. How the Government can honestly or decently refuse that I cannot imagine. They are, no doubt, paying to the parsons the price agreed upon for their support; but this clause will lead to an agitation which will probably terminate, first the Government, and then this Bill.

(10.50.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I am induced by pure Conservative instincts to say a few words in support of the Amendment of my hon. Friend. We in this country have been educated in the belief that the right of trial by jury is essentially the prerogative and privilege of British citizens. But this measure only carries out the policy the Government have been systematically pursuing, first in Ireland and now in this country, for the purpose of destroying the right of trial by jury. That right has gone in Ireland, and unless we make a stand now we shall lose it in England. This clause shows how exceedingly infectious is the disease of coercion. Having once seized upon the mind of the Government who allowed it to become rampant in Ireland, it is now crossing St. George's Channel, and will spread with great virulence over England. There is another reason why I think that it is our bounden duty to insist on passing this Amendment, and that is a reason from a Radical standpoint. I am anxious to see the system of trial by jury vastly extended by legislation. Unfortunately, during the past quarter of a century it has been considerably reduced. Numerous offences have been classified under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts; and offenders under those Acts cannot now be tried by their peers, but they are tried before men who, if not their hereditary enemies, cannot, at any rate, be said to be strongly biased in their favour. Like the Member for Northampton, I have absolutely no confidence in the Magistrates. In cases where politics are at stake it is impossible for a poor man to get justice at the hands of the landlord and Clerical class, who are placed on the Bench by those political partisans—the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Lieutenant. Why cannot the Government give fair play to poor men? They have deliberately set up the plea that in consequence of political bias it is desirable these cases should be withdrawn from a jury and placed entirely in the hands of the Magistrates. But it is entirely for that reason that I support the Amendment, because we know how biased are the Magistrates. If you look at the whole machinery for the administration of justice in this country it becomes apparent that from the fountain head down to the petty Magistrate every one engaged in dispensing justice is out of sympathy with the poorer classes. There are, indeed, in this House very few men who can be said to be in direct sympathy with the class to whom I am referring—the rustic labourers of this country. The First Lord of the Treasury gave expression yesterday to a sentiment which is peculiarly applicable to the present case. He pleaded in favour of respect being shown to prejudice, even if the prejudice is unreasonable. You have conscientious religious prejudice in connection with the payment of tithe, and if the plea of the right hon. Gentleman in favour of respect to the insane, foolish, and unreasonable prejudice of certain persons in England is to hold good, surely we have a right to insist that respect should be had to prejudice in the matter of paying tithe to an alien Church. If you are not going to take into account such deeply-rooted feeling as the unanimous evidence of the Representatives of Wales has made abundantly clear during this Debate, the least you can do is to introduce in some form or another a conscience clause, whereby the conscientious and religious prejudices of the people of Wales may be respected. It has been pointed out that in many cases County Court Judges in Wales are men who do not possess the necessary qualification for the position. In more than one case County Court Judges in Wales have shown themselves unfit for their positions, not merely by their ignorance of the language of the majority of the people amongst whom they are placed, but by wilfully insulting the character of the people by openly declaring that one cannot trust a Welsh jury: that it is impossible to find a Welsh jury that will not be guilty of perjury. [Mr. J. R. KELLY: Name.] No, I will not give names, because I have no wish to rake up old stories. But the facts are within my recollection, and I have a right to rely upon them. I do not go so far as to say that the County Court Judges were in such cases to be visited with very strong censure, because being ignorant of the language of the people whom they thus condemned they were probably the victims of a wrong impression. I shall support the Amendment before the House. I conceive that as the right of trial by jury is threatened by the action of the Government it is our duty as Englishmen to defend our privilege and rights against any attack even from the Conservative side of the House.

(11.5.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): This is more or less an exclusively Welsh Amendment, and, therefore, it seems to me one on which English Members can pronounce an opinion of an impartial character. The discussion this evening, not only on this Bill, but also on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Mr. J. Lowther), has tended very strongly in the direction of showing the necessity for a Court of Appeal. The gist of this Amendment is that, in some form or another, the light of public opinion should be brought to bear upon the decisions at which the County Court Judges may arrive with regard to the disputes that may occur between tithe owners and tithepayers in Wales. There is no serious intention of disputing the impartiality of the County Court Judges in Wales; but instances have been adduced in which the decisions arrived at have not been, in the eyes of the people of the Principality, of a satisfactory nature. It occurs to me to be a matter of prime necessity that, whatever be the decision arrived at, it should have the complete approval of the persons mainly interested, and that is the reason why I support the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The complaints urged in this country against County Court Judges have related rather to matters of detail, such as unpunctuality or want of technical knowledge; but in Wales the complaints are of a more grave character, and on that ground I think it is necessary there should be an appeal against the decisions the Welsh County Court Judges arrive at.

(11.10.) The House divided:—Ayes 136; Noes 163.—(Div. List, No. 35.)

*(11.25.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I beg to move the clause standing in my name respecting the limitation of penalties. I think this clause is more important even than that on which the House has just divided, dealing as it does with the power of the County Court to inflict imprisonment under the new procedure respecting the collection of tithe. There was some discussion on the other stages of the Bill as to the reasons for which imprisonment might be inflicted. It has already been conceded by the Government that there shall be no imprisonment merely for non-payment, and I think we are entitled to hear what are the cases in which a County Court can impose a penalty by way of imprisonment. The chief object of the Bill is to shift the liability for the payment of tithe from the occupier to the owner. That being so, the House ought to take care that there shall be no greater power of imprisonment than there is under the present process. I propose that the cases in which imprisonment can be imposed shall be limited to those specified in Section 48 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

The first is that of an assault upon the County Court bailiff. There is no one on this side of the House who will argue that a person who assaults a bailiff should not be amenable to justice. The other case is that of rescue. Rescue savours of contempt, and I believe such a case cannot arise until the goods have been actually distrained upon. The Attorney General said in Committee that if a bailiff was sent to execute the order of the Court and the tithepayer barred his house or was guilty of violence he was amenable to the ordinary law. I want to know to what ordinary law the tithepayer is now amenable if he bars his house? Moreover, the President of the Board of Trade has said to-night, supposing a bailiff is insulted or obstructed, must not the offender be made amenable? But is he going to enable a County Court Judge to inflict imprisonment under the pretext of contempt of Court on a person who merely insults a bailiff? What is an insult to a bailiff? My hon. Friend near me suggests that merely holding a fist up may be construed into an insult. The singing of a song in which the hero of the anti-tithe war has prominent mention may be considered an insult. What is obstruction? A bailiff going to levy distraint may find a barn-door locked against him. Is the right hon. Gentleman going to allow the imposition of the penalty of imprisonment for offences which may be construed by the Court to mean anything or everything? For what purpose is the Government going to employ the power of imprisonment in the County Court? Is it to compel the people to contribute towards the support of an alien Church? I am not quite sure that the next thing will not be the power of imprisonment to enforce attendance at church. Who are the people who have been agitating for this Bill? The Bishops—I will call them the lobbying Bishops—of the Principality. Are these people who have the spiritual care of the Principality—these pure-minded gentlemen in lawn sleeves—are these the people to impose imprisonment on honest men for these so-called offences? We take credit for being a most peaceable and law-abiding people. My hon. and eloquent Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Abrahams) has referred to the frequent presentation of white gloves at Welsh Assizes. If the Government are really going to oppose this clause and to permit extensive powers of imprisonment it will be a criminal act on their part, because it may goad the people of the Principality into acts of criminality. Do not let the Government imagine that to inflict imprisonment on the people will put down the agitation against the Church. There is sufficient spirit left in the people of Wales to induce them to go to gaol in support of their conscientious convictions. I really make an appeal to the supporters of the Church, the lovers of the Church on the other side of the House. We have no quarrel with the Church as a Church, and you love it as we do our Nonconformity, but I say if you wish to destroy altogether the influence of the Church of England in the Principality, a certain way to do it is to inflict imprisonment upon Nonconformists under this Bill. There is a claim made that the old Mother Church is getting back to its large and accommodating bosom many people who left it in days gone by. You are anxious to keep up the Establishment. Very well. We do not agree on this point. We think it would be better all round if the Establishment came to an end. But do you think your proposals will support the Establishment? The effect of the first imprisonment under this new tithe measure upon the connection between Church and State will be like the effect of dynamite exploded under a building. Your anxiety is to restore the people to the bosom of the Church. Is this the way to do it? You have, by your anti-national conduct, lost hold of the people. Broadly speaking, your churches and your cathedrals in the Principality are empty. You have in past times repelled the people and driven them to build chapels of their own. Let me tell the House a little personal experience to illustrate my point. On one occasion last year I visited Bangor Cathedral. It was a festival day of the Church of England. The Dean was there, two or three Canons, major and minor, were there, and the whole of the choir in attendance. But to whom, and for whom, was all this ministering? The congregation consisted of eight persons—five old women and two men besides myself—who were visitors. This was on a festival of the Church, and I say then in a general sense your Cathedrals are empty. Now, I have a hint from the Government that they cannot accept this clause, probably because it does not go far enough, and I make an offer to them which they may accept. They say that if the clause is accepted then the County Court will not have power of protecting its own dignity. Now, the 162nd section of the County Court Act has provided for committals for contempt in specified cases. They include wilful insult to the Judge, or the jury, or witnesses, the Registrar, bailiff, or any officer in Court, or wilfully obstructing such officer in going from or returning to the Court. I am willing to extend my clause in such a way as to give the Judge power to commit for contempt in the case of wilful insult offered in Court to the Judge, officer of the Court, or witness, but cannot accede to any proposal to give the Judge power to committal for an insult offered to an officer of the Court or witness in going to or coming from the Court, because it might be held that when an officer is despatched from the County Court office with a writ of distrain in his pocket against the goods of some honest Nonconformist he was on his way to or from the Court until he returned. Subject to this qualification, I will extend the clause to cases within the 162nd section of the County Court Act. The Government may expect considerable discussion upon this clause; and if they are not prepared to decide upon this offer now, I hope they will adjourn the Debate now to give themselves an opportunity of considering it. I can assure them this is a matter of the greatest importance to the Bill and to the Church, and in it we take the deepest interest.

New Clause (Limitation of Penalties),—(Mr. S. T. Evans),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(11.40.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I am extremely sorry the House should have listened to the speech we have just heard. The House knows perfectly well that, so far as I was entitled to do so, I ventured to pay tribute to the able and moderate way in which the hon. Member has conducted discussion throughout the proceedings upon this Bill, and I deeply regret that what I have previously said should be in any way contrary to the spirit in which the hon. Gentleman has now addressed the House. Speeches from hon. Gentlemen opposite have professed a desire for peace in the Principality, and an anxiety to smooth the working of this Act, but anything less calculated to assist toward that end than the speech we have just heard it is difficult to imagine. This is a question of what we may call an ordinary legal proceeding, and yet we are told that if the Government maintain the line which, as the hon. Member knows from previous discussions they are bound to maintain, they will be guilty of a criminal action, and will goad the people into acts of criminality. We all know perfectly well what that means. When the hon. Member uses this language, ignorant people who do not understand the rights and wrongs of the question as he does will appeal to such statements and such language as justification for acts that he himself admits will bring them within the Criminal Law. It is not possible for us to accept this clause for reasons which I am sorry to say I have explained on three occasions. The hon. Gentleman has been good enough to support his argument for the clause by reference to what I have said. I do not know from what he was quoting.

MR. S. T. EVANS*: From Hansard.

SIR R. WEBSTER*: What I said was if a man barred his house and with violence prevented a bailiff from doing his duty—

MR. S. T. EVANS*: No, the words are "if he bars his house and prevents a bailiff from doing his duty."

SIR R. WEBSTER*: If those are the words I used, and if they are so reported, I suppose I did, then I went too far. I ought not to have separated the act of violence from the barring of the house. The simple act of a man barring his door would certainly not be sufficient to justify arrest. No doubt I spoke as I am reported to have spoken, but I spoke carelessly. I am glad to explain that the idea in my mind was obstruction coupled with violence. If any statement of mine has induced hon. Members to think there is danger of arrest from the simple act of barring the door I unreservedly withdraw it, and explain that I meant obstruction coupled with violence. Now, what are the objections to this clause? My first objection is a serious one. The hon. Member has, it is true, proposed to extend this saving clause, this limitation clause, over certain parts of Section 162 of the County Court Act. That section protects the Registrar, bailiffs, and officers of the Court from insult. It is a strong argument against the clause as it stands, and against the limit of extension, that the hon. Member is willing to give up certain offences under that Section 162, but he would restrict that section without the shadow of reason and only with the suggestion that there is something different in connection with these proceedings as compared with others. Except that there is not a shadow of justification for the clause. Now in a sentence let me repeat what I have already said, but which has not received the slightest notice from hon. Members. These proceedings take place on the hypothesis in the Bill that the defendant who owes the tithe has been heard in Court, that he has had an opportunity of making his defence if he has any to make, and then, judgment being given, that judgment has the force of law. In the name of all that is fair, in the name of common sense, when proceedings have arrived thus far, what ground is there for making the distinction suggested? We do not know—I do not know—of any case where it would be necessary to put in a saving clause; but I absolutely decline to put in a saving clause, and for this reason: that it would indicate that cases in which the County Court Judge might impose penalties for non-compliance with the orders of the Court, were outside the cases mentioned in the County Court Act, and outside the well-known jurisdiction of the County Court. If there be a case in which for a violent act or a disturbance of order, or for that which is in fact a criminal offence, County Court Justices have now jurisdiction, then the Court will get no more by virtue of this Bill, and it would be wrong to impose a saving clause, a limitation or powers previously held. Earlier in the evening we heard the hon. Member for Northampton tell us of his extensive knowledge of law.

MR. LABOUCHÈRE: Excuse me. I said, speaking of County Court Judges, that they knew less of law even than I did. That was not claiming much knowledge.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I was not referring to that. I was referring to a passage in which the hon. Member laid down certain principles when he said that an old cripple, inadvertently raising his stick, might constructively be held guilty of an assault, and so might a man for the clenching of his fist. Well, I hope the hon. Member will take better advice before he again ventures to express a legal opinion in the House. He will not find a lawyer of the most limited experience to endorse such a contention as he has put forward. There is one point which I think supporters of this Amendment have completely overlooked. Is not the Court to have control over its own receiver? It is essential that he should be under the control of the Court, and it may be possible that a receiver may have to be punished.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: May I be permitted to point out that Sub-section 3 of Section 2 deals with that.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Member must pardon me. I am arguing against the clause he proposes to insert, and this clause runs—

I am not arguing for the Bill as it stands—I am arguing against the clause. I have had, not from my own fault, to repeat arguments I have used against this contention on several occasions. I have listened to almost the whole of this Debate to-night, and I have absolutely heard nothing new in support of this contention. Hon. Members who have addressed the House to-night have admitted that this question has to some extent been discussed on previous clauses. I have stated my objections.

It is not possible to make the concession hon. Members wish, and for the House to insert the clause now would be for the House to stultify itself. It would be drawing a distinction between the orders of the Court on the admission of a suggestion that the Bill will be a temptation to criminality that does not arise. I do not believe any such wicked ideas will arise among the Welsh people, and the reading of history does not lead us to such a conclusion. I agree that the law-abiding character of the Welsh people is matter for gratification, and that there is less crime in Wales than in other parts of the Kingdom, but that goes against the clause and not in favour of it. This goading to criminality argument is one I am sure the House will not accept, and I ask the House to reject the clause.

(11.41.) SIR W. HARCOURT Anything more misplaced or unjustifiable than the lecture my hon. Friend has had from the Attorney General I have never heard in this House. We have, I think, all welcomed the ability, the temper, the moderation my hon. Friend has displayed through these discussions, and I do not think any man in so short a time has established so great a claim upon the esteem of the House of Commons. In the course of this Debate we have been compelled to acknowledge the conciliatory disposition of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade; but we have no such acknowledgment to make to the Attorney General. Many Amendments have been grafted upon the Bill. Every one has been opposed by the Attorney General, and has afterwards been accepted by the President of the Board of Trade. The Attorney General has acted in a spirit of irritation and exasperation, and his speech is not calculated to do good to the Bill either in the House or in the country. I have never witnessed more unreasonable action than that of refusing to accept the Amendment before the House. The Attorney General admits that no case which ought to be included would be excluded by the Amendment, and yet refuses the Amendment. Such action shows that the Government are now addressing themselves to the discussion in a spirit with which we have not been treated before, except from the Attorney General. I protest against the speech of the hon. Gentleman, and against his conclusion, as tending to lead to exasperation in the administration of the Bill.

*(11.58.) MR. ABEL THOMAS (Carmarthen, E.): I venture to deny the assertion that the cases under this Bill are to be classed with ordinary County Court cases. These tithe cases never have been, and never will be, ordinary cases in any sense. The hon. and learned Gentleman says the Bill will not come into operation until judgment is given in the County Court; but that makes no difference to the freehold occupier in Wales, who will refuse to pay tithe. So far as he is concerned, the Bill comes into operation after the hearing and judgment, and when the judgment is proceeded upon by the bailiff being put in possession.

It being midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

PHYSICAL EDUCATION IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS
BILL. [H.L.]

A Bill for the promotion of physical education in Elementary Schools—Was presented by the Lord Chaworth (E. Meath): read 1st: and to be printed. (No. 30.)

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN BILL.

[H.L.] (No. 18.)

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."

LORD MORRIS: My Lords, before we go into Committee I take the liberty of trespassing upon the time of the House. This is a Bill which anybody who reads it must see interferes with the ordinary parental right, a right which is not only recognised by the Common Law, but is founded upon the law of nature. However, from facts which have been brought before the House, as well as from a general consensus of opinion as I understand upon the subject, it is admitted that there is an evil which should be remedied, and that that right of parents should be controlled in consequence of its having been so much abused in many ways, upon which I do not intend to enter into detail. Those reasons were put forward very strongly upon the occasion upon which this Bill was sent to the Standing Committee last year. I would only suggest to your Lordships that the Common Law right of parents to the custody and control of their children should be interfered with only so far as it is found to be absolutely necessary; and, as I understood the remarks of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, he said he would bring in a short Bill which would meet that admitted evil. My noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Herschell) said that what was wanted was some power by which parents who were not proper persons to be entrusted with the care and keeping of their children should be dealt with, that some power should be vested in the Judges of the Court to refuse to deliver up children to parents who have proved themselves unfit to have the guardianship of their children. To that extent I agree, and I have no objection to the Bill. But the Bill, in my opinion, goes much further, and in a few minutes, by reference to its provisions, I shall explain why I think it goes much further. The Bill of the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack is substantially comprised in the 1st clause as it has come before the Standing Committee. That, in my opinion, until I hear something to alter it, meets the admitted evil, because it provides that if the Court "Is of opinion that the parent has abandoned or deserted the child, or that he has otherwise so conducted himself that the Court should refuse to enforce his right to the custody of the child, the Court may in its discretion decline to issue the writ or make the order."

That appears to me to entirely cover the admitted evil by providing the power which the noble and learned Lord opposite said should be vested in the Court, not to deliver up a child to a parent who has disintitiled himself to the custody of the child. But in the Standing Committee two other clauses were added to the Bill as it was introduced by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. One of those clauses has no connection with the subject except in so far as it may throw a difficulty by the imposition of a penalty in the way of a parent who otherwise has established, as he is entitled to show that he has a right to the custody of his child. Clause 2 proceeds upon the hypothesis that the Court has made an order, or is about to make an order, for the restoration of his child to a father who is otherwise properly entitled to its custody. The clause provides that—

"If at the time of the application for a writ or order for the production of the child, the child is being brought up by another person, or is boarded out by the Guardians of a poor law union, the Court may in its discretion if it orders the child to be given up to the parent

—which can only be if the Court thinks the parent a proper person to have the custody—

"further order that the parent shall pay to such person, or to the Guardians of such poor law union, the whole of the costs properly incurred in bringing up the child, or such portion thereof as shall seem to the Court to be just and reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances of the case.

The admitted evil already met by the non-delivery of a child to an unfit father does not require that clause. That is a clause introduced in order to throw a difficulty and to inflict a penalty, or it is an attempt to create a contract between a parent otherwise properly entitled to the custody of his child, and somebody who goes here under the name of "another person." This is really an attempt to extend the law of contract. If a person asks another to visit him at his house he cannot send in to his guest a bill when he goes away for the cost of his entertainment. As the old rule says, "That which was begun in courtesy cannot end in contract;" but here, according to this clause, what is begun in charity is to end in contract, and the person who is supposed to have been doing a good charitable action is to get back all his expenditure. This clause appears to me to be entirely unconnected with the purview of the Bill. It is a clause under the guise of protecting children from injury at the hands of improper and unfit parents to enable individuals and institutions supposed to have been acting from charitable and philanthropic motives to recover that which they could not recover by any process known to the law because there is no liability under such circumstances. Then the 3rd clause is either unnecessary or mischievous, or probably both. As I have said, as the 1st clause entirely covers the admitted evil and does what is required, what is the necessity for another clause? The object of the Bill, as enacted by the 1st section, is to give to the Court a discretionary power, because it directs that the Court shall, if it thinks fit, refuse to enforce the right of the parent; but this clause gives no power to the Court; on the contrary, it withdraws all power from the Court, and makes the office of the Judge to a great extent merely ministerial, for it provides that

"Where a parent has abandoned or deserted his child or allowed his child to be brought up by another person at that person's expense for such a length of time and under such circumstances as to satisfy the Court that the parent was unmindful of his parental duties," the Court shall not order that child to be delivered up to the parent. Now, when the Court comes to the conclusion that the parent has been unmindful of his parental duties, whatever that may mean, on the hypothesis—for I am assuming that under the clause he is a fit and proper person, otherwise he would not be entitled to get the custody of his child—then what is the Court to do? The Court has no discretion. It shall not make an order for delivery of the child to the parent unless it is satisfied, that is, unless he is able to show that it is for the welfare of the child that he should have the guardianship. I suppose that he can benefit the child in some way in a material point of view in the world; that it would be actually a benefit to the child to be taken from the custody in which it is. That clause appears to me to be of a most dangerous character, going far beyond the evil which is complained of, or any reason which has been brought forward for altering the Common Law of the land. It does appear to me that when your Lordships are asked to interfere with a right of this sort, which is coeval with our very law, you should be very cautious in going beyond the absolute necessity of the case. If I have demonstrated, as I venture to think I have, that the necessity of the case is met by Clause 1, there is no necessity for Clause 2 (and I do not see that Clause 2 has any connection with the subject except indirectly), and Clause 3 goes far beyond it. The noble and learned Lord opposite is reported to have said, on the Second Reading of the Bill, that the only difficulty which arises in the matter is the religious difficulty; but I am not referring to anything connected with the religious aspect of the matter. I object to Clauses 2 and 3 as being out of the purview of the Bill and beyond the scope of Clause 1, which embodies and carries out the intention, and which would have amply met the evil which is admitted to exist.

LORD THRING: My Lords, I desire to say a few words in answer to the noble and learned Lord who has just spoken. I confess I cannot understand his fastidiousness about the feelings of such parents as the Bill deals with, and their Common Law right of parental control. What have we to deal with here? We have to deal with the control of drunken fathers and profligate mothers over children who have been saved from misery, degradation, and ruin, and have been properly brought up by charitable persons or institutions. What possible necessity can there be that such parents should exercise any control whatever? The noble and learned Lord says that the costs are intended to be a penalty. No doubt they are so intended. They are intended to be a penalty, and it is a just penalty too. Is it right or fair that a man should desert his child, abandon it in the streets, leave it to be brought up by other persons, and then come to the Court and say, "I am entitled by my parental right to the custody; give me back that child?" The least he can do, the very smallest measure by which he can attempt to atone for his wickedness, wickedness which might have had terrible consequences, is that he should be willing to pay something towards the cost of the maintenance and bringing up of his rescued child. Is it right or just, when an institution supported by charity, which renders the greatest possible service to the community in saving these children, has been for years at the cost and trouble of bringing them up that drunken and profligate parents are to be allowed to come and take them without paying even one penny towards their maintenance? If you like to call it a penalty, a penalty let it be; but I think it is one of the most righteous, one of the justest penalties that could be inflicted. So far as to Clause 2. Then, with regard to Clause 3, my noble and learned Friend says it is useless and against the Common Law. I do not think it is against the law. As the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has said, this is simply a clause inserted to give the children of the poor the same benefit as that now possessed by the children of the rich. I have only to make a child a ward in Chancery to-morrow, and everybody knows that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack will, in his character of Lord Chancellor, take care that that child shall not be delivered up to a parent who, in the language of this Bill, "has shown that he has been unmindful of his parental duties." This is not an entirely novel interference with parental rights of control. That interference took place in Shelley's case, and in innumerable other cases which have occurred in the Court of Chancery, in which the reason why the child was not given up was not always that the parent was profligate or dissolute, but simply that it was better for the welfare of the child that it should be removed from the custody of the parent. And what does this Bill do? It gives to the poorer children the same protection as that extended to the children of the rich—it gives to the institutions and noble people who are working for these children, claiming through the children themselves the same privileges as would be possessed if there were money settled upon them, and they were made wards of the Court of Chancery. It is out of my power to conceive how any noble Lord in this House should oppose the Bill as being opposed to the Common Law; for, as I have shown, it is strictly in accordance with the law in affording to children much needed protection, without which all efforts to save them may at any time be thrown away.

*LORD NORTON: My Lords: I cannot help thinking that if the noble Lord beside me (Lord Morris) has been too fastidious about this Bill as an interference with the right of parental control given by the Common Law, the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down goes as much too far in the other direction. He laughed at the fastidiousness of my noble Friend with regard to parental rights, upon the assumption that all the parents dealt with in the Bill are drunken. When parents so claim their children it will be the duty of the Court to distinguish between, honest, if unfortunate, parents, and those who are not fit to have the custody of their children; and if the Judge is to look upon all these parents as drunken and profligate persons, he has already forestalled his conclusion, and must regard this Bill as a measure simply for preventing such children ever getting back into the hands of their parents. I confess myself that I look with the greatest suspicion upon any Bill of this sort, because I think it is too much the tendency at the present time to let the State undertake private and parental responsibilities; at the same time, I know very well and fully admit the necessity for the protection which it is the main object of the Bill to afford. It not infrequently happens that a child who has been brought up carefully in an industrial school, or some other public institution, and trained to a trade is taken back by the parents, and introduced again into a vicious life, and thus all the care and public money expended on the child has been thrown away. But the check against such an evil must be imposed in the most guarded manner, and I think the Bill should not go an inch further than is absolutely necessary in interfering with parental responsibility and control. I think we ought to go into Committee, as we are all agreed upon the necessity for such a Bill, and the only question is as to the form in which it shall be passed.

*THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE: My Lords, I should like to say a few words before the subject drops. It strikes me that the difference which arises between the noble and learned Lord who spoke first and the noble Lords who followed him depends upon an article; one seems to have taken the definite article and the other the indefinite article. All the difficulties which have been suggested by the noble Lords who have spoken appear to me to rest upon the apparent reading of "a" instead of "the" in Clause 2. That clause runs thus—

"If at the time of the application for a writ or order for the production of the child"—not "any" child, but "the" child. "The" is interpreted and defined by Clause 1. The fact there referred to of the child having been deserted by worthless parents, who have shown themselves to be unfit to have the custody of the child, applies to Clause 2, as I understand it; and, therefore, all that has been said about courtesy not being capable of ending in contract appears to be disposed of by those words. Surely there can be no question of courtesy whatever here; it is a case of the most discourteous possible kind, if the term be permissible in such connection, namely, the abandonment and unkind treatment of the child. Now, if my view is right, that that idea runs through the whole of it, we have nothing to do with the possibility of injustice towards respectable parents, or with want of consideration for their parental rights. This I apprehend, and I shall be corrected if I am wrong, is a Bill which distinctly from end to end deals with parents who have proved themselves to be unworthy of being guardians of their own children; and if that is borne in mind, I venture to think the objections raised against the Bill altogether fall to the ground.

THE EARL OF MEATH: The noble and learned Lord on the other side of the House who is a distinguished countryman of mine has always shown himself a great supporter of law and order, and I have looked up to him as one who has always supported the honest and the just and the upright man in his own country, while his hand was always found raised against the dishonest and the cruel and the evil-doers. I cannot understand why the noble Lord should, upon this particular occasion, have accepted, as it were, a brief from the drunken and disreputable parents, because it is altogether contrary to his usual practice, and I earnestly hope your Lordships will give no support to the objections he has raised. But he goes on to say, that in taking charge of these children the people who do so are acting exactly as the host does who invites you or I to his house, and who would have no right to send us in a bill because we are thus entertained. I perfectly agree with the noble and learned Lord if that were the case, but I do not think it is the case as regards these children. As a rule, the class of children the Bill is intended to deal with are children who have been thrown helpless on the streets, and wickedly deserted by their parents, and who are taken by the hand by benevolent persons or by charitable institutions; and I see no hardship whatever in making such parents, where it is possible to do so, refund to those benevolent individuals or charitable institutions at least a portion of the money that has been expended on the care and training of their children. If all parents were honest and just, kindly and true, towards their children, there would, of course, be no reason for bringing in a Bill of this sort; but unfortunately we, as legislators, have to look at the world as it is. We all know that there is a section of the population, numerically large, though comparatively perhaps but a small section, who as parents do neglect their children. It is well known to all your Lordships that there is a certain number of parents who treat their children eruelly, neglect and desert them. I was very pleased to hear from my noble Friend (Lord Norton) that he agrees in the necessity for the measure, in so far as Industrial Schools are concerned. He acknowledged that children are taken from Industrial Schools by worthless parents, and in many cases relapse into vice. I know that to be the fact. I was told a short time since by the manager of one of these schools that no fewer than one-fourth of the children who go back to their parents relapse; whereas only 1 in 20 relapse of those who are placed out by the Industrial Schools, and are taken care of. I need not point out how great the difference is between one-fourth and one-twentieth. I hope, as the noble Lord is himself acquainted with the fact that in the case of Industrial Schools there is an evil to be remedied, he will not oppose the Bill which the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has brought in for that purpose. It has been very truly said that if we do not take care to form these children the world will deform them. If we do not take them up they will be disfigured and degraded; the image of God which is in them will be obscured, and perhaps at last extinguished. For my own part, I feel deeply indebted to the Lord Chancellor for bringing in the Bill, and I hope it will be passed just as it stands. It has been thoroughly sifted by a Committee, comprising some of the most eminent Members of your Lordships' House, and the only reason why it did not pass the other House last Session was because of the unfortunate congestion of business in that Assembly. I trust, for the sake of the neglected children, that the Bill passing your Lordships' House, as I hope it will, at such an early date as this, will now become part of the law of the United Kingdom.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I think there has been some misapprehension as to the effect of this Bill. The 1st clause simply enables the Court, where a parent has deserted his child or abandoned it, or shown that he has been careless of its welfare, to refuse to give it up to him, unless satisfied that the circumstances have become such that he ought to have it. Then, all the 3rd clause does is to provide that he should show those circumstances. If it is shown to the Court that the parent has abandoned or deserted his child, or allowed his child to be brought up by another person at that person's expense under such circumstances as to satisfy the Court that he has been unmindful of his parental duties, an order shall not be made for the delivery of the child to him, unless he satisfies the Court that he is a fit person. So that where a parent applies for the custody of a child which has been taken care of by others, Clause 3 only throws upon him the onus of proving that he is fit to be entrusted with the care of it. Surely there is nothing unreasonable in empowering the Court to say to a man who has behaved in that way, "Before the Court is forced to give you the custody of the child you shall show that you are a fit person to have it."

On Question, agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I propose to amend Clause 1 for a reason which I will explain. The mode in which the Bill was moulded in Committee has led to the putting together of a number of provisions in a way which may possibly be misunderstood. I am not quite certain that I entirely agree with the criticism that has been made in regard to what I may compendiously call the "conscience clause," which at present forms part of Clause 1. It has been suggested that it would be there so limited in its operation that it would only apply to Clause 1, so that in the construction of the clauses as they stand, if any case should arise under, I will say, Clause 3, this proviso coming under Clause 1 might be considered to be limited to that clause, and not to extend to the other clauses of the Bill. As I have said, I am not altogether convinced that that is the true construction which should be placed upon the 1st clause; but it appears to me, if there is the least doubt about it in the mind of the noble Lord, it had better be swept away. It is very easy to alter the clause for that purpose. What I propose to do is to let Clause 1 come to an end at line 11 at the words "the Court may in its discretion decline to issue the writ or make the order," leaving out the rest of the clause. I then propose to put in the conscience proviso as a separate and independent clause at the end of the Bill. Under those altered circumstances I think no one can doubt that that clause will have its full operation upon every class in the Bill.

LORD NORTON: There is no definition of the circumstances under which the Bill is to apply. The clause begins with a parent's application for the production of a child. That is presumably from some custody in loco parentis, but there is no description of the sort of custody. When any parent applies for the production of his child, he is to sue for a writ of habeas corpus. What an idea for these poor wretched parents, who are really in view, whom most of your Lordships who have spoken on this subject have rightly supposed to be of the lowest possible class, both morally and in their circumstances! They are to go to the High Court in England, or to the Court of Session in Scotland, for a writ, or order. Such parents would be prevented from ever attempting to get back their children, and they would have to submit to any deprivation whatever their right might be. The fees alone would bar them. My noble Friend Lord Meath, in his original Bill, for which this is a substitute, mentioned no Court at all, but merely said that the parent should be enabled to get the custody of the child under certain circumstances, without saying, by what proceeding. The means here provided are far too high—so high, in fact, as to be entirely out of the reach of the class of parents to whom the Bill refers. It seems to me, also, that the discretion of these Courts is unlimited. The parent may be refused the custody of the child if the Court considers him unfit. Now, considering what strong views many have as regards education, it seems to me an extremely wide discretion to give the Court, to allow anyone in loco parentis to have the custody of his child if the Judge considers that the parent has misconducted himself. I will only ask the noble and learned Lord whether he really thinks that the High Court is fit for this purpose? I should myself have thought that the Court of Petty Sessions would have answered better for the only necessary purpose. The Magistrates in Petty Sessions have conducted all the affairs connected with our Reformatory and Industrial Schools and all cases of the kind connected with matters now dealt with by this Bill; and I think that if these cases were brought before the Courts of Petty Sessions, they would be fairly and fully and safely dealt with, and those Courts would be within the reach of these poor people, whereas the Courts prescribed by this clause would be entirely out of their reach, and there might just as well be no legislation at all on the subject.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I do not know whether the noble Lord is quite familiar with the law on this subject. Apparently he is not, because he seems to be under the impression that the present Bill is an endeavour to make some alteration of the law in this direction of dealing with the custody of children. He objects to the High Court being designated as the tribunal to deal with these applications, but he is probably not aware that that is the only Court to which you can apply for a writ of habeas corpus; and if his case is a good one, that these applications shall not be made to the High Court, the Bill can have no operation at all. If he will be good enough to look at the 1st clause he will see that it commences by referring to cases "Where the parent of a child applies to the High Court, or the Court of Session, for a writ or order for the production of the child."

That is the only condition under which the Bill comes into operation, and the Bill has no reference to such a subject-matter at all as my noble Friend refers to. It does meet the difficulty which constantly arises where a writ of habeas corpus is moved for by a parent, and where the Court has felt itself bound upon that application to give the custody of a child to the parent, although, in the judgment of the Court, that parent may be a very unfit person to have the custody of it. But the law as it stands at present has not said that the Court shall have the discretion of refusing to give up a child to its parent where the Common Law says he has that right. I think I might for answer refer the noble Lord to my noble and learned Friend behind him, and I might ask him whether he thinks it would be an improvement in this Bill to repose the power which I propose to vest in the High Court, in the hands of every Magistrate in the Kingdom. However, there is no such question before your Lordships, for the Bill only applies to cases where the application is necessarily made to the High Court.

Amendment moved, to omit the latter part of Clause 1 after the word "order," in order to insert the said words as a separate Clause at the end of the Bill, agreed to.

Clause 2.

LORD MORRIS: I move that Clause 2 be omitted from the Bill. I would wish at the outset to set myself right with the House. I thought that I had, in terms which to my own mind appeared clear, admitted that there was an evil which ought to be remedied, and that I considered that evil was amply remedied by Clause 1. That has been called by my noble and learned Friend opposite being "very fastidious" about the right of parental control, and he rather read us a homily—I will not say complacently denounced me—because my opinions do not exactly coincide with his. I confess that I am conservative in legal matters; and I am always desirous of avoiding extremely radical measures, especially measures of such a description as that which was passed by the Revolutionary tribunal in France, that the State should be regarded as the parent of the children of citizens. The noble Earl from Ireland upon the Cross Benches says I am acting contrary to my position as a supporter of law and order. I do not think I am. On the contrary; I think I am supporting it in objecting to an irritating legislation, irritating, I say, when it goes one iota beyond the admitted evil, an evil which I have not denied. The noble Lord does not explain why that remedy is not amply given by Clause 1, when under that clause no unfit person can again get the control of his children. The right rev. Prelate who spoke upon this subject said the difficulty arose from a confusion between the articles, not the Articles of the Church, but the definite and indefinite articles. With great respect to the right rev. Prelate, I do not think I have fallen into that mistake. Indeed, he could scarcely have attended to the speech of the noble and learned Lord opposite, who pointed out that in every case the parent must show that he is fit to get back his child, that he is not a drunken or dissolute person, or of such a character that he should not be entrusted with the custody. If he does not get back his child cadit questio; but if he does get back his child upon showing that he is a fit person, notwithstanding that he must, under Clause 2, pay as he would have to do had the child been at a hotel or boarding house, the expenses incurred during the time that the charitable institution or persons have been taking care of it and getting money from the public under the representation that they were maintaining, bringing up, and educating the child. Does the right rev. Prelate suppose that this is to be upon the application of and that the payment is to be made in the case of a drunken parent? It is not. It is to be in the case of the proper and respectable parent, whose child has been taken from him under circumstances which the Court would consider improper. If that is so, why is he to pay for what has been done without his consent? But is getting hold of a child any reason for creating a contract and making a person pay whom the law has decided but the moment before is a proper person for having the custody of his child? If we are to suppose that this Bill is only to apply to dissolute parents I do not object to it; but the object of putting it in is, as a penalty or a contract, or whatever you like to call it, that the parent is to pay a lump sum of money, although the Court has decided that he is a proper person to have the custody of the child. I do not see the necessity for it. What becomes of the "drunken and dissolute persons"—using all the expletives you please—when the clause applies to a person who is considered fit and proper to have the custody of his child? On these grounds, in order that it may not be said that this Bill has passed your Lordships' House unanimously, I venture to say that I object very strongly to Clause 2, and I move its omission.

LORD HERSCHELL: The noble and learned Lord says this clause goes beyond what is necessary. Now, I cannot admit that any clause goes beyond what is necessary which only goes as far as is just. Of course, if it goes beyond what is just, I admit that would be a very good ground for omitting it, but I cannot admit for a moment that this clause does go beyond what is just. In the first place, I would say I regret that the speech of the noble and learned Lord betrays the most absolute lack of confidence in the Judges of the High Court of Justice in England and the Court of Session in Scotland. His whole speech is founded upon his utter disbelief in the discretion with which they are entrusted, because nothing can be done under this clause except what they in their discretion think right. Of course, if you cannot trust the High Court and the Court of Session, well and good ; but I confess that I should have expected to hear that from any quarter rather than the quarter from which it came. My noble and learned Friend says this only applies in the case where you are going to give the custody of the child to the parent, and, therefore, that in such a case it can never be reasonable that he should be called upon to pay the past expenses of bringing up his child. Is that really so? A parent may have neglected his child most grossly and improperly ; he may have left others to bear the burden of bringing it up which he ought to have borne, and yet he may come to the Court under such circumstances and demand to have back his child. Surely it is not unjust that the Court should be empowered to say to him, "Notwithstanding your past misconduct we are not going to deprive you for ever of the custody of your child ; under the circumstances, we think you may safely be trusted with its custody ; but, at the same time, having regard to your conduct in the past, we think it only reasonable you should recoup to those who have borne the burden you ought to have borne the expense they have incurred." He has neglected his duty ; somebody else has performed it for him ; you say, nevertheless, you will not deprive him of the custody of his child. The noble and learned Lord, in order to justify his case, must say there cannot be a case in which a parent should be compelled to pay anything. In order to show that this clause ought not to be inserted my noble Friend must go the length of saying there is no case in which the Court trusts the child to a parent again in which it ought to call upon him to bear the burden which he has cast upon others. It seems to me that it is a discretion which may safely be left to the Courts, to say in such a case how much the parent shall be compelled to pay for the support of his child. I think they may well be trusted not to do so where it would be unreasonable.

LORD NORTON : My Lords, I should like to say one word upon what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord opposite. I maintain that this clause is not only right, but that it is absolutely essential, and one of the most important clauses in the Bill. There is no penalty imposed upon giving back a child to the parent, as my noble Friend behind me says, but it is at the discretion of the Court to order that the whole, or any part of, the expenses incurred in maintenance shall be returned by the parent upon getting back his child. Let me point out to the noble Lord the importance of that proviso. In the case of Industrial Schools, the parent is made to pay as much as the Magistrates think he ought to pay of the expense incurred during the time the child has been brought up in the Industrial School. He is ordered to pay as much as he can. That is found to be the most important provision in the Act. It is the only check upon abuse. The Industrial Schools of this country are abused now to an enormous extent, and unless there was a check in the nature of demanding a payment as far as possible from the parent the abuse would be unlimited. In fact, the Act would operate as a premium upon neglect by parents, because it would be, on the part of the State, absolutely and unconditionally undertaking the care of children who are deserted or neglected by their parents. Without some check on such conduct these Acts would positively be most mischievous, and so far as a parent's liability to pay for his child's education is right and just, it is essential as a check against abuse. The Court would take into consideration what parents have already paid and their power to pay or refund more ; but they should, as far as they can, be compelled to recoup the State Institution or benevolent persons for the expense they have been at in taking care of their children and relieving them of the duty which naturally and properly devolves upon them.

*THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE: As the noble and learned Lord who proposes the omission of this clause has referred to a few words which fell from myself, I should like to add a few remarks. One is not obliged to agree entirely with a statement which comes from any authority however eminent. I did not agree with the statement which comes from the noble and learned Lord, and therefore it was that I ventured to trouble your Lordships with the remarks which I made. Both upon my objection to the clause on the one hand and the reason which I should have given for supporting it, all I should have said has been very much better said by the noble and learned Lord opposite, and I think it is quite unnecessary for me to say anything more in that respect. All I would say is that it seems to me the fatal mistake under this clause is in forgetting that a man or woman does not always remain for 10 or 15 years what they have been. A man may have been a very improper person to have been entrusted with the custody of his child for a certain period; he may have deserted the child in the most abominable way, and the child may have been taken charge of by others and put into an Industrial School; but 10 years afterwards that man may have become a thoroughly reformed character, and may come before the Court to demand his child under such circumstances that the Court would consider he should have the custody of it. But he has, in the first instance, committed a great fault by abandoning his child; and if the Court thinks that the circumstances are such as to justify putting the burden or penalty upon him of recouping the expense of the child's bringing up, I cannot see what possible injustice there can be, except upon the impossible hypothesis of the High Court of Justice or the Court of Session being totally dead to all feelings of duty and good sense in the matter. Therefore, seeing that it is a matter which is discretionary with the Court, and that it is perfectly possible that cases of the description contemplated may arise—and I believe that evidence would show such cases have arisen—it does seem to me a most wise provision that the Court should have this power of making parents pay, supposing the circumstances justify it. I would add, with regard to the noble Lord who spoke last, that many such cases as those to which he referred have been brought under my notice in Industrial Schools. I know that children are put into the schools at a certain age, and are practically abandoned by their parents; but that when those children have been brought up, trained, and educated, and are likely to become useful, they are demanded by their parents, it may be, for the purpose of making beggars of them, or for making use of them in other and worse ways. It is not right that for such purposes against the welfare of the children, parents should be allowed to claim them, and there ought, beyond all doubt, to be some kind of restriction put upon that abuse of the Industrial Schools. Upon those grounds, I think this is a most admirable clause.

On Question, "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill," agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

New Clause—

"Upon any application by the parent for the production or custody of a child, if the Court is of opinion that the parent ought not to have the custody of the child, and that the child is being brought up in a different religion to that in which the parent has a legal right to require that the child should be brought up, the Court shall have power to make such order as it may think fit to secure that the child be brought up in the religion in which the parent has a legal right to require that the child should be brought up. Nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect the power of the Court to consult the wishes of the child in considering what order ought to be made, or diminish the right which any child now possesses to the exercise of its own free choice."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

*LORD NORTON: It really does appear to me that we are very tender about conscience or religion in this matter. It would seem that an idea has got abroad among the public that benevolent persons who take care of neglected and abandoned children have principally in their minds some proselytising object. Well, anything of that kind ought certainly to be checked, but I would only venture to ask the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, as he says I have no knowledge of the law—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I did not, indeed.

*LORD NORTON: What is the legal right of a parent under circumstances such as those to which this clause applies—that is, condemned as unfit to have his child, as to the religious instruction required? The clause might at least be so worded that the parent shall be bound to show that his child is being improperly taught in a religious point of view, and not that the Court shall be bound to form an opinion that the child is being taught a different religion. At all events, the proof should come from the parent that his child is being taught in some religion different from his own. We might have to provide for not only the Christian religion, but Mahomedan and Buddhist, and all denominations, and even Agnostic, probably the character of religious belief of most of the parents to whom the clause would apply.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am bound to say that I share the difficulty of the noble Lord in understanding what the proposition is with which I have to contend. I certainly did not say the noble Lord knows nothing about the law, for I believe he is a distinguished member of the Bench of Magistrates in his county, and that on that Bench which he adorns he administers justice to the great satisfaction of all those amongst whom he performs his duties. But really and seriously, I have great difficulty in understanding what the noble Lord wants to know. If he will be good enough to look at the language of the section I think he must admit that it is, as it seems to me to be, very plain. It provides that—

That is one branch; then it goes on—

“And that the child is being brought up in a different religion to that in which the parent has a legal right to require that the child should be brought up.”

That is the second branch of the proposition. It must, therefore, appear to the Court that the parent is unfit to have the custody, and that the child is being brought up in a different religion. The order is to be made after the child has been brought before the Court, and after the Court has been satisfied, upon summons presumably by the applicant, that the child has been brought up in a different religion to that which the parent has a legal right to require. I pause there to point out that those words are general. They do not give any definition of what “religion” is to be held to mean. So far as I can judge of what the noble Lord means, he means that there should be an enumeration of all the different religions of the world among which mankind is divided, and that in regard to each of them he would have special protection thrown around it.

*LORD NORTON: No.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Then I positively declare that I do not know what the noble Lord does mean; but perhaps he will allow me to point out to him with regard to this point of religion, whatever the legal right is of the father to have his child brought up in the religion which he desires it should be brought up in, provided always, of course, that the child has not arrived at such a period of life that it has formed opinions of its own, it goes on to provide that—

“Nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect the power of the Court to consult the wishes of the child in considering what order ought to be made, or diminish the right which any child now possesses to the exercise of its own free choice.”

So that the hypothesis upon which this clause is introduced is that a child is being brought before the Court not able to exercise its own free choice in point of mind, education, and age, and that the father has a legal right to direct in what religion it shall be brought up, that legal right being then invaded, then that is one of the matters which is left in the discretion of the Court. I cannot forbear repeating what my noble and learned Friend said across the Table just now, that the noble Lord really seems to have a very great distrust of the sense of justice of the High Court. What is the difficulty which the noble Lord has in his mind about it? Does he think that the protection which is given to the rights of parents in this regard ought to be confined to one or other of a certain number of religions, which he wishes to see introduced into the clause? I have no right to ask him for an answer, but perhaps the noble Lord will explain before he proceeds to divide the House, if he does divide it, what it is he does mean, and what religions he wishes to have enumerated. If the noble Lord can make an intelligible clause by his Amendments he must forgive me for saying that he will do that which he did not accomplish in his speech.

LORD NORTON : I was only suggesting the addition of such words as, "if the parent can show the Court" that the child is being brought up in a different religion from that which he approves. By what means is the Court to ascertain, and to secure the religion which the parent condemned as unfit? I only propose that the onus probandi should be on the parent to show that the child whom he has abandoned and is not allowed to take back, is being educated in a different religion. How also is the Court to secure this peculiar teaching, and from what funds?

POLICE AND SANITARY REGULATIONS.

(3.8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Committee of Selection do appoint a Committee not exceeding nine members to whom shall be committed all Private Bills promoted by Municipal and other Local Authorities, by which it is proposed to create powers relating to police and sanitary regulations which deviate from, or are in extension of, or are repugnant to, the General Law; that Standing Order 173A be applicable to all Bills referred to the said Committee; that the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records; that five be the quorum of the Committee."—(Mr. Stuart Wortley).

*(3.10.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.), who had a Motion on the Paper to the effect—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee not to insert in any Bill referred to them any Clauses relating to matters which are the subject of provisions in the Infectious Disease Notification Act, 1889, the Public Health Acts Amendment Acts, 1890, or the Infectious Disease Prevention Act, 1890," said: I do not intend to oppose the appointment of the Committee this Session. I think the House is under a deep debt of gratitude to the Committee for the manner in which they have discharged their duty. A large number of Bills have been promoted by Local Authorities, each asking for a code of its own involving an extensive alteration of the general law and more stringent and oppressive regulations against the subject. There has been a strong feeling therefore that such Bills should be regulated by some general rule and guided by some general principle. The Committee is called a "Police and Sanitary" Committee; that, however, is an incorrect description of its functions, because it is also a Fiscal Committee. I am of opinion that the system of Provisional Orders contains the true solution of the reform of our Private Bill procedure. Those Orders supply a means by which most of the objects a Municipal Corporation can desire are to be attained; and I think it is undesirable that Municipal Bodies should, by means of Private Bills, obtain powers which can be better conferred on them through the instrumentality of Provisional Orders. The advantage of Provisional Orders is twofold—not only are they less expensive as far as the taxpayers are concerned, but they are also under the supervision and control of the Local Government Board. The proposition I venture to submit to the House, and to the President of the Local Government Board, is this—that when the power can be obtained by Provisional Order, the Committee ought not to sanction their insertion in a Private Bill; and that where a Bill is brought in mainly for the purpose of obtaining powers which could be obtained by a Provisional Order, but with the insertion of one or two bogus provisions, the Committee would do wisely to throw out the Bill altogether. Further, I would ask that the promoters of measures of this kind should not be allowed to extend the general law of the land. Private Bills are heavy burdens to the localities, and they should not be allowed except in cases of absolute necessity. It is not for the interest of the public that such Bills should be encouraged. If the law of the land is to be altered, it should be altered by the House of Commons, and no Committee should have power to come to the House of Commons and say, "We think this is something better than the decision which has been arrived at by the whole House, and therefore we seek to alter the general law."

(3.20.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): It is as long ago as 1872 or 1873 that public attention was first called by me to these Bills. Up to that time they were thrown before Select Committees in a very haphazard way, and it was in consequence of the action which I took that the Home Office first, and the Local Government Board subsequently, made reports upon these Bills. The House gave its attention to the subject, and the Sanitary Committee was constituted. So far as local indebtedness is concerned, I entirely agree with the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) that the increase of local debts is a source of danger to the country, and I am sure that, as a rule, sufficient attention has not been paid to the evil. I hold, and I believe the right hon. Gentleman opposite will agree with me, that it is a cruel kindness to be facile in matters of this kind, for repayments should be made as rapidly as possible. I entirely agree with what the right hon. Gentleman opposite has said as to the excessive labour which hon. Members attending Committees have had to perform, and which is becoming quite intolerable. I think it is a culpable waste of power to enforce an investigation by a Select Committee when all the circumstances of the case would be much better investigated by a tribunal on the spot under procedure by Provisional Order. Most of us who have assisted in passing local Acts must have felt how much better and wiser our decision would have been if we could have spent a day or two in the district. I feel strongly that Parliament ought not to give power by clause to do that which can be done by bye-laws, and as to an extension of the criminal law I am afraid there are some cases in which we cannot escape that course. If we pass regulations to prevent a man from doing certain things we must by imposing penalties enforce the statute. But our policy has always been to make the penalties as low as possible. I quite agree with the Report of the Sanitary and Police Regulation Committee of last year, that—

"The Public Health Acts Amendment Act embodies in the best form a number of Police and Sanitary enactments which have, in a number of Local Acts, stood the test of time, and have become ripe for general legislation."

In the early part of our proceedings we recommended that there should be legislation in regard to indecent advertisements, the sale of coal, the employment of young persons, and the notification of infectious disease, and since then the whole of our recommendations upon those subjects have become law with an exception which was mentioned in our last Report as deserving further consideration.

*(3.30.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I entirely concur in the observations of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and in what has fallen from my hon. Friend behind (Mr. F. S. Powell), and I think that the Instruction which the right hon. Gentleman has put upon the Paper will be of great value. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the large and increasing amount of local debt; but from certain points of view that increase of debt may be regarded as being a matter for congratulation, inasmuch as the borrowed money has been expended in the construction of works which have greatly improved the sanitary condition and added to the comfort of the inhabitants of the different localities. No doubt the growth of the debt has been facilitated by the long periods of repayment that have been authorised, but the tendency of Parliament and of the Local Government Board has been, of late years, to reduce the number of years for repayment, although not to such an extent as to prevent Local Authorities from carrying out useful works. The right hon. Gentleman has said that it would be a desirable thing that Local Authorities should obtain the required powers by means of Provisional Orders, instead of by Acts of Parliament, and I entirely concur in that suggestion; but I may point out that there is scarcely a single power that a Local Authority cannot now obtain by means of Provisional Orders. I think I may say that, with the exception of the construction of waterworks, everything can be done by Provisional Orders, which are much less expensive than Private Bills. In proceeding by Provisional Orders a local inquiry is held; all parties are able to place their views before an officer of the Local Government Board; that officer is often able to make suggestions which lead to local agreement; and it reflects the greatest credit on the officials that there is hardly a confirmatory Bill which has been opposed in the House. These satisfactory results seem to add force to the recommendation that the Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee should set their faces against proposals to do, by means of a Private Act, that which cannot be done under the general law. I agree that borrowing powers ought to be kept within the narrowest limits as to the time for repayment; but I do not think the position of matters with regard to repayments is quite as unsatisfactory as has been suggested by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton. Local Authorities have to make Returns on a form supplied to them by the Local Government Board as to the provision made for repayment; and the Board have the power where they are dissatisfied to take summary proceedings by which repayments can be doubled, if necessary, and the order of the Board can be made a rule of Court. I endorse the view that Parliament ought not to entertain interferences with a general law which has been passed so recently, and thereby create chaotic divergences in places that have obtained local Acts. If the general law requires amendment it ought to be amended by a Public Bill applicable to the whole country.

(3.37.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): The House ought to be obliged to the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton for having brought this matter forward, and also to the President of the Local Government Board for the remarks he has made. I fully endorse the view of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton that the general law ought not to be altered by Private Bill. There have been instances in which great excitement has been produced in localities by the putting into operation of a local Act containing an exceptional provision which has, perhaps, been passed hastily by a Committee upstairs. Certainly the House should be careful in allowing Local Authorities to make additions to the Criminal Law by creating local offences which are unknown to the general law.

(3.37.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I do not rise for the purpose of differing from the observations which have been made already, but I think it is necessary to utter a word of caution. It was the reforms that were first made tentatively by independent corporations which made it possible to pass a general Act embodying provisions which have been already carried out in municipalities. It is rather a strong thing to lay down a universal negative that no change desired by a municipality shall be considered. The proposed Instruction is limited to this Session, but I warn the House that they may expect remonstrances against it from Local Bodies, to whose action in the past is due the full growth of our sanitary legislation. As to additions being made in this way to the "Criminal Law," the phrase is a very large one, and I do not think that anything that can be strictly called an addition to the Criminal Law has been made by Private Bill. We ought rather to speak of changes made for police and administrative purposes; and no doubt such proposals ought to be jealously watched and guarded, which is the special purpose for which the Committee was appointed. Here, again, it is an extreme step to say that, although local pressure is strong, the Committee is not to be allowed to entertain the proposal and to report it to the House. I will not oppose the Instruction, but I believe the House will hear remonstrances that it is curbing too closely the action of Municipal Corporations.

(3.40.) Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Committee of Selection do appoint a Committee, not exceeding Nine Members, to whom shall be committed all Private Bills promoted by Municipal and other Local Authorities, by which it is proposed to create powers relating to Police and Sanitary Regulations which deviate from, or are in extension of, or are repugnant to, the General Law.

Ordered, That Standing Order 173A be applicable to all Bills referred to the said Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum of the Committee.—(Mr. Stuart Wortley.)

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on Police and Sanitary Regulations not to sanction in any Bill referred to them any clauses relating to matters which are the subject of provisions in "The Infectious Disease Notification Act, 1889," "The Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890," or "The Infectious Disease Prevention Act, 1890."—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

QUESTIONS.

THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Government propose to take the Second Reading of the Indian Councils Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): In the present state of public business I can enter into no undertaking in regard to the Indian Councils Bill.

MILITARY CONTRIBUTIONS OF CEYLON AND INDIA.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any decision has yet been arrived at as to the exemption of the Island of Ceylon from military contribution, especially in regard to the provision for the military defence of Trincomalee, the headquarters of the Imperial Navy in Indian waters?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government have not entertained any proposal for the exemption of Ceylon from military contribution. There is no reason why that colony should not bear its fair share of the cost of Imperial and Local defence. This decision will shortly be communicated to the colony with a full statement of the grounds upon which that decision has been based.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: May I ask whether Her Majesty's Government have given any consideration to the fact, which is an undoubted one, that Trincomalee is the head quarters of the Imperial Navy, and that that is a matter for which the Island of Ceylon is in no way actually responsible?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes, Sir, the fullest consideration has been given to the question by Her Majesty's Government, but they are scarcely prepared to admit that Trincomalee is the head-quarters of the Imperial Navy in Indian waters. On the contrary, I should say that Bombay probably represents the head-quarters. At all events Her Majesty's Government have carefully considered the question. I may add that the Secretary of State has received an important deputation on the subject, and after due consideration arrived at the decision which has been communicated to the Government of Ceylon.

RIVER IMPROVEMENTS AND FLOODS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that questions affecting river improvements and the mode of dealing with floods are being discussed with great and increasing interest by tenant farmers, and that last week a resolution proposed and seconded by two county aldermen, was adopted by the Farmers' Club, at Southam, in Warwickshire, suggesting that Parliament should confer further powers upon County Councils with regard to these matters; whether he will consider, with a view to legislation, if it would be practicable to enable County Councils, representing counties having interests in the same watershed, to act through a joint Committee in dealing with these important subjects; and whether he is aware of any financial difficulty in the way of such legislation which could not be equitably met, so as not to impose taxation or expense upon those who would not share in the benefit?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am aware that the subject of rivers conservancy and floods prevention has been discussed by some County Councils, and that suggestions have been made that the County Councils should be invested with powers in regard to this matter. I think that when legislation is proposed on the subject it will be a proper matter to consider whether such powers as may be required should be conferred on the County Councils or a Joint Committee of the Councils of the counties by or through which the river passes. One of the difficulties incidental to the question is no doubt that as to the rates to be levied. In the Bills which have been introduced on this subject it was proposed that the area of charge should be divided into lowlands, midlands, and uplands with a view to the charges varying according to the benefit derived by the owners and occupiers.

MR. COBB: Can the right hon. Gentleman give any idea when legislation is likely to take place?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am afraid, Sir, that I cannot.

ALEXANDRA GATE.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, referring to his answer on 18th March, 1890, in reference to Alexandra Gate, he is aware that nothing has been done, and that during the late frost the danger of the narrow road was increased by heaps of snow piled right and left of it; and whether the necessary improvements cannot be effected before the traffic further increases?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS: (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I am sorry to say that the proposed scheme for widening the roadway of Kensington Gore from Alexandra Gate to Queen's Gate has been abandoned by the Vestry of St. Margaret's in consequence, as I am informed, of the refusal of the Landon County Council to grant the assistance towards the scheme which the Vestry had asked for. The Office of Works is therefore unable to take any further steps in that matter, but we propose forthwith to set back the gates at the Alexandra Lodge, so as to give more space at the exit from the park.

CUSTOMS' MESSENGERS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any decision has been arrived at with reference to the memorial forwarded by the established messengers of the Customs last year for an amelioration of their condition; whether the messengers, upon their promotion to the first class, receive no increment for twelve months, although they may have been at the maximum salary of the second class for over 12 years; and if so, will he remedy the grievance complained of; whether one messenger has obtained a separate appointment as doorkeeper to the Board of Customs, and has been taken off the class of messengers and given increased pay, thus reducing the number of first class messengers to 16, instead of 17 (in accordance with the Treasury Order); whether another messenger has been called upon to give (whenever required) an additional hour's attendance after 4 p.m. without remuneration, although hitherto the messengers of the Customs have always received the payment of 8d. per hour for overtime after 4 p.m.; and whether the last vacancy occurred as far back as January 1890; and if so, will the appointment thereto be antedated to that time?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): No decision has yet been arrived at in regard to the memorial of the established messengers of the Customs, new points having been raised by the memorialists last month, but the Report of the Board of Customs on the whole subject is now before the Treasury. No increment is received by the messengers upon promotion to the first class until after one year from promotion; the practice is well known and constitutes no grievance. There have been no doorkeepers since 1882.

THE SCIENCE COLLECTIONS AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether any, and if so, what steps have been taken to carry out the undertaking given by him on 1st April, 1890, with regard to the housing of the Science Collections at South Kensington; whether the plans of the buildings required for this purpose are being drawn; and how far the assurance given by him that the Government are prepared to put buildings on a proper and worthy footing upon the site purchased last year has been fulfilled?

MR. PLUNKET: During the past year Her Majesty's Government have given much consideration to the question of buildings at South Kensington, not for the Science and Art Department only, but also for the proposed Gallery of British Art. All these matters are interdependent, and it has not been possible to deal with the requirements of the science collections, otherwise than in combination with those of the Art Collections. It has now been decided to proceed at once with the completion of the buildings on the east side of Exhibition Road. These will ultimately be devoted wholly to art collections, although for some years it is probable that some portions of them may be temporarily available for science collections. The buildings will, however, take several years to complete, and in the meantime the needs of the science collections are undoubtedly somewhat urgent, and more accommodation is also required for science teaching. I am now in communication with the Science and Art Department, as to the best means of providing for these scientific requirements, and I hope soon to submit a proposal to the Treasury. As the buildings on the east side of Exhibition Road will cost some £300,000 or £400,000, it is obvious that any further immediate demands on the Chancellor of the Exchequer must be confined within as narrow limits as possible.

SIR H. ROSCOE: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the west galleries will be used before long for the National Gallery of Modern Pictures?

MR. PLUNKET: That is what renders the case of these science collections urgent, and it is on this subject that I am at present in communication with the Science and Art Department.

LABOURERS' ALLOTMENTS.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) as representing the Charity Commissioners, whether he is aware that a field belonging to the charity called the Poor's Land at Hazlebury Bryan, in the county of Dorset, is being set out in allotments under "The Allotments Extension Act, 1882," whether he is aware that, though this field is stated to have been let to a farmer at £3 per acre, the labourers are now called upon to pay £5 14s. 6d. per acre with a quarter's rent in advance, and whether there is any adequate reason for such a great increase in the rent?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The answer to the first question is in the affirmative. The Charity Commissioners are informed that the land in question is let at the rate of £3 11s. 5d. per acre, the tenant paying all out-goings; and that the rent proposed to be charged for the first year to the allotment holders is at the rate of £5 6s. per acre. The reason for this increase is that the trustees have added to the rent hitherto paid the expenses of setting out the land for allotments as well as the ordinary outgoings, as directed by the Allotments Extension Act, 1882, Sec. 13. It is understood, however, to be their intention, after the first year, to reduce the rent proposed to be charged, by such a proportion of it as represents the expenses of setting out the land.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: Would it not be better to spread the excessive payment charged in the first year over a series of years?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Perhaps that would be the most rational plan, but I do not know whether it is in the power of the Trustees to do so. I will see that a letter is written to them on the point.

THE WAR DEPARTMENT AT SHEERNESS.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, if he can explain why, on the 28th day of January last, the public were excluded, by order of the War Department authorities at Sheerness, from a football match played in Wall Marsh, Sheerness, although the said marsh has been open to the public for many years?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It appears that the Wall Marsh is a private recreation ground for the troops to which the public are only admitted occasionally and by special pass.

PRESUMPTION OF LIFE LIMITATION (SCOTLAND) ACT.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he intends to propose legislation this Session to amend the Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): Yes, Sir.

KING JA JA,

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to a letter, dated 13th August 1890, written by the Administrator of the Island of St. Vincent to King Ja Ja, informing him that it is 'Her Majesty's gracious will and pleasure to order his release from further detention as a political prisoner in St. Vincent, and to take steps for his re-conveyance to Opobo, on the condition that he will give his assurance in writing that, on being restored to his country as a private individual, he will for the future abstain from fomenting disturbance, and conduct himself with loyalty to Her Majesty, Her Governor, and representatives; whether, on the 18th August 1890, King Ja Ja signed the assurance as recited in the letter, at the Government Office in Kingstown, St. Vincent, in the presence of J. Choppin, Attorney General; F. B. Griffin, Treasurer; and George Smith, three members of the Executive Council of St. Vincent; and whether King Ja Ja is still detained in St. Vincent; and, if so, why Her Majesty's order for his release and re-conveyance to Opobo has not been carried out?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): I believe that the facts are correctly stated in the question. It was intended to permit Ja Ja to return to Opobo on the conditions mentioned; but in the meantime news was received from Opobo which showed that his return before a more effective form of administration had been established would be inexpedient. It is accordingly delayed; but I hope only for a short time.

VOL. CCCL. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE INTERNATIONAL MARITIME CONFERENCE AT WASHINGTON.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether Her Majesty's Government has yet received the Report of the Committee appointed by the Board of Trade to consider the recommendations of the International Maritime Conference held at Washington last year; and, if so, whether he can now state when their Report is likely to be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Report of the Committee appointed by the Board of Trade to consider the alterations proposed at the Washington Maritime Conference in the International Regulations for the prevention of collisions at sea has been received, is now being considered, and will, I hope, shortly be laid before Parliament.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works what date has been fixed for the sending in of the competition drawings for the South Kensington Museum; and whether he will lay upon the Table the conditions of the competition?

MR. PLUNKET: The date fixed for sending in the competition drawings for the South Kensington Museum is July 1st next. There will be no objection to laying the conditions of the competition on the table if my hon. Friend cares to move for them.

SECOND DIVISION CLERKS.

MR. TUIITE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether in any circumstances other than an emergency, the head of a Department of State can compel the attendance of Second Division clerks beyond the hours laid down in Clause 3 of the Order in Council of 21st March 1890?

MR. JACKSON: It would be quite contrary to the principles and practice of the Civil Service to lay down any rules as to when compulsory extra attendance can be required. The overtime is paid for, and it must rest with the head of the Department to say when it is necessary to require it in the public interest.

THE POST OFFICE BUILDINGS AT ST MARTIN'S-LE-GRAND.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has been informed that Mr. Chappell, the contractor for the new Post Office Buildings, St. Martin's-le-Grand, has sub-let a portion of the stone work to the Steam Moulding Works, Battersea, and that he has also sub-let the King Edward Street front to Messrs. Smith and Taylor; whether this is in conformity with the specifications, that no work shall be sub-let without his written sanction; and if sanction has been given to this sub-letting, why it has been so given?

MR. PLUNKET: The sub-lettings referred to have been made by Mr. Chappell with written consent from me. The consent was given solely for the purpose of expediting the works, which had been much retarded by the prolonged frost of December and January. The extent of work sub-let was carefully limited, and in neither case goes beyond the ground floor; and an intimation was given that no further portion of the stone-work would be permitted to be sub-let.

ARDCHATTAN AND MUCKAIRN SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, in arriving at the decision placing the Episcopal school on the annual grant list, the Scotch Education Department took into consideration the statement of the School Board of Ardchattan and Muckairn of 17th September last, that the number of children on the roll of the Episcopal school was only 16; whether the Department made any, and, if so, what inquiry to clear up the discrepancy between the number so given by the School Board, and the number (38), given to the Department by the Episcopal school authorities; what were understood by the Department to be the number on the roll and in average attendance at the time of its being placed on the grant list; upon what date was the decision of the Department communicated to the School Board; and whether the Department has received any contradiction of the statement of the School Board that on the 26th January last there were only 19 children on the roll of the Episcopal school, and only 13 in attendance that day, four of these being the children of the teachers who came to the district about a month ago, whilst the School Board had been informed that one of the 19 had gone to the Board School?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: All the information furnished was taken into consideration by the Scotch Education Department before the decision to place the Episcopal School on the Annual Grant List was arrived at. The School Board's letter of 17th September did not state the number of children on the roll of the Episcopal School, but the last return which had been received from the Board at that date gave the number as 40. The discrepancy which has been referred to is that between the statements which preceded the decision, and the statement made by the School Board on 8th January last, after the decision had been announced. When the decision was arrived at there were stated to be 24 children attending the school. The decision of the Department was communicated to the School Board on the 9th December last. My lords are in communication with the managers of the School in reference to the Board statement of 26th of January, as it is desirable to clear up any discrepancy. But I may remind the hon. Member that the crucial element in the case is the existence of a certain number of children for whom the School is specially required. The time when the parents arrived does not affect the decision.

CARPENTERS IN PLYMOUTH AND DEVONPORT DOCKYARDS.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the wages of the carpenters employed in Her Majesty's Dockyards at Plymouth and Devonport, in the Department of the Director of Works, have been reduced; if so, to what extent; and whether he can state what are the wages paid to carpenters in the Chief Constructor's Department, and the hours of labour as compared with the wages and hours of those employed in the Department of the Director of Works?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): No reduction has been made in the wages of the carpenters employed in the Department of the Director of Works at Her Majesty's Dockyards. The wages paid to carpenters in the Chief Constructor's Department are, to established men, 4s. 6d. a day, and to hired men, 4s. to 4s. 10d. a day; and to men in the Director of Works' Department 3s. 8d. to 4s. 6d. a day, according to the qualifications of the workmen. The hours vary according to the time of year, but they average $8\frac{1}{2}$ to $9\frac{1}{2}$ hours in the Constructor's and Works Departments respectively. After the 1st of April there will be a closer assimilation of the hours of these two Departments.

BRITISH COPYRIGHT.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the American Copyright Bill, and its probable effect on the British printing and publishing industries; and whether any facilities would be granted to a private Member bringing in a Bill to enact similar conditions for British copyright, but with an extension to all countries, adhering to the Convention of Berne?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Proposals for legislation on this subject have been before the Congress of the United States for the last three years or more. I do not think it necessary to consider any such suggestions as those made by my hon. Friend until an Act is passed, and we are acquainted with the shape in which it becomes law.

IRELAND—FATHER HUMPHRIES.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, if he can state why Father Humphries, of Tipperary, has again been followed by police on several occasions. Is he aware that Constable Navin, on 21st January, walked close after this clergyman in the street, and when Father Humphries stopped the policeman halted within two feet of him, and that, on the priest requesting him not to walk on his heels, the constable replied

"I will walk where I like, you had better assault me." Do the Government sanction the use of this language by policemen when engaged on such duty? and do the Government sanction policemen when engaged on such duty to enter into any colloquy with the persons they are watching?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am informed that Rev. D. Humphries, C.C., is watched by the police, as he is reported in the Nationalist newspapers to have made speeches at illegal meetings, alleged to have been held near Tipperary, in which he advocated boycotting and intimidation. The constable denies that he replied on the 21st January in the manner attributed to him. He was some yards behind Mr. Humphries when the latter stopped and made some remarks to him. The constable, in accordance with express orders, refused to enter into conversation, and crossed to the other side of the street.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When Father Humphries is being shadowed, will the shadower keep out of ear-shot? What is the necessity for the police following the heels and dogging Father Humphries so persistently close at hand, and will orders be given for the police to keep three or four yards off?

MR. MADDEN: I have no information as to the distance by which this gentleman has been shadowed by the police.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will not the Government lay down some rule as to the distance which should be observed between the shadow and the person shadowed?

MR. SEXTON: (Belfast, W.) Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that this constable when engaged in the occupation of shadowing not long ago, committed a trespass, and, being warned off by the occupier of the property, drew a revolver upon him? Is he not also aware that for this offence the constable was convicted and fined by a removable magistrate, and does he think that such a man is a fit and proper person to follow Father Humphries?

MR. MADDEN: I have no information that will enable me to answer the right hon. Gentleman's question.

RELIEF WORKS IN IRELAND.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the Government propose to start any relief works in the parish of Lower Templecrone, county Donegal, as it is admittedly one of the most congested and 'distressed in the county; whether an engineer was sent in December last to open up relief works in the district, but recalled in a few days; and on what ground was he re-called; and whether information has reached the Government that people on several occasions assembled at the Police Barracks in the east of the parish, clamouring for work to tide them over the distress so acutely felt?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone the question. I have not yet received a report.

JOSEPH MULLETT.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Joseph Mullett, a prisoner undergoing a sentence of penal servitude in Downpatrick Gaol, is in a dying state; and whether the Government will cause or allow an examination by an independent medical man?

MR. MADDEN: A medical officer from the Prisons Board went down to examine the prisoner, and has reported that there is no ground for the suggestion, but that the prisoner is in thorough good health.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow the man to be examined by some medical officer who is not connected with the Prison?

MR. MADDEN: The medical officer sent down by the Prisons Board was not connected with the prison.

THE CRIMES ACT.

MR. O'KELLY, Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland on how many days the Court of Inquiry, under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, has sat in Castlereagh between the 1st of December last and the 4th of February; how many persons have been sent to gaol by that Court within that time for refusing to give evidence; whether he is aware that several persons have been sent to gaol five or six times in succession; that the Magistrate, Mr. Brady, R.M., questions many of the witnesses brought before him, who are tenants on Lord de Freyn's estate, as to the amount of rent they owe; and that, for the purpose of effecting the arrest of many of these witnesses, their houses are broken into; how many women and children have been arrested; and is it the fact that the wife of Owen Lavin, who is in gaol, was arrested within the last few days in an advanced state of pregnancy, and is now, in consequence of the arrest, in a pitiful condition of health?

MR. MADDEN: The legal inquiry under the Crimes Act at Castlereagh opened on December 29 last, and has since proceeded, with but few intermissions. Twenty-nine persons in all have been committed in custody for successive periods of seven days either for refusing to be sworn or, when sworn, for refusing to give evidence. In no instance was the house of any person broken into. No woman has been committed to prison at any stage of the inquiry. Eleven women in all were brought up as witnesses on warrant. No children were arrested or summoned. It is not the case that the wife of Owen Lavin has been committed to gaol, nor does there appear to be any ground for believing her to be in an advanced state of pregnancy. She made no statement to the police to that effect when told her attendance was required at the inquiry, but, on the contrary, offered to walk into Castlereagh, a distance of ten miles. The police, however, provided her with a seat upon a car.

THE ASHBOURNE ACTS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland when the Return of Memorials from purchasers under the Ashbourne Acts, asking for variation in terms of purchase, ordered 28th November, 1890, will be distributed; and what is the reason of the delay in its appearance?

MR. MADDEN: The Return referred to is being laid on the Table to-day.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been repeatedly called by the Poor Law Board of Claremorris, County Mayo, to the distress now prevailing in the Ballyhaunis dispensary district of that Union, the poverty of which might be gauged by the valuation £12,127, while the population is 12,800; whether he has received a copy of the resolution passed by the Poor Law Board that "unless relief works be opened immediately hundreds of deaths will occur before many days;" and whether he will undertake to give prompt attention to the conditions of the Ballyhaunis dispensary district?

MR. MADDEN: The resolution referred to in the question has been received, and is now under consideration.

MR. CRILLY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that numbers of poor people are vainly seeking for relief-work in the parish of Kilcommon-Erriis, County Mayo; that this parish contains 472 holdings, each of an annual valuation of £4 or under; and if there is any Local Authority competent to afford immediate assistance; and, if not, will steps be taken to relieve the existing distress as quickly as possible?

MR. MADDEN: There are several relief works in actual progress in the electoral division which contains the parish of Kilcommon. Employment is given to a considerable number of persons on these works.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is the intention of the Government to ask for a further Vote to complete the schemes of railway extension considered urgently necessary in the poorer districts of Ireland? The hon. Member also asked whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman is aware that of the 1,000 families in the district of Gweedore, 800 are necessarily dependent for food for four months in the year, from May to August, upon meal supplied on credit by merchants and shopkeepers; that, owing to the failure of last year's potato crop, this meal supply on credit commenced in October last, and has now exhausted the resources of the shopkeepers, who are being compelled to refuse further credit; and that some 5,000 persons are in absolute destitution; whether the Government intend to start any railway works in the neighbourhood; and, if so, when; whether any employment of any kind has yet been started on relief works, such as roadmaking, or otherwise; and what steps have been taken to avert starvation within the present month?

MR. MADDEN: In all probability the sum available under the Act of 1889 will not cover the scheme of railway construction which has been undertaken, and in that case a further Vote must, of course, be asked for.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask whether the Government intend to take any steps for the relief of distress in the Gweedore district, where some 800 families, including 5,000 persons, are in a state of absolute destitution?

MR. MADDEN: The circumstances of the Gweedore district are receiving careful consideration, and inquiries are proceeding. As regards the suggested railway works the Government have no funds at their disposal for the purpose.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How soon may we expect that the Chief Secretary's fund will be utilised?

MR. DALTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the system for administering relief is viewed with considerable dissatisfaction, not only in Donegal, but throughout Ireland; and has he seen a letter from the Rev. Father M'Fadden, in which he declares that no proper steps have been taken to meet the distress at Gweedore?

MR. MADDEN: I am not aware of the opinions of Father M'Fadden. The action of the Government in dealing with distress in Ireland is, I am thankful to say, regarded by my countrymen generally with very different feelings from those attributed to them by the hon. and learned Member.

MR. SEXTON: The question on the Paper points out that there are 800 families in that district who have no means of living. There are £50,000 in Dublin Castle, and I wish to know how soon the inquiries instituted on behalf of the Government are likely to result in the provision of relief works?

MR. MADDEN: I am not able to give specific information as to the distribution of the fund raised by my right hon. Friend. It is not for the House to infer that most active steps are not being taken by the Government in carrying out a system of relief.

THE IRISH POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the great inconvenience caused depositors in the Post Office Savings Bank resident in Ireland by the delay in the withdrawal of money, and considering that such delay tends to drive would-be depositors to the local trustee savings banks, he would consider whether it would be possible, in the interests both of the depositors and the Post Office, that the Irish section of the accounts should be kept at, and administered in connection with, the General Post Office, Dublin?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): There would, I fear, be practical difficulties in the way; but the hon. Member's suggestion shall be fully considered. I am glad to be able to re-assure him as to the present state of the deposits at the Government Savings Banks in Ireland. The average deposit per depositor is something double the amount per depositor in Scotland, and considerably more than the average amount standing in the name of any depositor in England, and while the deposits in the old trustee banks in Ireland have remained stationary during the last five years, those in the Government banks have increased by about a million of money, or about 42 per cent.

THE LAND COMMISSION COURT.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if his attention has been called to the following statement in the Freeman's Journal, of 3rd February—

"In the Land Commission Court yesterday, Mr. Justice Bewley, pursuant to the provisions of the Land Purchase Act, sat with the Land Purchase Commissioners, Messrs. Lynch and MacCarthy, to hear a legal argument. At the close of the case, Mr. Justice Bewley delivered the judgment of the Court. When he had finished, Mr. Commissioner Lynch proceeded to add his judgment, but Mr. Justice Bewley promptly interposed, and declined to allow him to proceed. 'I, and I alone,' said his lordship in effect, 'am the Judge in all matters of law, and I cannot permit any observations to be made by way of supplement or otherwise to my judgment.'" what are the actual facts; and is the right of Commissioners Lynch and MacCarthy to co-ordinate jurisdiction with Judge Bewley in dispute; and if so, where is the distinction to be found?

MR. MADDEN: It appears that a question of law in regard to the redemption of tithe rent-charge was raised in the course of proceedings before the Land Purchase Commissioners, and an appeal from the decision of the Commissioners was taken to the Court of Appeal. On the argument of the appeal, it appeared that the matter had not been submitted to the Judicial Commissioner for his determination, and the Court sent it back in order that the question of law might be heard and determined by the Judicial Commissioner under the provisions of the 17th Section of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885. I have not the means of obtaining an official report as to what occurred on the occasion in question. But the observations attributed to the learned Judge would be perfectly accurate in relation to such a proceeding, in which the duty of hearing and determining the question of law referred to him devolves on the Judicial Commissioner, and on him alone.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Mid Lothian): Will the right hon. Gentleman have the kindness to explain to the House the intention of Her Majesty's Government in regard to the course of business on Government nights next week—Monday and Thursday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for asking that question. He is aware that the Government desired to place Monday and Thursday next at the disposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) for the Vote of Censure of which he has given notice; but that desire was coupled with the condition that previously to the consideration of that Motion the Tithe Bill should have passed through the remaining stages in this House. I regret that sufficient progress has not been made with that measure to enable the Government to carry out their original intention. The Tithe Bill stands on the Paper for this evening, but, unfortunately, looking at the number of Notices of Motion on the Paper, I am afraid there is very little chance of reaching it. I should not, therefore, be justified in asking hon. Gentlemen who take an interest in that measure to remain in attendance in the House on the bare chance of its being reached before 12 o'clock. Under these circumstances, the further consideration of the Tithe Bill must stand over until Monday, and if the Bill is not passed on that day I am afraid I must ask the House for further facilities for the completion of this measure. If we should complete the Bill on Monday, or before Thursday next, I shall ask the House to consider the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman on Thursday. It is understood, I think, under the circumstances of Public Business, that no more than two Government days will be occupied in the discussion. If we should not reach the Motion on Thursday, I am afraid I cannot now make any arrangements with regard to it. The pressure of Public Business makes it impossible for me to do so. I think it will be felt that I have made every effort on the part of the Government to meet the reasonable desire of the right hon. Gentleman to challenge the conduct of the Government. I trust, however, that the House will dispose of the Tithe Bill before Thursday, so that we may be in a position to entertain the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman on that day.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I wish to say, on the part of my right hon. Friend and myself, that I think the right hon. Gentleman has been perfectly fair and just in his proceedings with regard to the appointment of a time for my right hon. Friend's Motion. I agree with him in thinking that two nights are as much as can be fairly asked for the discussion of the Motion. That is quite understood. Nor am I surprised at his saying that it may be necessary for him, if we are not able to reach the Motion on Thursday, to allow a further period to elapse before making a positive arrangement. The right hon. Gentleman did not mention the cause, but I venture to assume that the cause is that the time of year has arrived when it is requisite for him to take some steps for making some progress in Supply. If that is so, it is a perfectly satisfactory reason.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir, that is the reason. I am most anxious not to trespass upon the time of private Members, if I can avoid doing so.

MR. SEXTON: I hope that due notice will be given to the Irish Members of the day when the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle will be discussed.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure the hon. Gentleman will see that I always desire as much as I possibly can to consider the convenience of the Irish Members. I should hope that by Tuesday it will be perfectly clear to the House when the Motion can be taken.

MR. LEA (Londonderry S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any information as to when the Irish Land Bill will come on?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot say when that Bill will be taken at present. When we reach it we shall take it from day to day.

COLONISATION.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Lords, to request that their Lordships will be pleased to give leave to the Viscount Gordon to attend to be examined as a witness before the Select Committee on Colonisation.—(Sir James Fergusson.)

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LIVERYMEN OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

(4.29.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) rose to call attention to the Livery Franchise of the City of London; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when the Government should, in accordance with the recommendation of the Report of the City Livery Charities Commission, take action to abolish the anomalous franchise now possessed by the Liverymen of the City of London, which gives a vote to persons who have no direct residential or business connection with the City, and thus increases the evils arising from the defective state of the Registration Laws, whereby many persons are prevented from becoming qualified electors, while others become entitled to a plurality of votes."

The hon. Member said: This is a question which has not been brought before the House for some considerable time. On the last occasion it was brought forward by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) in the year 1879. I shall have to trouble the House with a short history of this franchise, but I can promise that I will not go into any lengthened detail. At one time the 74 Companies that existed in the City had an actual life and being in connection with the crafts they represented. At the present time there are 12 great or wealthy Companies, owning a large amount of property, possessing most of them magnificent halls, and having a close livery. It is not to any great extent with them that we have to deal this evening. Besides these, however, there are 62 companies, which are known as the minor companies. Most of them are not at all wealthy, many of them have no permanent residences of their own; the fee for entering their liveries is a moderate one, and the liveries with their privileges are used as sources of revenue to the companies. I hope to be able to demonstrate to the House that this granting of the privileges of the livery for sums of money is not only detrimental to the life of the companies themselves, but leads to the manufacture of faggot-votes for the city of London. The origin of the Guilds is known, I believe, to all Members of the House. In early days they were representative of and had control of their particular crafts. They filled much the same position in connection with the commerce of the City of London as the chambers of commerce and trades' unions fill to-day. They dealt with all questions in connection with their crafts. How far they have fallen away from that position is well-known, and I think if you were to take the list of liverymen to-day you would find that many of the companies have no connection whatever with the crafts they are supposed to represent. It is most amusing to me on St. Thomas's Day to see a watchmaker putting in a plea for election as member of, say, the Spectacle Makers' Company on the ground that he is a watchmaker. There are few freemen who are members of the craft with which the company is nominally connected, and still fewer who have obtained admission to the livery by that which ought to be the only legitimate means, namely, that of having served an apprenticeship to the craft. The companies had many privileges down to a certain period of their history, but it is a good many years ago since they virtually lost all power over their trade. There are one or two of them which have some connection with the industries they are supposed to represent, and I am pleased to say there are one or two others which, whilst they have no legal control over their trades, still take some interest in the technical development of those trades. There are four means by which a person can become a member of one of these companies. The first is apprenticeship, the second patrimony, the third redemption or purchase, and the fourth election out of compliment in the case of a man of distinction. I think the Grocers' Company is only one to which admission cannot be obtained by purchase. Entrance by means of apprenticeship has largely ceased to be employed on account of the corruption of the apprenticeship system. There are, however, still many of the companies that keep up the system of apprenticeship, although they do not necessarily have what are technically known as City apprentices. But I am sorry to say that in connection with this honourable means of getting into companies very great abuses have sprung up. Persons are nominally apprenticed and, without having served in the trade, are at the end of seven years admitted to the livery upon the testimony of their nominal masters that they have served their time. This I look upon as a very dishonest means of admission to a company. The person who thus enters a company does not, however, at once become a liveryman. In the larger companies it is difficult to get into the livery, but some of the smaller companies go about touting for liverymen with the object of getting the 25 or 30 guineas that are paid as an admission fee. The governing body of a City Company is called the Court of Assistants or the Court of Wardens, and is appointed from the livery. I am not going to trouble the House by referring to the many Charters by which various privileges were given to City Companies. I will simply say that about the year 1435, the liverymen were given the right of voting for Members of Parliament for the City of London. At that time the City of London was really London, and within the city walls throbbed the life of the Metropolis. The banker lived over his counting-house, the artisan over his workshop, and the merchant over his warehouse. The franchise was then absolutely a popular franchise and one which could only be illustrated to-day by referring to our own system of household suffrage. It meant that all engaged in the various occupations and trades had a right to vote because they belong to a Guild and wore its livery. Of such a franchise as that no one could possibly complain, but what is the state of things now? These Guilds have lost their hold upon particular industries. Within the square mile of the City the life of London does not exist to-day. It has gone far beyond, and those who carry on the various avocations to-day do not think it necessary to belong to the Guilds. We have an entirely altered state of things in the City. Those who lived in the City of London in bygone times simply carry on business there now, and those who carry on business there have a qualification which gives them a dual suffrage, and I do not know why, whilst they are liverymen, they should have any other vote than that of liverymen. Yet this franchise is enjoyed, not only by these persons, but by persons who have no connection whatever with the City of London, directly or indirectly, and who do not live within its walls. The charters of these Companies in many cases limited the number of liverymen, and the Court of Common Council has done the same. But I want to call attention to this peculiar anomaly: As a rule it is considered that it is this House which increases the number of electors under any qualification, but in the case of these Companies it is not the House that extends the number of liverymen. It actually rests with the Court of Aldermen to say whether the number of liverymen in a particular company shall be increased. I would trouble the House with an illustration of this taken from the proceedings of the Court of Aldermen itself. In the year 1880 a Report was brought up from the General Purposes Committee of the Court of Aldermen upon a Petition from the Needle Makers' Company for an increase in the number of their livery. At the formation of the Company the number was fixed at 50. The Report suggested that the number should be increased to 100, and that the fee for admission should be increased from £5 10s. to 25 guineas. In the discussion that took place some of the City fathers protested strongly against the proposed increase. The Report of the General Purposes Committee of the Court of Aldermen having recommended an increase of 100, an Amendment was moved that the number should be 200. Sir Thomas Gabriel protested against the proposal, which amounted to a sale of votes for the City at 25 guineas apiece in the interest of a Company that might be in want of money; and another gentleman not unknown to this House—Alderman Sir Andrew Lusk—described the proceeding as the "creation of new faggot-votes at a cost of 25 guineas each." But, in spite of the wise advice of these and other gentlemen, the Court of Aldermen passed the Amendment, and created 200 new liverymen of one Company, and, be it observed, this is by no means one of the 12 large City Companies. Does any hon. or right hon. Gentleman here think that is a state of things which can be depended on? Does the House think that the right of voting for Members of this honourable House ought to be bartered away in that manner? Does it not think that there should be a substantial reason for a qualification—a much stronger one than the mere poverty of one of these Companies who want something to put into their coffers, and get that something for a sum which, to the wealthy nonentities who seek the livery, is a miserable pittance. The average gross annual increase in the number of persons on the livery is 500, but this figure is reduced to about 133 owing to deaths and objections sustained in the Revising Barrister's Court. A most extraordinary feature of the increase of the livery was that it took place mainly since the election of 1868. Was the motive of those responsible for the increase a desire to influence the representation of the City? I shall probably be told, as Mr. Alderman Cotton said when the question was brought forward on a former occasion by the hon. Member for Gateshead :—

“That two-thirds or three-fourths of the liverymen had votes independent of their freemanship in respect of premises which they occupied in the City.”

I have no doubt that point will be raised again, and that we shall be told “Well, it is quite true that a number of persons are on the franchise of the City for the livery, but if they were not in it in that way, they ought to be in some other way.” Let us consider whether this statement is well founded. An analysis has been made of the present register of the City of London. It contains 32,728 electors. If the 629 county electors are deducted there is a register of 32,099 electors. The total number of livery votes included in that figure is 7,756, and deducting 1,950 voters who appear on the occupier's list, there are left on the register a total of 5,806 voters who have no qualification as owners of business premises or as residents. That is a little circumstance that requires to be got over. We are told “Oh! it is true that an anomaly exists, it is a survival of the fittest, and does not do much damage.” As I have said, there has been an extraordinary development of the Livery Vote since the election of 1868. I will not trouble the House with many figures, but I should just like to mention what the increase has been since that date. I will give one or two examples of the way in which the voting power has gone up in connection with some of the minor companies—for I am not bringing a charge of a large increase against the larger companies, who are too Conservative to add to their numbers. The Basket Makers' in 1868 had one registered liveryman; in 1885, 27; and in 1891, 29. The Fan Makers' had 13 in 1868, 102 in 1885, 103 in 1891. The Framework Knitters' in the same years 21, 65, and 77; the Glovers', 34, 12, and 91; the Horners' 8, 11, and 41; the Needle Makers' 47, 104, and 83; the Pattern Makers', 20, 40, and 40; the Shipwrights' 26, 188, and 185; and the Tinsplate Workers', 9, 65, and 56. In 1868 there were 6,131 persons on the

Register for the City with a livery qualification; the number rose in 1885, and now it stands at 7,756. These figures speak for themselves. They are very interesting, and show the way in which the franchise is still increasing. I maintain that it is indefensible, and ought to have been abolished years ago. The livery franchise ought really to have been swept away in 1832, when the Reform Act was passed, and when a great number of these franchises were discontinued. Unfortunately, instead of being put an end to, the privileges of registered liverymen were enlarged under that Act, and also subsequently under the Representation of the People Act of 1867, the residential qualification being extended from a seven mile radius to a 25 mile radius of the City. In all parts of the country, except the City of London, a person to have a vote under a non-residential qualification must reside within seven miles of his business premises, but in the City of London, instead of seven miles, you have a radius of 25 miles, which takes in a large part of the country, and enables the register of the City to be swelled enormously. The City is already over-represented, and if it were treated like suburban constituencies the non-residential electors would have to go, and it would be impossible to make the register up to 32,000. Then it would be impossible for the City to claim two representatives, as compared with other parts of the country. Put London in the same position as other constituencies, and how does it stand? The unfortunate lodger who has to move into the next street is disqualified. The lodger qualification is a delusion, a snare, and a fraud to those unfortunate people who cannot take the whole of a house, and where they come under the absurd definition of lodgers, and by which they are robbed continually of the right to elect Members of this House. The City is the spoiled child of this House, and I await with a great deal of interest the defence which the representatives of the City may make against this fancy franchise of theirs. A man may have premises outside the City, and he has his vote as a City Liveryman, and he has his residential vote. And this is the way in which they create a legitimate representation of the people on great Imperial questions which are decided at the General Election. One defence of this is that it is ancient. It is ancient. Good in its origin, I will admit; now entirely superseded. We do not defend everything ancient. We do not believe a system of taxation good because it may have existed since the time of Elizabeth, though there are some illustrious people in this country who hold that opinion. It is said that liverymen are freeholders, and if that is so, every freeman of one of the large and wealthy companies is also a freeholder, because he is interested in the property of his company just as much as a liveryman. If that defence is put forward, you must be prepared to go a little further and ask for the qualification of the freemen of the City Companies as well as the City Liverymen. I do not know what defence can be put forward. I admit there is something sentimental in the defence of the representation of the Universities, by which learning is represented in this House—though in practice, the theory has not always been carried out, because when Oxford had the chance of turning out two of her best sons—Sir Robert Peel and the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Mid Lothian—Oxford took very good care to do it. I say there is only one course for the City, and it would be wise to accept it. The only remedy is that the evil should cease to exist. It is a blunder to resist reform, and the City should learn to march with the times. I am not going to ask the House to endorse the Report of the Royal Commission, namely—

“We think no further admission to the Livery Company should confer the Parliamentary franchise, and that such Act should contain a provision to this effect.”

That is signed: Lord Derby, the Duke of Bedford, Lord Sherbrooke, Lord Coleridge, Sydney W. Waterlow, Albert Pell, the late Mr. J. F. B. Firth, and my hon. Friend, the Member for Morpeth. Those were the Commissioners who reported that the time had come when this ridiculous and anomalous franchise should cease to exist. I shall be told that there was a Minority Report. There was, and it was to the effect that the recommendation did not come within the scope of the reference to the Royal Commission. That Report was signed by Sir Richard Assheton Cross, Baron de Rothschild, and Mr. Alderman W. J. R. Cotton. The first two have gone to another place, where Radicals cease from troubling and Tories are at rest; and Mr. Alderman Cotton has disappeared from the political arena, owing to the activity of the hon. Baronet opposite, and to the gratitude of the City of London for the way in which he fought all these questions when he was here. I am, therefore, asking the House to support my Motion because it has been recommended by the vast majority of a strong Royal Commission. Out of the three who signed the minority, two of them were Representatives of the City of London.

*SIR R. FOWLER (London): Not Lord Rothschild. His father was.

MR. ROWLANDS: Then I made a mistake. A strong whip has been issued against this Motion, and the opponents of this proposition in a Report say—

“The Companies consist of freemen, skilled artisans, partly of liverymen and for the most part of the middle classes, and they pay a considerable fee to the common purse to take out the livery.”

That is not a popular recommendation, nor one that will do the City much good outside its own borders. It is for these gentlemen to consider whether they should always be putting themselves in antagonism to the popular sentiment. Another extract from the Report of these friends of the liverymen says—

“So far as we can judge, no movement whatever exists in London either against the City or against the Livery Companies.”

Lord Cross reported there was no demand for municipal reform in London. Yet the very Government of which he was a member carried the Local Government scheme for which London was struggling. Is the same course going to be pursued now—that of denying the demand for this reform? When the Government had to swallow the bitter pill that was given them by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, whose Bill they opposed, I will not say by what means, in 1884, they took care of the continuity of the City of London by placing it at the head of London. They were successful then, but if they think that they are going to shelve this question to-day, they make a great mistake. If they resist this reform, they will simply draw public attention to the methods of the City, and be compelled to reform. I admit that this is only one branch of a bigger subject which will have to engross the attention of the country. I have troubled the House with this Motion because I think it a very anomalous qualification which exists in the City. I believe outside of London very few people are aware of it, and I shall consider I have done some good if I achieve nothing more than having called the attention of the public to this franchise. We must purify the means of election to this House. As long as you can in any part of the country purchase a vote for the election of a Parliamentary representative, it is a duty to fight against it, and not rest until the abuse is swept from the Statute Book.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when the Government should, in accordance with the recommendation of the Report of the City Livery Charities Commission, take action to abolish the anomalous franchise now possessed by the liverymen of the City of London, which gives a vote to persons who have no direct residential or business connection with the City, and thus increases the evils arising from the defective state of the Registration Laws, whereby many persons are prevented from becoming qualified electors, while others become entitled to a plurality of votes,"—(Mr. James Rowlands),

—instead thereof.

(5.13.) MR. BEAUFOY (Lambeth, Kennington): I think Representatives of Metropolitan constituencies may be excused for bringing before this House a question affecting London, for London matters do not receive that attention in this House to which they are justly entitled. I ask the House to carefully consider its vote on this occasion, because if it be adverse it will be considered out of doors that the time of the Royal Commission was wasted, and that the sooner some other method of inquiry is adopted, and some other way of bringing this question into publicity, the better it will be for the pockets of the people and the advancement of public business. It seems to me that if the Report of the Royal Commission was justified in 1884, it is more justified in 1891, because the Redistribution Bill of 1885 swept away a great many anomalies, leaving this one standing alone like an island surrounded by the sea. The representatives of the City would act wisely if they did something to carry this Resolution into effect. Of the many arguments used for the retention of this livery qualification, none appears of any worth whatever. Of course, we shall be told that this livery franchise represents the wealth and intelligence of the City of London. It seems to me that wealth is only too well represented in this House already, for in the majority of cases the qualification for a seat in this House is that its possessor should be a man of wealth, or, at all events, of a competence; and it also seems to me that we can only hope to deal with social questions in a safe and reasonable way, not by electing a large number of wealthy representatives, but by the introduction of more Members belonging to the working class, who would represent the wants and wishes of the masses of the people. But it is also said that these livery votes represent trade; undoubtedly, as my hon. Friend has shown, they did at one period represent the trade and commerce of this country, and to a certain extent we are under obligations to the City of London for the manly way in which the liveries stood up for liberty in days gone by; but if hon. Members will refer to the Report of the Royal Commission, they will, on reading page 19, come to the conclusion that the claim of the liverymen of London to represent trade is a fraud and a hollow sham, and rests on no solid foundation. Doubtless they do perform certain duties, but these are few and trivial, and there are none of them that could not be much better discharged by properly constituted and competent public authorities than is the case at the present moment. Let me take, as an example, the Fishmongers' Company. That Company does, I believe, exercise a certain amount of control over Billingsgate Market, and for that we are greatly obliged to them; but there is no other city in the world that would be content to leave the control of the purification and regulation of a large and important supply of the food of its inhabitants in the hands of an irresponsible private body. Surely, if such a market is to be controlled at all, it should be by some body which is itself amenable to public control and not by an irresponsible company who may or who may not discharge their duties. It is, moreover, a matter of fact that even in the discharge of this duty it has no statutory warrant, but its action is simply referable to a memorial custom which has existed in the City, and which renders it exceedingly difficult for any alteration to be made. It seems to me that even if it were desirable that trade should have a special representation in this House, and that we should here admit the representatives of special class interests, the City Companies are by no means the best representatives that could be found. Take, for instance, the Apothecaries' Company. They perform a certain public duty, and may in some degree be said to represent medicine, but if medicine is to be represented, it ought not to be by the Apothecaries' Company. Why should we not go to the College of Physicians or the College of Surgeons, and ask them to send representatives to this House—men who should represent not the very base and bottom of the profession, but the higher degrees of that profession, who might be expected to speak with weight and authority in this assembly. Again, there is the Scriveners' Company, who may be said in some sense to represent the public interest, because they institute examinations for notaries. I must confess that I am not very clear in my own mind as to what a notary is, but, at any rate, a notary cannot act in the City of London unless he has passed the examination instituted by the Scriveners' Company. Although in some degree that Company represents the lower branches of the legal profession, if we were to allow them to send representatives here we should be doing a gross injustice to the rest of the profession, because we should be ignoring the Incorporated Law Society, which in every sense is more fitted to represent the law. Therefore it appears to me that the claim made in support of the livery franchise on the ground of the representation of trade must, under these circumstances, fall to the ground. In point of fact these gentlemen are not the representatives of trade, they represent no one but themselves. Hon. Members may remember the very interesting speech which was made by the hon. Member for Dundee some time ago on the question of the University franchise. Everyone who heard that speech must have felt that the hon. Gentleman had an exceedingly good case. He urged that all these fancy franchises were bad, but if the University franchise is bad it is not nearly so bad or so mischievous as the livery franchise, because the University is an independent constituency in itself. The members of the University return a representative of their own, and do not interfere with any other constituency, but in the case of the Livery Companies the liverymen swamp and overturn the votes of people much better qualified for the exercise of the franchise. To this extent the livery franchise is wrong. We have had already heard something about the minority Report signed by three eminent gentlemen, members of the Commission, who came to the conclusion that this subject of the livery franchise did not come within the scope of that inquiry, but however eminent these gentlemen might be, it appears that their colleagues did not agree with them, as they were in a minority. But there was one representative of the City who was really true to his colours, and who in a Report drawn up by himself defended the livery franchise up to the hilt, a procedure more creditable to the zeal than to the understanding of the hon. Gentleman. He seemed to think we ought not to disfranchise anybody. I may say that personally I have no such desire, but I think we ought to see that before we give superfluous votes everybody who is entitled to a vote should have that vote. Therefore we are anxious to remove this stumbling block to the proper exercise of the franchise, in order that we may be enabled to do justice to those thousands of the working classes who have difficulty in getting upon the register, not because they are not substantially qualified, but because they are excluded by the conditions of residence. Having adopted one general form of franchise, it seems to me that these exceptions in favor of a particular class are most invidious and unsatisfactory, and I think the House would do well to show by its vote to-night that it will no longer allow such a state of things to continue. We may be told that this Motion is an attack upon the City. For my own part, I may say that if I am engaged in an attack on the City I am only doing one of those things for which I was sent to this House. The City is not in particularly good odour just now outside its own particular boundaries. The people outside the City are conscious they are suffering grievous injustice on account of the exceptional position occupied by the City itself, and they desire to get this injustice remedied. We may be told that this is not an opportune time for bringing this subject forward. We are told the minority have no right to stir in these matters. But, although we are now in a minority, I have no doubt that that state of things will undergo a change before very long. We have already had more than one bye-election, in which the principles we profess have predominated, and we have had a County Council election which was indicative of a state of feeling very different from that which made the Parliamentary representation of the Metropolis what it is. I appeal to hon. Members opposite, and especially to those members of the County Council who have seats in this House, although, as a rule, they are supporters of the Government, to give us their assistance in carrying this Resolution; it is quite time we should take this matter into serious consideration. There have been many difficulties in obtaining the opportunity we have now secured. Only last year my hon. Friend secured a day for his Motion, but at the last moment the Government swooped down upon us and appropriated it themselves. Only the other day the Motion was in imminent jeopardy of suffering a similar fate on this occasion: but, having at last obtained the opportunity of thoroughly ventilating the question, I hope that we shall show that if we may not be in a majority, nevertheless a very large number of Members of this House regard the livery vote as an injurious monopoly, which is wrong in principle, as introducing a fancy franchise into the Constitution, and a monstrous injustice to that greater London whose claims for recollection have been so long ignored.

*(5.30.) VISCOUNT LYMINGTON (Devon, S. Molton): I very much regret that the hon. Members who have already spoken have treated the question very much from a Party point of view, for it is impossible to argue the question entirely on Party grounds. The hon. Member who brought forward the Motion has given the House an interesting history of livery franchise, which was, however, abruptly cut short at the year 1867. Since that date a great Reform Bill has been passed by the Liberal Party at the time when it was at the zenith of its power, both in numbers, and unity, and cohesion; and if livery franchise is absolutely inconsistent with all Liberal principles it is strange that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division, should not have exercised their great influence and have brought the matter before the House. As to what had been said in regard to the recommendations of the City Livery Charities Commission, I never heard a Report of a Royal Commission treated so curiously as the Mover of the Resolution has treated the Report of that Commission. In the first place, he singled out a particular clause from a general Report, and founded his case upon it. This, it seems to me, is essentially a question which can only be properly dealt with, if at all, as a whole, in a comprehensive measure, and not in piecemeal manner, that is now being attempted. I particularly object to the process of picking out from a Report a special clause and dealing with it by itself, irrespective of its bearing on other parts of the Report. The hon. Member asks the House to support his Motion in accordance with the recommendation of the Commission; and to abolish the anomalous franchise now possessed by the City of London liverymen. But that is precisely what the Report avoids recommending; and, as a matter of fact, the recommendations of the Commission are not in accordance with the hon. Gentleman's Motion. The Report recommends that in future no further cases of livery franchise shall be created, but it did not propose to abolish the existing franchise. My hon. Friend's Motion, on the contrary, is a Motion for disenfranchisement. Again, Sir, it is quite contrary to the facts of the case to state that the livery franchise gives a vote to persons who have no direct business connection with the City. I think that by examples I can practically show the absurdity of that statement. It has always been felt that the City occupies a peculiar position as being, though not a place of residence, the centre of the commerce of the world. Owing to the fact that many great business concerns have been converted into Joint Stock Companies, many of the most representative men in the City would not have a vote for the City if they did not exercise the franchise as members of livery companies. The hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London is in that position, as are the hon. Member for the Sevenoaks Division of Kent, Mr. Tufnell the Chairman of the Royal Mail Steamship Company, and the great Spicer firm, the great Nonconformist firm in the City; owing to the fact that for general convenience it is the custom to register banks and other Joint Stock Companies in the names of their secretaries only, it follows that but for such votes as those conferred by the livery franchise some of the most influential, important, wealthy, and intelligent men in the City would otherwise be utterly unrepresented.

MR. ROWLANDS: Why should they not be?

*VISCOUNT LYMINGTON: I am endeavouring to disprove the statement that the livery voters do not really represent large and important interests. The hon. Member who brought forward the Motion said that the result of the livery franchise is the manufacture of faggot-votes. If so, it is the most expensive process of manufacture that I have heard of. If any Livery Company wishes to enlarge its franchise for political purposes it must first be free from the common restriction, by charter, of the number of its members. In the second place you would have, if I may use the phrase, to "square" that particular company, and having done that you would have also to "square" the Court of Aldermen, which is an open court in which political opinions for a long time have been equally divided. Then, if permission to increase the number of liverymen had been obtained, the faggot-voters would have to be elected by their companies, and as there are representatives of both parties in every company, the new liverymen would not be all of one party. A stronger objection is that a liveryman must have held his position for a year before he can exercise his franchise. Having made careful investigation, I find that the least amount for which any one can become a livery man is £30. That is in the Plumbers' Company. I think that in his calculation my hon. Friend forgot that in addition to the fees to be paid to the Court there is a Stamp Duty of three guineas to be paid to the Government. Again, the livery fines vary considerably. In the Mercers Company the Livery fine is only £4 13s., whereas the freedom fine is £200. I do not think my hon. Friend has adduced any argument in favour of dealing with this question by piece-meal legislation. On the contrary, the facts show that the livery franchise can be used by no political party for corrupt purposes. At the time when the Liberal Party was not very popular in the corner, something of the creation of faggot-votes, and I know that you saw votes were usually crept in. At Faggot-votes may or they are created for £30. abuse of the Parliament may not be an but it is clear that then Elementary franchise, cannot be utilised for the manufacture of faggot-votes. As the livery franchise question, it seems to me that the City of London stands in a position as the centre of the general commerce of the country, and as the head of the commerce of the world. Its position is a fact analogous to the occupied by the Universities in relation to the representation of learning. The arguments of the hon. Members are based on conditions which cannot obtain, and they have not advanced one single case of the abuses they allege. There are anomalies of all kinds in the Parliamentary franchise, and if the House is to remove all anomalies and to proceed purely on the principle of "One man one vote" in settling the franchise, it must be based strictly on population. Then the number of the Irish Representatives would have to be curtailed. I hope that the Government and the House will decline to accept the proposal of the hon. Member, because it is not justifiable in itself, and does not carry out the statements made in the Amendment. If the question is to be dealt with at all, it must be dealt with carefully and comprehensively, and not in the piecemeal manner proposed.

*(5.45.) MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): As the noble Lord has pointed out, the Report of the Royal Commission upon which the Motion before the House is avowedly based contains, as a matter of fact, no such recommendations as those attributed to it. The words of the Resolution request the Government to take action to abolish the right of voting now possessed; whereas the Report of the Royal Commission merely recommends that no further franchise shall be conferred, and that any future Act on the subject shall contain provisions to this effect. The hon. Member, in moving the Resolution, has admitted that it deals with only a small part of a large question. It would, indeed, be altogether inconsistent and unwise on the part of the House to attempt to abolish in this fashion a franchise which has been in existence for 500 years, seeing especially that the whole subject of representation in the House of Commons has been carefully reviewed and dealt with more than once of recent years. The hon. Member (Mr. J. Rowlands) who introduced the Motion pronounced the livery franchise to be ridiculous. But what makes it ridiculous, and since when has it become so? The whole subject was carefully considered in 1832. It was considered again by the leaders of the two Parties in solemn conclave in 1867. It was reviewed again, I imagine with equal care, in 1884, and on each occasion it may be presumed that the political leaders for good reasons held the franchise to be fair and just. Yet now we are asked to reverse these decisions, and, by so doing, virtually to pass a Vote of Censure on those former Parliaments which deliberately arrived at this decision. The hon. Member seems to have been a little wrong in his arithmetic. He told the House that these abominable creatures, livery voters, increased at the rate of 500 a year. How can he make that out, when their number in 1868 was only 6,000, and now it was only 7,700?

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I gave 500 as the gross average increase, but said that deaths and other causes——

*MR. KIMBER: Even then the hon. Member's figures are not correct, as the increase in 22 years has been only from 6,000 to 7,700. I do not wish to impute to him that he says what he does not believe, but these inaccuracies make his case all the more lamentable, seeing that he bases it upon such fallacies. The fact should not be forgotten, in considering the qualifications of the liverymen as voters, that as members of the Livery Companies they are called upon to perform certain duties and to exercise certain rights. It is an old and respected maxim that representation should go along with taxation. What is the position of the Livery Companies in this respect? They have corporate property belonging to them, property which by the law they can divide amongst themselves to-morrow if they wish, and on that property they have been deliberately taxed, by the present House of Commons and by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, higher than any other class of the community. I allude to the £5 per cent. levied on their corporate revenues. If these liverymen are amenable to taxation on their property, then surely they have rights of representation in connection with it. Why should those rights be taken away and the taxation left? It seems to me that the word "confiscation" would be a mild one to apply to such a proceeding. Then, again, we are told that this livery franchise results in nothing less than faggot voters and votes to be purchased by money payments. But what is the ordinary franchise itself? Upon the payment of 4s. a week, or £10 a year, anyone who wishes can obtain a vote. That is a very small sum compared with what a livery vote costs. At the end of the Motion it is stated that the existence of the livery franchise increases the evils arising from the defective state of the Registration Laws,

"Whereby many persons are prevented from becoming qualified electors, while others become entitled to a plurality of votes."

In regard to the first of the two last statements it is, so far as I can see, absolutely meaningless and unintelligible. As to the second statement, it seems to imply that the hon. Member is under the delusion that residents in the City, if they are liverymen as well, possess two votes.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Oh, no.

*MR. KIMBER: Then the hon. Member must mean in his Resolution to ask the House to support the principle of "one man one vote," because that is the only other interpretation which can be put upon his words. If that is so, I shall be glad to hear it, because that will obviously involve a still more serious alteration in the present law of representation. Then the hon. Member has admitted that on the register of the City Companies there are 5,800 voters, none of whom possess, he says, any qualification other than their connection with a Livery Company. Now he cannot have taken the slightest pains to ascertain what those figures really mean. There are, as a matter of fact—and as I know from personal knowledge—large numbers of men, junior members of firms, head clerks, and so forth, who perform some of the most important and laborious work in the City of London, and yet who, but for their connection with the City Companies, would not be entitled to any votes whatever. In the case of my own firm, for instance, neither of the two junior members, both graduates of Oxford University, and otherwise well fitted to exercise the franchise, was entitled to a vote, as each lived under the paternal roof, and neither has any sort of interest in the business premises. These are the cases which the livery franchise meet. The Act of 1867 was a measure as to the necessity of which all parties are agreed. It cannot be said to have been a Conservative Act, although it was passed by a Conservative Government. What was the state of things in the City at the time? The City was represented by four Liberals, and it was not until the election of 1868 that the Conservatives were able to secure one of the four seats. The Act of 1867 not only left the livery franchise intact, but extended the residential qualification from 7 to 25 miles. It is all very well for hon. Members to denounce the livery franchise as ridiculous and anomalous now that the political complexion of the City has been changed. There is another point of view from which this question should be looked at. The question of individual suffrage is, and must always be, intimately connected with the distribution of seats. The fact of there being 5,000 more votes in the City than there would be if the liverymen had no votes does not send any more Members to Parliament. It may be said it makes the position of my hon. Friend (Sir R. Fowler) more secure; it does not add to or take from the number of Members of Parliament, but if the question of distribution of seats is not taken in hand when you disfranchise so large a proportion as 5,000 voters out of 32,000 you may unfairly throw a seat from one side to the other. We hear much of the necessity of concessions to Ireland, but the day may not be far distant when England will ask something from Ireland. [Cries of "Question!"] It is the question. I recollect that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was speaking of the alleged inequalities between England and Ireland—it was before his conversion or perversion to Home Rule—said—

"I know of no inequalities except two, and those are: first, that Irishmen are free from certain taxes"—

I think he alluded to the House Tax, and the Land Tax—

Now we are to have a third inequality. While we have 86 Irishmen opposed to us here—a number out of all proportion to the numbers who send them here—we are to have the suffrage in our own constituencies cut down, which may, perhaps, throw additional seats from our side to the side of our opponents. I denounce this Motion as an ambitious attempt to deal with legislation which has always been considered one of the most important branches of our legislation, and I maintain that to attempt to deal with the subject in this offhand and piecemeal way is to reduce a large and important subject to most ridiculous dimensions.

*(6.7.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): When the noble Lord the Member for South Molton rose, all who had heard previous speeches of his knew that we should hear most that is to be said against this Amendment. The noble Lord's remarks have been supplemented by those of the hon. Member for Wandsworth, yet I must own I do not think any case has been made out against the Amendment. The noble Lord and the hon. Member for Wandsworth resorted to an argument which can be used against any change or reform, namely, that in the case of a previous Bill this change was not introduced by the Party that is now recommending it. If this is to be regarded as a valid argument the Liberal Party may as well shut up their business at once, because the argument applies against every possible reform. The noble Lord put it in the most favourable form when he said the Liberal Party at the zenith of its power brought in a great Reform Bill that was meant to be comprehensive and yet did not welcome this change. It was during the passage of that Bill through Parliament that the Liberal Government was turned out of Office by a hostile vote in the House of Commons. [Mr. MATTHEWS: The noble Lord referred to the Bill of 1884.] That being the case, it can scarcely be said the Liberal Party was in the zenith of its power. And that Bill was, as is well known on both sides of the House, of the nature of a compromise, and it could not have been passed through the House of Commons and the House of Lords at that time unless it had been of such a nature. It was well known that many very important points of which the Liberal Party was then and is now in favour were only kept back because of the nature of the Bill; indeed, the Redistribution Bill was actually turned into an Act by the Conservative Government. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Kimber) asked us to bring in a comprehensive measure:—"Why," he said, "do you come down on Tuesdays and Fridays and propose abstract Resolutions about the livery vote." No change in the Parliamentary representation of this country has ever been made without having been introduced on a Tuesday or Friday year after year. The use of these Resolutions was that in a cool atmosphere the whole case can be put by its advocates before the House of Commons, and through the House of Commons to the country. The country can then see how much political backing a political question has. Unless Sir E. Baines had year after year introduced his Resolution for the reduction of the borough franchise, and unless other Members had done the same thing in respect of the county franchise, I do not hesitate to say those measures would never have been passed. The noble Lord gave a perfectly fair account of the Report of the Commission, but we are not acting only on the Report of the Commission. We want to go into the merits of the question, and on the merits there can be no doubt whatever. This Resolution refers to one constituency only, but it establishes a great principle. That constituency has only a population of 50,000, and has two Members allotted to it. That made the question very important, because, in the first place, that means an excess of political power in this particular constituency; and, in the next place, it may be said to be a sort of ideal constituency, with regard to which we ought to establish an ideal representation. What is the real condition of the constituency? There are in the constituency 21,000 occupiers and 7,500 livery voters. I was reading the other day a most interesting book, The History of the Boroughs, published in 1794, at the moment when in the old Whig Party the ideas of popular representation were at a higher level than they have reached ever since, and in it I read that—

It is quite true that those 22,000, as described by the Member for Finsbury, were real, genuine residents living on the spot. But that is all altered now, and of those 22,000 occupiers I suppose that not more than one-third, or some 7,000, are real residents, and these are in a worse position than any other voters in the Kingdom. Elsewhere the resident voters are, so to say, diluted by non-resident voters, but in the City of London they are swamped. The constituency of Central Glasgow most nearly resembles the City of London. Of the 11,000 occupying voters 3,000 live outside the Division. In the case of the City of London, not 3,000 but 10,000 live outside the City. That grievance would be enough, but it is not all. Besides these out-voters, the 7,000 resident voters have to contend likewise with 7,500 livery voters, of whom not more than one quarter have any premises in the City, and probably not more than 1-10th or 1-20th reside in the City. They have bought the franchise with money down, just as they would buy a horse or a piece of furniture. Some of the prices given are very large. In the Clothworkers' Company it cost 100 guineas. In the Fishmongers' and the Goldsmiths' about 30 guineas. In the Fishmongers' there are 432 liverymen, and in the Clothworkers' 150 liverymen. Who are these bodies that they should be so represented even according to the theory that property ought to be represented? The Fishmongers, have, I believe, an income of £55,000, and the Clothworkers' an income of £50,000. Now, supposing a country gentleman, or a man of business, has £50,000 a year, he will probably have three or four votes; if he is a brewer he may perhaps have 11 or 12. But these companies, with the same incomes as rich landed proprietors or men of business, have not 3 or 4, or 11 or 12, but 300 or 400 votes. They are, therefore, even on the theory that property should have a special representation, monstrously over-represented. I would just ask the House to look at the question of privilege as it exists in the City. The resident householders have 7,000 votes out of 29,000; that is to say, that each resident householder in the City has one-fourth of a vote. Now, let us see what the privileged classes have. First of all a member of these classes votes for the villa in which he lives at a distance from the City, or for his house in one of the fashionable parts of London. Secondly, he votes for his freehold property in the City as a county voter for the Hornsey Division. And not only does he vote for the Hornsey Division, where he does not reside and where he has not a shred of property, but he is so tenderly treated that two booths, and in one case three booths, are actually set up in the Guildhall in order that he may give his vote for Hornsey without having to leave his business for more than five minutes. This has been disputed once in the House, but I have documents which prove it beyond all doubt. In the third place he has a vote for the City itself—a vote which can be bought with money—and in the fourth place if he belongs to the class of University men and has taken out his M.A. degree, he can vote for his University. The noble Lord near me was, I believe, somewhat inaccurate in his statement as to the price of these livery votes. I think he was misinformed when he said it cost £25 to procure a vote. There are some Companies which are practically kept up for the purpose of making these votes. [Cries of “No!”] Well, it looks very like it. The Playing Card Makers' Company possess no property and charge a fee of 23 guineas for admission. The Loriners have no land; there are 438 liverymen and the fine is £12. The Basket Makers' Company, with 29 liverymen, has an income of £35 from fees, and that is all spent on one entertainment. Now, if there is any sense about this system, if votes should be bought for money, the price should be the same, instead of varying from £120 or so to £12. But who would seriously propose to reform the livery franchise in such a way? There is only one possible reform, and that is to sweep it away altogether. Since the change in the franchise that my hon. Friend referred to, a man can by paying £12 or £20 live anywhere in Middlesex, or in the heart of Kent or Essex, almost any where in Surrey or in parts of Bucks and Herts, and yet assist in voting down the real residents of the City of London. This great injustice is accompanied by smaller injustices. The liveryman may change his residence as often as he likes, but when once he has paid his money he retains his vote for life. The ordinary householder, whenever he changes his residence and goes outside the precincts of the City, loses his one-fourth of a vote, sometimes for 18 months, and sometimes for much longer periods. The liveryman is not subject to the personal payment of rates and to all the chances of losing his vote that such a condition involves, but the ordinary householder has to pay his rates up to the day or he loses his vote. This country is pretty tolerant of anomalies if any public reason can be given for them, but for these anomalies no public reason can be given. There are, it is true, some 20,000 freemen still remaining in our large towns, but they are for the most part freemen of the whole town. They may have some local patriotism, some feeling that they owe something to the community—something of that feeling which in old days the liverymen of London displayed when they insisted that their Member should represent them on the floor of this House, even though he was rejected by the great majority of Members of the House. But in this case the liverymen are not attached to a great city. They are attached to certain isolated bodies, and I ask what reason is there that those bodies should have a special representation? Of all bodies they probably need

reform the most. I will read to the House the mere headings of the reforms which the Commission recommended, and which has not been carried out. They recommended that measures should be taken to prevent the alienation of the property of the Companies, and that means should be taken to secure the permanent application of a considerable portion of the corporate income to useful purposes. I am not throwing reflections on the Companies in this respect. They further recommended that a new trust should be declared where a better application of the trust moneys of the Companies had become desirable. Then came the recommendation about the franchise, which the House has already heard, and then there were recommendations that colourable apprenticeships should cease, and that excessive sums should no longer be spent on entertainments and on the maintenance and relief of poor members. Who were they who made these recommendations? Were they violent Radicals? They were Lord Derby, Lord Sherbrooke, the late Duke of Bedford, and Lord Coleridge. I object to these bodies having special representation in order that when these questions come before the House of Commons they should have an undue number of Members in this House to stand in the way of reform. The principle upon which we bring forward this Motion and support it is very simple. It is a principle which, during the last two generations, has constantly inspired all the changes which Parliament has made in reforming our representation, and that principle is, that to secure good Government, the Government should be in the hands of the greatest possible number of intelligent and independent men, and that each of these men who is sufficiently intelligent and independent to be a citizen shall have an exactly equal voice in the Government of the country. That has not been secured yet; but that has been the tendency of our legislation, and we ask that this system shall be abolished, that the residents—the real residents, the householders of the City of London—may have fair play in this question of the franchise, and not be absolutely swamped, as no other constituency in the country is, by people who have votes elsewhere. Those bankers, merchants, and others of high character, of whom the noble Lord spoke as having votes in the City of London, surely they live somewhere—they are not houseless when they leave the City—and they have votes elsewhere? When we bring forward this Motion we want real argument, and until we get that argument we cannot but believe that the only opposition to this change is because the change may be of advantage to one political Party and a disadvantage to the other. That argument has been freely brought forward outside this House, but I am sure it will not be used in the House. In discussing these subjects we discuss them not from the point of view whether these men hold our opinions or the opinions of our political opponents, but apart from such considerations. It is our business to see that every citizen shall have fair play, and neither more nor less than fair play, in getting his share of political power; and in order that this principle may be established in the central constituency of the kingdom, where at the present moment it is extravagantly violated, my hon. Friend has brought forward this Motion, and I trust that every Member who looks at these questions not from the point of view of Party, but of principle, will vote with him.

(6.45.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): In his opening remarks the right hon. Gentleman showed a singular forgetfulness of the achievements of his own Party. He described the reform of 1884—not of 1885—as that of the Conservative Party. That I deny. His Party was in power when the Bill became an Act, and was responsible for its final success, though not for its introduction. In December, 1884, the Act received the Royal Assent, and it is the great Party of which the right hon. Gentleman is so distinguished a Member that has the full credit of that Act. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that it is the duty of the Liberal Party to be perpetually tinkering with the Constitution, and that if they do not do so they may as well shut up shop. He appears to think that every few years the whole system of the franchise on which representation in this House exists is to be reviewed and repaired, and that there should be no finality—that the tree should be constantly dug up by the roots to see how it is growing. I have listened attentively to the Debate, and the only argument I have heard against this franchise is that it is an anomaly. But though it is in some sense an anomaly, the framers of all previous reform Bills have left it untouched as they have many other anomalies. Why should it be attacked now? Nor is this so-called “fancy” franchise without its parallel in other parts of the country. Similar franchises exist in Leicester, Lincoln, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Newcastle-under-Lyme, Nottingham, and Stafford. All these towns have their “fancy” franchise, and it is difficult to see why London should be picked out for special legislation. The right hon. Gentleman asserts that the only proper electorate for the City of London is its rated residents—a population of some 50,000 persons, consisting mainly of servants and caretakers, with a parson or two, while the wealth and intelligence of the City of London are to be left wholly unrepresented. That appears to me to be a representation of the City of London almost grotesque. The half million people who constitute the life, energy, intelligence, trade of the City of London are not really residents. I agree that as a matter of principle and for rough convenience some limit should be placed on the distance of out-voters. The ordinary limit is seven miles; in the case of these liverymen it is 25 miles. Having regard to the conditions of the suburban life of London, is this such an unreasonable limit? In the Local Government Act passed only two years ago the limit was fixed at 15 miles. Is that to be considered a retrograde step? Are we to be told that what we did two years ago is not to be mentioned as any ground or reason for our action now? I do not stand by this limit of 25 miles, but it is obvious that under the circumstances of the City of London some larger range of out-residents, as we may call them, is question to-day, they make a great mistake. If they resist this reform, they will simply draw public attention to the methods of the City, and be compelled to reform. I admit that this is only one branch of a bigger subject which will have to engross the attention of the country. I have troubled the House with this Motion because I think it a very anomalous qualification which exists in the City. I believe outside of London very few people are aware of it, and I shall consider I have done some good if I achieve nothing more than having called the attention of the public to this franchise. We must purify the means of election to this House. As long as you can in any part of the country purchase a vote for the election of a Parliamentary representative, it is a duty to fight against it, and not rest until the abuse is swept from the Statute Book.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when the Government should, in accordance with the recommendation of the Report of the City Livery Charities Commission, take action to abolish the anomalous franchise now possessed by the liverymen of the City of London, which gives a vote to persons who have no direct residential or business connection with the City, and thus increases the evils arising from the defective state of the Registration Laws, whereby many persons are prevented from becoming qualified electors, while others become entitled to a plurality of votes,"—(Mr. James Rowlands.)
—instead thereof.

* (5.13.) MR. BEAUFOY (Lambeth, Kennington): I think Representatives of Metropolitan constituencies may be excused for bringing before this House a question affecting London, for London matters do not receive that attention in this House to which they are justly entitled. I ask the House to carefully consider its vote on this occasion, because if it be adverse it will be considered out of doors that the time of the Royal Commission was wasted, and that the sooner some other method of inquiry is adopted, and some other way of bringing this question into publicity, the better it will be for the pockets of the people and the advancement of public business. It seems to me that if the Report of the Royal Commission was justified in 1884, it is more justified in 1891, because the Redistribution Bill of 1885 swept away a great many anomalies, leaving this one standing alone like an island surrounded by the sea. The representatives of the City would act wisely if they did something to carry this Resolution into effect. Of the many arguments used for the retention of this livery qualification, none appears of any worth whatever. Of course, we shall be told that this livery franchise represents the wealth and intelligence of the City of London. It seems to me that wealth is only too well represented in this House already, for in the majority of cases the qualification for a seat in this House is that its possessor should be a man of wealth, or, at all events, of a competence; and it also seems to me that we can only hope to deal with social questions in a safe and reasonable way, not by electing a large number of wealthy representatives, but by the introduction of more Members belonging to the working class, who would represent the wants and wishes of the masses of the people. But it is also said that these livery votes represent trade; undoubtedly, as my hon. Friend has shown, they did at one period represent the trade and commerce of this country, and to a certain extent we are under obligations to the City of London for the manly way in which the liveries stood up for liberty in days gone by; but if hon. Members will refer to the Report of the Royal Commission, they will, on reading page 19, come to the conclusion that the claim of the liverymen of London to represent trade is a fraud and a hollow sham, and rests on no solid foundation. Doubtless they do perform certain duties, but these are few and trivial, and there are none of them that could not be much better discharged by properly constituted and competent public authorities than is the case at the present moment. Let me take, as an example, the Fishmongers' Company. That Company does, I believe, exercise a certain amount of control over Billingsgate Market, and for that we are greatly obliged to them; but there is no other city in the world that would be content to leave the control of the purification

and regulation of a large and important supply of the food of its inhabitants in the hands of an irresponsible private body. Surely, if such a market is to be controlled at all, it should be by some body which is itself amenable to public control and not by an irresponsible company who may or who may not discharge their duties. It is, moreover, a matter of fact that even in the discharge of this duty it has no statutory warrant, but its action is simply referable to a memorial custom which has existed in the City, and which renders it exceedingly difficult for any alteration to be made. It seems to me that even if it were desirable that trade should have a special representation in this House, and that we should here admit the representatives of special class interests, the City Companies are by no means the best representatives that could be found. Take, for instance, the Apothecaries' Company. They perform a certain public duty, and may in some degree be said to represent medicine, but if medicine is to be represented, it ought not to be by the Apothecaries' Company. Why should we not go to the College of Physicians or the College of Surgeons, and ask them to send representatives to this House—men who should represent not the very base and bottom of the profession, but the higher degrees of that profession, who might be expected to speak with weight and authority in this assembly. Again, there is the Scriveners' Company, who may be said in some sense to represent the public interest, because they institute examinations for notaries. I must confess that I am not very clear in my own mind as to what a notary is, but, at any rate, a notary cannot act in the City of London unless he has passed the examination instituted by the Scriveners' Company. Although in some degree that Company represents the lower branches of the legal profession, if we were to allow them to send representatives here we should be doing a gross injustice to the rest of the profession, because we should be ignoring the Incorporated Law Society, which in every sense is more fitted to represent the law. Therefore it appears to me that the claim made in support of the livery franchise on the ground of the representation of trade must, under these circumstances, fall to the ground. In point of fact these gentlemen are not the representatives of trade, they represent no one but themselves. Hon. Members may remember the very interesting speech which was made by the hon. Member for Dundee some time ago on the question of the University franchise. Everyone who heard that speech must have felt that the hon. Gentleman had an exceedingly good case. He urged that all these fancy franchises were bad, but if the University franchise is bad it is not nearly so bad or so mischievous as the livery franchise, because the University is an independent constituency in itself. The members of the University return a representative of their own, and do not interfere with any other constituency, but in the case of the Livery Companies the liverymen swamp and overturn the votes of people much better qualified for the exercise of the franchise. To this extent the livery franchise is wrong. We have had already heard something about the minority Report signed by three eminent gentlemen, members of the Commission, who came to the conclusion that this subject of the livery franchise did not come within the scope of that inquiry, but however eminent these gentlemen might be, it appears that their colleagues did not agree with them, as they were in a minority. But there was one representative of the City who was really true to his colours, and who in a Report drawn up by himself defended the livery franchise up to the hilt, a procedure more creditable to the zeal than to the understanding of the hon. Gentleman. He seemed to think we ought not to disfranchise anybody. I may say that personally I have no such desire, but I think we ought to see that before we give superfluous votes everybody who is entitled to a vote should have that vote. Therefore we are anxious to remove this stumbling block to the proper exercise of the franchise, in order that we may be enabled to do justice to those thousands of the working classes who have difficulty in getting upon the register, not because they are not substantially qualified, but because they are excluded by the conditions of residence. Having adopted one general form of franchise, it seems to me that these exceptions in favor of a particular class are most invidious and unsatisfactory, and I think the House would do well to show by its vote to-night that it will no longer allow such a state of things to continue. We may be told that this Motion is an attack upon the City. For my own part, I may say that if I am engaged in an attack on the City I am only doing one of those things for which I was sent to this House. The City is not in particularly good odour just now outside its own particular boundaries. The people outside the City are conscious they are suffering grievous injustice on account of the exceptional position occupied by the City itself, and they desire to get this injustice remedied. We may be told that this is not an opportune time for bringing this subject forward. We are told the minority have no right to stir in these matters. But, although we are now in a minority, I have no doubt that that state of things will undergo a change before very long. We have already had more than one bye-election, in which the principles we profess have predominated, and we have had a County Council election which was indicative of a state of feeling very different from that which made the Parliamentary representation of the Metropolis what it is. I appeal to hon. Members opposite, and especially to those members of the County Council who have seats in this House, although, as a rule, they are supporters of the Government, to give us their assistance in carrying this Resolution; it is quite time we should take this matter into serious consideration. There have been many difficulties in obtaining the opportunity we have now secured. Only last year my hon. Friend secured a day for his Motion, but at the last moment the Government swooped down upon us and appropriated it themselves. Only the other day the Motion was in imminent jeopardy of suffering a similar fate on this occasion: but, having at last obtained the opportunity of thoroughly ventilating the question, I hope that we shall show that if we may not be in a majority, nevertheless a very large number of Members of this House regard the livery vote as an injurious monopoly, which is wrong in principle, as introducing a fancy franchise into the Constitution, and a monstrous injustice to that greater London whose claims for recollection have been so long ignored.

*(5.30.) VISCOUNT LYMINGTON (Devon, S. Molton): I very much regret that the hon. Members who have already spoken have treated the question very much from a Party point of view, for it is impossible to argue the question entirely on Party grounds. The hon. Member who brought forward the Motion has given the House an interesting history of livery franchise, which was, however, abruptly cut short at the year 1867. Since that date a great Reform Bill has been passed by the Liberal Party at the time when it was at the zenith of its power, both in numbers, and unity, and cohesion; and if livery franchise is absolutely inconsistent with all Liberal principles it is strange that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division, should not have exercised their great influence and have brought the matter before the House. As to what had been said in regard to the recommendations of the City Livery Charities Commission, I never heard a Report of a Royal Commission treated so curiously as the Mover of the Resolution has treated the Report of that Commission. In the first place, he singled out a particular clause from a general Report, and founded his case upon it. This, it seems to me, is essentially a question which can only be properly dealt with, if at all, as a whole, in a comprehensive measure, and not in piecemeal manner, that is now being attempted. I particularly object to the process of picking out from a Report a special clause and dealing with it by itself, irrespective of its bearing on other parts of the Report. The hon. Member asks the House to support his Motion in accordance with the recommendation of the Commission; and to abolish the anomalous franchise now possessed by the City of London liverymen. But that is precisely what the Report avoids recommending; and, as a matter of fact, the recommendations of the Commission are not in accordance with the hon. Gentleman's Motion. The Report recommends that in future no further cases of livery franchise shall be created, but it did not propose to abolish the existing franchise. My hon. Friend's Motion, on the contrary, is a Motion for disenfranchisement. Again, Sir, it is quite contrary to the facts of the case to state that the livery franchise gives a vote to persons who have no direct business connection with the City. I think that by examples I can practically show the absurdity of that statement. It has always been felt that the City occupies a peculiar position as being, though not a place of residence, the centre of the commerce of the world. Owing to the fact that many great business concerns have been converted into Joint Stock Companies, many of the most representative men in the City would not have a vote for the City if they did not exercise the franchise as members of livery companies. The hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London is in that position, as are the hon. Member for the Sevenoaks Division of Kent, Mr. Tufnell the Chairman of the Royal Mail Steamship Company, and the great Spicer firm, the great Nonconformist firm in the City; owing to the fact that for general convenience it is the custom to register banks and other Joint Stock Companies in the names of their secretaries only, it follows that but for such votes as those conferred by the livery franchise some of the most influential, important, wealthy, and intelligent men in the City would otherwise be utterly unrepresented.

MR. ROWLANDS: Why should they not be?

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON: I am endeavouring to disprove the statement that the livery voters do not really represent large and important interests. The hon. Member who brought forward the Motion said that the result of the livery franchise is the manufacture of faggot-votes. If so, it is the most expensive process of manufacture that I have heard of. If any Livery Company wishes to enlarge its franchise for political purposes it must first be free from the common restriction, by charter, of the number of its members. In the second place you would have, if I may use the phrase, to "square" that particular company, and having done that you would have also to "square" the Court of Aldermen, which is an open court in which political opinions for a long time have been equally divided. Then, if permission to increase the number of liverymen had been obtained, the faggot-voters would have to be elected by their companies, and as there are representatives of both parties in every company, the new liverymen would not be all of one party. A stronger objection is that a liveryman must have held his position for a year before he can exercise his franchise. Having made careful investigation, I find that the least amount for which any one can become a livery man is £30. That is in the Plumbers' Company. I think that in his calculation my hon. Friend forgot that in addition to the fees to be paid to the Court there is a Stamp Duty of three guineas to be paid to the Government. Again, the livery fines vary considerably. In the Mercers Company the Livery fine is only £4 13s., whereas the freedom fine is £200. I do not think my hon. Friend has adduced any argument in favour of dealing with this question by piece-meal legislation. On the contrary, the facts show that the livery franchise can be used by no political party for corrupt purposes. At the time when the Liberal Party was not very popular in the counties I saw something of the creation of faggot-votes, and I know that six or seven votes were usually created for £30. Faggot-votes may or may not be an abuse of the Parliamentary franchise, but it is clear that the livery franchise cannot be utilised for the manufacture of faggot-votes. As regards the general question, it seems to me that the City of London stands in a quite exceptional position as the centre of the commerce of the country, and as the head of the commerce of the world. Its position in commerce is in fact analogous to that occupied by the Universities in relation to the representation of learning. The arguments of the hon. Members are based on conditions which cannot obtain, and they have not advanced one single case of the abuses they allege. There are anomalies of all kinds in the Parliamentary franchise, and if the House is to remove all anomalies and to proceed purely on the principle of "One man one vote" in settling the franchise, it must be based strictly on population. Then the number of the Irish Representatives would have to be curtailed. I hope that the Government and the House will decline to accept the proposal of the hon. Member, because it is not justifiable in itself, and does not carry out the statements made in the Amendment. If the question is to be dealt with at all, it must be dealt with carefully and comprehensively, and not in the piecemeal manner proposed.

*(5.45.) MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) :

As the noble Lord has pointed out, the Report of the Royal Commission upon which the Motion before the House is avowedly based contains, as a matter of fact, no such recommendations as those attributed to it. The words of the Resolution request the Government to take action to abolish the right of voting now possessed; whereas the Report of the Royal Commission merely recommends that no further franchise shall be conferred, and that any future Act on the subject shall contain provisions to this effect. The hon. Member, in moving the Resolution, has admitted that it deals with only a small part of a large question. It would, indeed, be altogether inconsistent and unwise on the part of the House to attempt to abolish in this fashion a franchise which has been in existence for 500 years, seeing especially that the whole subject of representation in the House of Commons has been carefully reviewed and dealt with more than once of recent years. The hon. Member (Mr. J. Rowlands) who introduced the Motion pronounced the livery franchise to be ridiculous. But what makes it ridiculous, and since when has it become so? The whole subject was carefully considered in 1832. It was considered again by the leaders of the two Parties in solemn conclave in 1867. It was reviewed again, I imagine with equal care, in 1884, and on each occasion it may be presumed that the political leaders for good reasons held the franchise to be fair and just. Yet now we are asked to reverse these decisions, and, by so doing, virtually to pass a Vote of Censure on those former Parliaments which deliberately arrived at this decision. The hon. Member seems to have been a little wrong in his arithmetic. He told the House that these abominable creatures, livery voters, increased at the rate of 500 a year. How can he make that out, when their number in 1868 was only 6,000, and now it was only 7,700?

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I gave 500 as the gross average increase, but said that deaths and other causes——

*MR. KIMBER: Even then the hon. Member's figures are not correct, as the increase in 22 years has been only from 6,000 to 7,700. I do not wish to impute to him that he says what he does not believe, but these inaccuracies make his case all the more lamentable, seeing that he bases it upon such fallacies. The fact should not be forgotten, in considering the qualifications of the liverymen as voters, that as members of the Livery Companies they are called upon to perform certain duties and to exercise certain rights. It is an old and respected maxim that representation should go along with taxation. What is the position of the Livery Companies in this respect? They have corporate property belonging to them, property which by the law they can divide amongst themselves to-morrow if they wish, and on that property they have been deliberately taxed, by the present House of Commons and by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, higher than any other class of the community. I allude to the £5 per cent. levied on their corporate revenues. If these liverymen are amenable to taxation on their property, then surely they have rights of representation in connection with it. Why should those rights be taken away and the taxation left? It seems to me that the word "confiscation" would be a mild one to apply to such a proceeding. Then, again, we are told that this livery franchise results in nothing less than faggot voters and votes to be purchased by money payments. But what is the ordinary franchise itself? Upon the payment of 4s. a week, or £10 a year, anyone who wishes can obtain a vote. That is a very small sum compared with what a livery vote costs. At the end of the Motion it is stated that the existence of the livery franchise increases the evils arising from the defective state of the Registration Laws,

"Whereby many persons are prevented from becoming qualified electors, while others become entitled to a plurality of votes."

In regard to the first of the two last statements it is, so far as I can see, absolutely meaningless and unintelligible. As to the second statement, it seems to imply that the hon. Member is under the delusion that residents in the City, if they are liverymen as well, possess two votes.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Oh, no.

*MR. KIMBER: Then the hon. Member must mean in his Resolution to ask the House to support the principle of "one man one vote," because that is the only other interpretation which can be put upon his words. If that is so, I shall be glad to hear it, because that will obviously involve a still more serious alteration in the present law of representation. Then the hon. Member has admitted that on the register of the City Companies there are 5,800 voters, none of whom possess, he says, any qualification other than their connection with a Livery Company. Now he cannot have taken the slightest pains to ascertain what those figures really mean. There are, as a matter of fact—and as I know from personal knowledge—large numbers of men, junior members of firms, head clerks, and so forth, who perform some of the most important and laborious work in the City of London, and yet 'who, but for their connection with the City Companies, would not be entitled to any votes whatever. In the case of my own firm, for instance, neither of the two junior members, both graduates of Oxford University, and otherwise well fitted to exercise the franchise, was entitled to a vote, as each lived under the paternal roof, and neither has any sort of interest in the business premises. These are the cases which the livery franchise meet. The Act of 1867 was a measure as to the necessity of which all parties are agreed. It cannot be said to have been a Conservative Act, although it was passed by a Conservative Government. What was the state of things in the City at the time? The City was represented by four Liberals, and it was not until the election of 1868 that the Conservatives were able to secure one of the four seats. The Act of 1867 not only left the livery franchise intact, but extended the residential qualification from 7 to 25 miles. It is all very well for hon. Members to denounce the livery franchise as ridiculous and anomalous now that the political complexion of the City has been changed. There is another point of view from which this question should be looked at. The question of individual suffrage is, and must always be, intimately connected with the distribution of seats. The fact of there being 5,000 more votes in the City than there would be if the liverymen had no votes does not send any more Members to Parliament. It may be said it makes the position of my hon. Friend (Sir R. Fowler) more secure; it does not add to or take from the number of Members of Parliament, but if the question of distribution of seats is not taken in hand when you disfranchise so large a proportion as 5,000 voters out of 32,000 you may unfairly throw a seat from one side to the other. We hear much of the necessity of concessions to Ireland, but the day may not be far distant when England will ask something from Ireland. [Cries of "Question!"] It is the question. I recollect that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was speaking of the alleged inequalities between England and Ireland—it was before his conversion or perversion to Home Rule—said—

"I know of no inequalities except two, and those are: first, that Irishmen are free from certain taxes"—

I think he alluded to the House Tax, and the Land Tax—

"which Englishmen and Scotchmen are subject to, and that Irishmen participate in large grants of public money in which Englishmen and Scotchmen do not participate."

Now we are to have a third inequality. While we have 86 Irishmen opposed to us here—a number out of all proportion to the numbers who send them here—we are to have the suffrage in our own constituencies cut down, which may, perhaps, throw additional seats from our side to the side of our opponents. I denounce this Motion as an ambitious attempt to deal with legislation which has always been considered one of the most important branches of our legislation, and I maintain that to attempt to deal with the subject in this offhand and piecemeal way is to reduce a large and important subject to most ridiculous dimensions.

*(6.7.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): When the noble Lord the Member for South Molton rose, all who had heard previous speeches of his knew that we should hear most that is to be said against this Amendment. The noble Lord's remarks have been supplemented by those of the hon. Member for Wandsworth, yet I must own I do not think any case has been made out against the Amendment. The noble Lord and the hon. Member for Wandsworth resorted to an argument which can be used against any change or reform, namely, that in the case of a previous Bill this change was not introduced by the Party that is now recommending it. If this is to be regarded as a valid argument the Liberal Party may as well shut up their business at once, because the argument applies against every possible reform. The noble Lord put it in the most favourable form when he said the Liberal Party at the zenith of its power brought in a great Reform Bill that was meant to be comprehensive and yet did not welcome this change. It was during the passage of that Bill through Parliament that the Liberal Government was turned out of Office by a hostile vote in the House of Commons. [Mr. MATTHEWS: The noble Lord referred to the Bill of 1884.] That being the case, it can scarcely be said the Liberal Party was in the zenith of its power. And that Bill was, as is well known on both sides of the House, of the nature of a compromise, and it could not have been passed through the House of Commons and the House of Lords at that time unless it had been of such a nature. It was well known that many very important points of which the Liberal Party was then and is now in favour were only kept back because of the nature of the Bill; indeed, the Redistribution Bill was actually turned into an Act by the Conservative Government. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Kimber) asked us to bring in a comprehensive measure:—"Why," he said, "do you come down on Tuesdays and Fridays and propose abstract Resolutions about the livery vote." No change in the Parliamentary representation of this country has ever been made without having been introduced on a Tuesday or Friday year after year. The use of these Resolutions was that in a cool atmosphere the whole case can be put by its advocates before the House of Commons, and through the House of Commons to the country. The country can then see how much political backing a political question has. Unless Sir E. Baines had year after year introduced his Resolution for the reduction of the borough franchise, and unless other Members had done the same thing in respect of the county franchise, I do not hesitate to say those measures would never have been passed. The noble Lord gave a perfectly fair account of the Report of the Commission, but we are not acting only on the Report of the Commission. We want to go into the merits of the question, and on the merits there can be no doubt whatever. This Resolution refers to one constituency only, but it establishes a great principle. That constituency has only a population of 50,000, and has two Members allotted to it. That made the question very important, because, in the first place, that means an excess of political power in this particular constituency; and, in the next place, it may be said to be a sort of ideal constituency, with regard to which we ought to establish an ideal representation. What is the real condition of the constituency? There are in the constituency 21,000 occupiers and 7,500 livery voters. I was reading the other day a most interesting book, The History of the Boroughs, published in 1794, at the moment when in the old Whig Party the ideas of popular representation were at a higher level than they have reached ever since, and in it I read that—

It is quite true that those 22,000, as described by the Member for Finsbury, were real, genuine residents living on the spot. But that is all altered now, and of those 22,000 occupiers I suppose that not more than one-third, or some 7,000, are real residents, and these are in a worse position than any other voters in the Kingdom. Elsewhere the resident voters are, so to say, diluted by non-resident voters, but in the City of London they are swamped. The constituency of Central Glasgow most nearly resembles the City of London. Of the 11,000 occupying voters 3,000 live outside the Division. In the case of the City of London, not 3,000 but 10,000 live outside the City. That grievance would be enough, but it is not all. Besides these out-voters, the 7,000 resident voters have to contend likewise with 7,500 livery voters, of whom not more than one quarter have any premises in the City, and probably not more than 1-10th or 1-20th reside in the City. They have bought the franchise with money down, just as they would buy a horse or a piece of furniture. Some of the prices given are very large. In the Clothworkers' Company it cost 100 guineas. In the Fishmongers' and the Goldsmiths' about 30 guineas. In the Fishmongers' there are 432 liverymen, and in the Clothworkers' 150 liverymen. Who are these bodies that they should be so represented even according to the theory that property ought to be represented? The Fishmongers, have, I believe, an income of £55,000, and the Clothworkers' an income of £50,000. Now, supposing a country gentleman, or a man of business, has £50,000 a year, he will probably have three or four votes; if he is a brewer he may perhaps have 11 or 12. But these companies, with the same incomes as rich landed proprietors or men of business, have not 3 or 4, or 11 or 12, but 300 or 400 votes. They are, therefore, even on the theory that property should have a special representation, monstrously over-represented. I would just ask the House to look at the question of privilege as it exists in the City. The resident householders have 7,000 votes out of 29,000; that is to say, that each resident householder in the City has one-fourth of a vote. Now, let us see what the privileged classes have. First of all a member of these classes votes for the villa in which he lives at a distance from the City, or for his house in one of the fashionable parts of London. Secondly, he votes for his freehold property in the City as a county voter for the Hornsey Division. And not only does he vote for the Hornsey Division, where he does not reside and where he has not a shred of property, but he is so tenderly treated that two booths, and in one case three booths, are actually set up in the Guildhall in order that he may give his vote for Hornsey without having to leave his business for more than five minutes. This has been disputed once in the House, but I have documents which prove it beyond all doubt. In the third place he has a vote for the City itself—a vote which can be bought with money—and in the fourth place if he belongs to the class of University men and has taken out his M.A. degree, he can vote for his University. The noble Lord near me was, I believe, somewhat inaccurate in his statement as to the price of these livery votes. I think he was misinformed when he said it cost £25 to procure a vote. There are some Companies which are practically kept up for the purpose of making these votes. [Cries of "No!"] Well, it looks very like it. The Playing Card Makers' Company possess no property and charge a fee of 23 guineas for admission. The Loriners have no land; there are 438 liverymen and the fine is £12. The Basket Makers' Company, with 29 liverymen, has an income of £35 from fees, and that is all spent on one entertainment. Now, if there is any sense about this system, if votes should be bought for money, the price should be the same, instead of varying from £120 or so to £12. But who would seriously propose to reform the livery franchise in such a way? There is only one possible reform, and that is to sweep it away altogether. Since the change in the franchise that my hon. Friend referred to, a man can by paying £12 or £20 live anywhere in Middlesex, or in the heart of Kent or Essex, almost any where in Surrey or in parts of Bucks and Herts, and yet assist in voting down the real residents of the City of London. This great injustice is accompanied by smaller injustices. The liveryman may change his residence as often as he likes, but when once he has paid his money he retains his vote for life. The ordinary householder, whenever he changes his residence and goes outside the precincts of the City, loses his one-fourth of a vote, sometimes for 18 months, and sometimes for much longer periods. The liveryman is not subject to the personal payment of rates and to all the chances of losing his vote that such a condition involves, but the ordinary householder has to pay his rates up to the day or he loses his vote. This country is pretty tolerant of anomalies if any public reason can be given for them, but for these anomalies no public reason can be given. There are, it is true, some 20,000 freemen still remaining in our large towns, but they are for the most part freemen of the whole town. They may have some local patriotism, some feeling that they owe something to the community—something of that feeling which in old days the liverymen of London displayed when they insisted that their Member should represent them on the floor of this House, even though he was rejected by the great majority of Members of the House. But in this case the liverymen are not attached to a great city. They are attached to certain isolated bodies, and I ask what reason is there that those bodies should have a special representation? Of all bodies they probably need

reform the most. I will read to the House the mere headings of the reforms which the Commission recommended, and which has not been carried out. They recommended that measures should be taken to prevent the alienation of the property of the Companies, and that means should be taken to secure the permanent application of a considerable portion of the corporate income to useful purposes. I am not throwing reflections on the Companies in this respect. They further recommended that a new trust should be declared where a better application of the trust moneys of the Companies had become desirable. Then came the recommendation about the franchise, which the House has already heard, and then there were recommendations that colourable apprenticeships should cease, and that excessive sums should no longer be spent on entertainments and on the maintenance and relief of poor members. Who were they who made these recommendations? Were they violent Radicals? They were Lord Derby, Lord Sherbrooke, the late Duke of Bedford, and Lord Coleridge. I object to these bodies having special representation in order that when these questions come before the House of Commons they should have an undue number of Members in this House to stand in the way of reform. The principle upon which we bring forward this Motion and support it is very simple. It is a principle which, during the last two generations, has constantly inspired all the changes which Parliament has made in reforming our representation, and that principle is, that to secure good Government, the Government should be in the hands of the greatest possible number of intelligent and independent men, and that each of these men who is sufficiently intelligent and independent to be a citizen shall have an exactly equal voice in the Government of the country. That has not been secured yet; but that has been the tendency of our legislation, and we ask that this system shall be abolished, that the residents—the real residents, the householders of the City of London—may have fair play in this question of the franchise, and not be absolutely swamped, as no other constituency in the country is, by people who have votes elsewhere. Those bankers, merchants, and others of high character, of whom the noble Lord spoke as having votes in the City of London, surely they live somewhere—they are not houseless when they leave the City—and they have votes elsewhere? When we bring forward this Motion we want real argument, and until we get that argument we cannot but believe that the only opposition to this change is because the change may be of advantage to one political Party and a disadvantage to the other. That argument has been freely brought forward outside this House, but I am sure it will not be used in the House. In discussing these subjects we discuss them not from the point of view whether these men hold our opinions or the opinions of our political opponents, but apart from such considerations. It is our business to see that every citizen shall have fair play, and neither more nor less than fair play, in getting his share of political power; and in order that this principle may be established in the central constituency of the kingdom, where at the present moment it is extravagantly violated, my hon. Friend has brought forward this Motion, and I trust that every Member who looks at these questions not from the point of view of Party, but of principle, will vote with him.

(6.45.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): In his opening remarks the right hon. Gentleman showed a singular forgetfulness of the achievements of his own Party. He described the reform of 1884—not of 1885—as that of the Conservative Party. That I deny. His Party was in power when the Bill became an Act, and was responsible for its final success, though not for its introduction. In December, 1884, the Act received the Royal Assent, and it is the great Party of which the right hon. Gentleman is so distinguished a Member that has the full credit of that Act. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that it is the duty of the Liberal Party to be perpetually tinkering with the Constitution, and that if they do not do so they may as well shut up shop. He appears to think that every few years the whole system of the franchise on which representation in this House exists is to be reviewed and repaired, and that there should be no finality—that the tree should be constantly dug up by the roots to see how it is growing. I have listened attentively to the Debate, and the only argument I have heard against this franchise is that it is an anomaly. But though it is in some sense an anomaly, the framers of all previous reform Bills have left it untouched as they have many other anomalies. Why should it be attacked now? Nor is this so-called “fancy” franchise without its parallel in other parts of the country. Similar franchises exist in Leicester, Lincoln, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Newcastle-under-Lyme, Nottingham, and Stafford. All these towns have their “fancy” franchise, and it is difficult to see why London should be picked out for special legislation. The right hon. Gentleman asserts that the only proper electorate for the City of London is its rated residents—a population of some 50,000 persons, consisting mainly of servants and caretakers, with a parson or two, while the wealth and intelligence of the City of London are to be left wholly unrepresented. That appears to me to be a representation of the City of London almost grotesque. The half million people who constitute the life, energy, intelligence, trade of the City of London are not really residents. I agree that as a matter of principle and for rough convenience some limit should be placed on the distance of out-voters. The ordinary limit is seven miles; in the case of these liverymen it is 25 miles. Having regard to the conditions of the suburban life of London, is this such an unreasonable limit? In the Local Government Act passed only two years ago the limit was fixed at 15 miles. Is that to be considered a retrograde step? Are we to be told that what we did two years ago is not to be mentioned as any ground or reason for our action now? I do not stand by this limit of 25 miles, but it is obvious that under the circumstances of the City of London some larger range of out-residents, as we may call them, is required and does not create an anomaly in the sense in which it would be understood as applied to other boroughs. There has been talk about the livery franchise being bought. I am at a loss to see the distinction between the expenditure of money which makes a man a liveryman with a livery vote and the expenditure which makes a man the occupier of a tenement with an occupation vote. What is there so sacred in the expenditure of a little money in order to acquire a tenement, in which one need not reside, that such expenditure should give a vote, while the acquisition of liveryship should not? In other towns expenditure of some sort, sometimes very trifling, accompanies the acquisition of the livery, in the City of London the expenditure is much larger. Such acquisition usually costs some money, and carries with it the approval of a body of men who have the prosperity of the City of London at heart. It is alleged that certain companies offer their liveryship even to reluctant persons; that they go about "touting" for members. I am not aware of such cases. The figures do not appear to bear out that assertion. It appears that there are 7,756 liverymen on the electoral roll. Of these 290 are duplicates, leaving 7,466 liverymen with a vote. But 2,279 of these are householders, so that the number of liverymen voting who are not householders only amounts to 5,187. This the hon. Member who moved the Resolution seems to have entirely overlooked.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I distinctly read out the figures from what I believe to be a correct analysis of the register made up to the present day.

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member assumed, I think, that householders were members of different Companies.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Quoting from memory, for I have not the figures in my hand, I first took the gross number of electors on the register as it stands, then I deducted those who are qualified otherwise, and reading to these I arrived at 5,000 odd having no other qualification.

MR. MATTHEWS: We arrive at the same result, but not by the same process.

Mr. Matthews

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I have now the actual figures: 32,728 electors, deduct 629 county electors, leaving 32,099. The livery votes included are 7,756, and, deducting 1,950 who are occupiers, the net result is 5,806 for the livery vote with no other qualification. This is arrived at after very careful analysis.

MR. MATTHEWS: Mine also is a careful analysis, according to which there are 290 duplicates, and 2,279 householders, arriving at the same result. In round numbers, of 7,500 liverymen, 2,279 are householders as well, and therefore the real householders for whom the right hon. Gentleman opposite has so much affection. The hon. Member says that these liveries are over-represented in respect of their income, and he compares them with a large brewer. But does the hon. Member suggest that these companies exercise any direct influence over the votes of the individual Members? Notoriously the companies have no such influence. Another argument of the right hon. Gentleman was that the livery franchise encourages plurality of votes. A liveryman has a vote irrespective of residence; he may also have a University vote. But cannot the real resident get the University vote? Can he not also acquire a vote in a place from which his residence is not distant seven miles? If no better arguments can be cited for the exceptional treatment proposed to be applied to the livery franchise in the City of London, the case seems to me to be a very weak one indeed. I hear no demand for the abolition of the livery vote from the City itself. The City of London, which is the most interested in the matter, does not complain of being misrepresented by its voters; on the contrary, the whole City is unanimous in desiring to retain the livery vote. I hear no protests from those really representative of the City against the livery vote. The only persons against it are persons like the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir G. Trevelyan), who, so far as I know, has no connection whatever with the City, or hon. Gentlemen like the Mover and Secondor of the Resolution, whose object is certainly not friendly, but hostile to the City. This, therefore, is an unnecessary, an uncalled for attack upon an anomaly, it is true, but an anomaly which has done no harm, and has worked to the satisfaction of all those who are subject to it.

(6.49.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): The right hon. Gentleman says the livery franchise stands on all fours with certain franchises existing in other ancient boroughs. Now, I distinctly traverse that statement. The anomaly in the representation of the City of London is absolutely unique. It is true that in certain ancient boroughs there are freemen, but the freemen who are entitled to exercise the franchise in these boroughs are only those who have acquired their freedom by servitude, or who take the freedom from some who have so acquired it. In London, on the contrary, freemen who, according to the Report of the Commissioners, consist mainly of artisans, are not entitled to the franchise, but this privilege is reserved for the livery men, who are drawn almost exclusively from the middle classes, and who pay in most cases a very considerable sum for what is called taking out their livery. So we arrive at this result, which I scarcely think will receive the approval of any candid Member in the House. I find that in round numbers the total electorate for the City of London is 32,000, and in round figures the number of liverymen 8,000. It is quite true that a certain number being liverymen have other qualifications, but that is an accident—it is not an essential feature of the case, and for present purposes it is absolutely immaterial. So we arrive at this result: that over a quarter of the voting power of the electorate of the City of London is directly purchasable with money. Now I say that is a scandal, and I think the scandal would have long ceased to exist had it not been for the subtle influence which the Corporation, of which this livery system is an essential part, exercises over this House. I listened with great interest to the speech from the noble Lord (Lord Lymington) on this side, and which received a direct imprimatur from the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Kimber). The noble Lord seemed to stand aghast at a proposal which would have the effect of depriving members of Joint Stock Companies of votes for the city. Now, for my part, I have not that extreme reverence for Joint Stock Companies which the noble Lord appears to entertain. But it is not part of our proposal to disfranchise members of Joint Stock Companies; all we say is that to maintain the proposition that a man ought to have a vote because he is a member of a Joint Stock Company is simply ludicrous. The argument of the noble Lord would, it is clear, restore the very worst abuses of our old system of representation. Our Resolution has, no doubt, as the noble Lord saw, an intimate relation with a large principle, it has no doubt a bearing upon the principle of what is known popularly as "one man one vote," and I think it is instructive to see the attitude the noble Lord is prepared to take towards that principle; but apart from that larger principle I submit the question is one which may fairly and reasonably be treated by itself, and I shall heartily give my vote with my hon. Friend.

(6.54.) MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): We have no intention of continuing the Debate from this side of the House, because we have heard the arguments adduced against us, and there is nothing in them to answer. The Home Secretary, the noble Lord on this side and his supporters opposite, have used the most old and crusted Tory arguments in connection with this matter. We are told that we ought to wait until we can reform the whole of the City Companies. Is either of the three gentlemen who used this argument, or is the Government prepared to introduce a Bill for reforming these City Companies? If they are not prepared to do that, are they prepared to give me and my friends any facilities for carrying the other recommendations of the Royal Commission which have been so long before the House, to prevent the alienation of the funds under the control of the Companies? They are not prepared to do that, therefore there is nothing in the argument that we ought to wait until we can carry out all the recommendations of the Commission. Then it has been said, "Why have not the Liberals done this before?" It was rightly enough said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) that is an argument against anything that could be done. There were reasons which are obvious now as we look back at 1884. The Liberal Metropolitan Members are determined to bring forward in the House whenever they can the disabilities under which London labours, and that is the reason why this subject is raised at the present time. For years we have tried to bring it forward, but the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has stepped in and appropriated private Members' time, and it is only now, when we have returned to a position of things that never ought to have been suspended, and which we are getting back to apparently only on sufferance, that we have found the opportunity of ventilating this question and calling attention to this anomaly. If we do not avail ourselves of these opportunities there is no preparation for the time when legislative proposals can be submitted. I do not argue the question now, it has been very ably argued by my hon. Friend, and nothing has been said on either side to shake his argument. A Liberal Unionist on this side has spoken of Liberal Governments of the past with a bitterness and sarcasm one would not have expected from one who professed himself a Liberal at the time. Almost the whole of the argument of the Home Secretary came to this, that he regarded the possession of the dual vote in this and other instances as an advantage, as part of the Constitution I suppose he would say, and for which he and his party are prepared in future to contend.

Main Question again proposed.

ROYALTIES, DUES, AND WAYLEAVES ON MINES.

(7.12.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I rise to call attention to the desirability of restricting the imposition of Royalties, Dues, and Wayleaves on Mines. No doubt the fact that there is a Royal Commission now sitting, inquiring into the question of Mining Royalties, forms a strong argument against me. But there is one very good reason for the course I am taking. The second most important industry in the county I have the honour to represent—Cornwall—is the china clay industry, and that was excluded in the most determined manner from the scope of the Royal Commission by the right hon. Gentleman who has just left the House; and I shall be able to show that some of the worst cases of harassment connected with the mining industry of Cornwall are to be found in the china clay industry. This is a matter of importance to other parts of the United Kingdom besides Cornwall, because the china clay which is raised in our county is employed not in our county itself but in other industries which form the staple occupation of a great number of our fellow citizens in the counties of Stafford, Lancaster, Chester, and other districts. I need hardly say that china clay is taken principally to the potteries in Staffordshire—

DOVER HARBOUR BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, before this Bill is read a second time I should like to say, on behalf of the Government, that in assenting to the Second Reading the Government does not depart from its objections to the 45th clause of the Bill as it now stands. We had hoped to have received an undertaking from the promoters that this clause would be deleted in Committee. That undertaking has not been received, and we understand it is not possible for it to have been given before to-day, on account of there not having been a meeting of the Dover Harbour Board. If the Bill is not read a second time to-day the ordinary limit of time for proceeding with that stage of the Bill would expire. Under those circumstances, and being unwilling to stop what may be of importance to the locality on insufficient grounds, the Government assent to the Second Reading, on the undertaking of the promoters that no further steps will be taken without notice to the Government.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not sympathise with the objections which the Government have raised to this Bill, and I think I shall be able to show good reasons why they are not valid. At the same time, I have to acknowledge the great courtesy of the noble Lord in allowing the Bill to go for Second Reading under the circumstances.

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD SUDELEY: My Lords, I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government when the Return respecting "Admiral Colomb's Flashing Signals," laid on the Table and ordered to be printed on 5th August last, will be delivered? These Papers are of very considerable interest, and have been anxiously looked forward to by the Navy for a long time. It is now six months since they were ordered to be printed, and I hope the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty will be able to say that there is to be no longer delay. I am told that owing to one letter not having been delivered in time delay has been caused; but I understand from Admiral Colomb that the letter was sent in as long ago as the 14th October, and therefore a period of four months has elapsed since. I hope the noble Lord will be able to give a satisfactory answer, as the delay in this matter has caused a great deal of unpleasantness.

LORD ELPHINSTONE: In answer to the question asked by the noble Lord, the Papers which he refers to are now in the hands of the printer, and will, I hope, be laid on the Table within a very few days. The delay to which he refers has been caused, as I understand, by two long letters having been received by the Government from Admiral Colomb. Those letters it has been necessary to print, and accordingly the Papers have been sent back to the printer. However, I hope in a few days they will be in the hands of the noble Lord.

LICHFIELD CATHEDRAL BILL.

[H.L.]—(No. 6.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD: I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill. It passed through your Lordships' House last year, but failed to obtain a reading in another place. I therefore need not give any detailed explanation of it now. It is a simple matter, and I beg to move the Second Reading.

Bill read 2^a (according to order); and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN BILL.

[H.L.]—(No. 31.)

REPORT.

Order read, for receiving Report of Amendments.

LORD NORTON: My Lords, I beg to give notice that on the Third Reading of this Bill I will move the insertion of words in what has been called the "Conscience Clause," that is Clause 4, with regard to religion, which directs that the Court, having rejected the application of a parent as unfit to be entrusted with his child's guardianship, but finding that the child is being brought up in a religion differing from that of its parent may order it to be brought up in his religion. If it is desirable the child should be brought up in that religion which has led to its abandonment and to the unfitness of the parent to take it back again, and available means are to be found for bringing it up in that religion, the Bill should state upon what funds that charge should fall. At present the Bill makes it necessary for the Court to secure that the child shall be brought up in the reprobate parent's religion, and there may be no means for doing that. The Bill should state where the expense, after removing a child from a foster-parents care, should fall, and I beg to give notice that I shall move the insertion of words for that purpose on the Third Reading.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Perhaps the noble Lord will kindly reduce his Amendment into writing. I had intended to move the Third Reading to-morrow night, but if it will be convenient to the noble Lord I will say Thursday.

LORD NORTON: I will read the words I propose to add—

"Provided means can be found available for the education of the child in such religion, and any costs so incurred shall be a charge on the school rate, if any, in the district."

Amendments reported (according to order); and Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

The Bishop of Lichfield

COUNTY COUNCILLORS (QUALIFICATION OF WOMEN BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to enable women to be elected and to act as County Councillors—Was presented by the Lord Chaworth (E. Meath); read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 32.)

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to make better provision for the elementary education of blind and deaf children in England and Wales—Was presented by the Lord President (V. Cranbrook); read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Friday next. (No. 33.)

PRESENTATION TO BENEFICES BILL [H.L.] (No. 5.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 9th February, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

EASTERN SOUDAN FAMINE RELIEF.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the operations of the Eastern Soudan Famine Relief Committee, under the superintendence of Dr. Harpur and General F. Haig, R.E., at Suakin, have been seriously interfered with and practically stopped in consequence of certain orders issued by the Cairo Military authorities; that hundreds of starving Soudanese, in receipt of food and hospital relief, were ordered by the authorities to be driven from the gates of Suakin into the famine-stricken country, or were deported in dhows, &c. to other ports along the Red Sea coast; and that hundreds died in consequence of this order, although at the very time thousands of bags of grain, expressly imported for famine relief, were lying in the stores at Suakin, while traders and others were prohibited by the Cairo authorities from sending into the country in the vicinity of Suakin. Whether the Governor of Suakin, Colonel Holled Smith, Her Majesty's Consul, Mr. Barnham, the British merchants and traders, and the Commander of Her Majesty's gunboats at Suakin, made any report to Her Majesty's Government as to these orders prohibiting sale and supply of grain to the starving Soudanese; and whether several successive officers in command of Her Majesty's gunboats in the Red Sea have in despatches to the Admiralty, through the Admirals in command of the Mediterranean Fleet, reported adversely of the policy carried out for the past three or four years in the Eastern Soudan, and whether these Reports will be printed and laid before Parliament.

THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FER-GUSSEX, Manchester, N.E.): We have no information of the operations of the Famine Fund being interfered with. It is true that it was found necessary, when cholera was prevalent in the country, to remove the Arabs who were encamped within the lines of Suakin from the immediate neighbourhood of the town. Her Majesty's Government deeply regret the necessity which arose for the removal of these poor people, but they believe that all possible care and foresight were exercised by the Military Authorities, with a view to mitigate as far as possible the suffering which was the inevitable consequence of this measure. The cordon has now been removed and the restrictions on trade relaxed. Reports on the subject have been received from Her Majesty's Consul at Suakin, the Local Authorities, and from British naval officers on the station, and the question of their publication will be considered when further Papers relating to Egypt are presented.

THE BERTILLON ANTHROPOMETRIC SYSTEM.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has had his attention called to the Bertillon Anthropometric System, now in use in France, for registering and identifying prisoners, and thus easily detecting previously arrested persons; and whether he has considered the advisability and practicability of applying such a system to this country? I should like to mention that this question stood on the Paper in the name of Mr. Bradlaugh a day or two before his death.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; the French system has for some time been the subject of discussion between myself and the Prison and Police Authorities. There are various objections to the introduction of that system as a whole, and the French police have powers over prisoners which the police do not possess in this country. I have inserted a clause in a Penal Servitude Bill, of which I have given notice, giving power to take the measurement of prisoners, which is, perhaps, the most important element in the French system. I may add that the Commissioner of Police informs me that under our present system we have a larger percentage of identifications than the French system affords.

THE LEEWARD ISLANDS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Medical Officer of the institutions of the Presidency of Dominica Colony of the Leeward Islands, has been removed from his usual professional duties, and constituted Imperial Commissioner, to report on the disease called "jaws" throughout the West Indies; and, if so, out of what fund, Imperial or Colonial, are his expenses to be paid; and if from Colonial funds, has the expense been created in deference to any demand for any such investigation from either the Medical Faculty or people of any West Indian community, and if so, from which; and if he is aware that a Resolution, affirming the necessity of such a Commission, and charging the expense connected with it upon the local revenue, was rejected by the practically unanimous vote of the Federal Council of the Leeward Islands in February, 1890?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Medical Officer of the Public Institutions in Dominica has been instructed to inquire into and report on the progress and treatment of the disease of yaws in the Leeward and Windward Islands. During his mission he will be relieved of the duties of his office. The expenses of the inquiry will be paid out of the funds of the several Islands in which it will be held. The inquiry has not been instituted in deference to any demand of the Medical Faculty or people of any of the West Indian Colonies. Notice was given in February, 1890, in the Federal Council of the Leeward Islands of a Resolution in favour of providing for a portion of the cost of such an inquiry, but the Resolution was withdrawn.

THE SHIP RAVENSHALL.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any intelligence has reached this country about the ship Ravenshall, Captain Telfer, which sailed from New York on the 11th June, 1890; whether he has any reason to suppose that the crew have been cast away on the Crozet Islands; and whether he will consider the possibility of sending one of Her Majesty's cruisers to examine the Islands, or, if that is not possible, whether it would be possible to subsidise a merchantman or passenger steamer to go out of their course for that purpose?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The only information in the possession of the Admiralty is that the Ravenshall was last spoken in latitude 30 S. and longitude 34 W., or about 4,500 miles from the Crozet Islands. It is, therefore, only a very far-fetched conjecture that she was lost in the neighbourhood of these Islands, and on such very improbable contingencies the Admiralty would not be justified in sending one of Her Majesty's ships several thousand miles to make a search.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF INVENTORS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether in view of the high tariffs of Foreign countries, and the importance of encouraging inventors so that British manufacturers may maintain their pre-eminence in the markets of the world, he will consider the propriety of applying the surplus of £93,534, received by the Patent Office in excess of its expenditure, to a large reduction of the present heavy renewal fees?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am not sure that British manufacturers generally would admit that the application of the surplus from fees on patents which the hon. Member suggests would largely benefit them. There is much to be said in favour of the present scale if it operates in the later years to cause useless and unsuccessful patents to fall out, and some people believe that this is an advantage and not a disadvantage to British trade. The hon. Member is perhaps not aware that recently sanction has been given to a large expenditure for building a new Patent Office, and providing additional facilities to the public who have business there, an object with which I am sure he will sympathise and which the public will appreciate.

RATING OF MACHINERY.

MR. DUNCAN (Barrow): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether at any time since 1871, the Local Government Board has for the purpose of securing uniformity throughout England and Wales in the assessment of rateable value, issued instructions to Boards of Guardians, Union Assessment Committees, Overseers or other persons charged with the duty of assessment, giving explanations and directions as to the method in which the rateable value of buildings containing machinery should be ascertained: and if any such instructions have been issued, whether he will lay copies of them upon the Table of the House?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board have not issued instructions to Boards of Guardians, Assessment Committees or Overseers, giving directions as to the method in which the rateable value of buildings containing machinery should be ascertained. The principles on which such property should be assessed depend upon the Statute and the decisions of the Courts, and the Board are not empowered to give any such directions as are suggested.

THE HERRING FISHERY (SCOTLAND) ACT.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherlandshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the attention of the Secretary for Scotland has been called to the contravention by trawl fishingboats of the provisions of Section 6 of "The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889," in trawling within the three mile limit on the northern coast of Sutherland; and particularly a fortnight ago when the line fishermen of Portskerra had lines to the value of £40 destroyed by such trawlers; whether his attention has been called to the fact that such trawling is carried on during the night, and without lights being exhibited, in order to avoid detection; and what steps he intends to take to enforce the law and protect the property of these fishermen?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): Yes, Sir. The Secretary for Scotland has heard with regret that certain contraventions of the Act referred to have taken place, and that damage has been done by trawlers to the lines of the fishermen. He is also informed that the trawling is carried on as stated in the second part of the question. As regards the last paragraph, I can only repeat the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Banffshire some days ago, namely, that the Secretary for Scotland is in communication with the Treasury and the Admiralty with a view of securing more efficient protection in these prescribed waters.

SOUTH AFRICA COMPANY AND MANICALAND.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the South Africa Chartered Company have put forward a number of regulations in regard to the action of Europeans now in Manica; whether, in view of the fact that the so-called concession from Mutassa has not been confirmed by Her Majesty's Government, and that the Charter of the Company expressly forbids the Company to exercise power under any concession that has not received this confirmation, he will take steps to make it known that these regulations are not binding on anyone; whether the House may count upon being placed in possession of all correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Portuguese Government in regard to Manica before anything is done by Her Majesty's Government by which the territorial question will be prejudiced; and whether, on any interviews taking place between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and Mr. Rhodes, or between the Colonial Secretary and Mr. Rhodes, Mr. Rhodes is acting as Prime Minister of the Cape Colony, or as a gentleman financially concerned in the success of the South Africa Chartered Company?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: 1. We have no information as to any regulations issued by the South Africa Company. 2. Her Majesty's Government are not yet in a position to deal with the question of the concession said to have been granted by Mutassa. 3. The correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Portuguese Government will be published in due course. 4. Mr. Rhodes is Prime Minister of the Cape Colony, as well as a Director of the South Africa Company. He acts in both capacities.

SIR HORACE DAVEY (Stockton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in the event of the British South Africa Chartered Company obtaining Manicaland, care will be taken in the arrangements now being negotiated between Her Majesty's Government and Portugal, that British companies which have paid for and hold concessions from the Mozambique Company, whether before or after the date of the British South Africa Company's Charter, will be recognised, preserved, and respected?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government cannot be responsible for financial arrangements made between different Companies, but acquired British interests will receive every consideration in the negotiations with Portugal.

THE CHAPEL ROYAL, WHITEHALL.

MR. JAMES (Gateshead): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it is the fact that a large number of the pews of the late Chapel Royal, Whitehall, were allotted and held by Members of both Houses, certain public officials, and the owners of residences in the vicinity; that, in some cases, these pews were awarded to the occupiers of certain houses at the time they were brought within the area of Metropolitan rating, and in consideration of the loss thereby sustained in a matter of taxation, from which, as built upon the property of the Crown, and within the precincts of the royal palace, such dwellings were originally exempt; whether any steps were taken to ascertain the views of those thus interested as to the course contemplated and subsequently adopted; and why, inasmuch as seats were always reserved for Members of the Legislature, the opinion of the House of Commons was not invited both as to closing the Chapel and the expediency of its subsequent destination?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The Office of Works had no authority in the allotment of seats in the Chapel Royal, Whitehall; but, for the information of the hon. Member, I have inquired in the Department of the Lord Chamberlain, and Sir Spencer Ponsonby Fane has stated to me that he has, as far as his experience goes, no reason to believe that the pews were granted on the conditions or for the considerations suggested in the question. They were granted to the residents in the precincts of the old Palace, and to the dwellers in the neighbourhood, holders of Crown leases being given a preference. Pews were not assigned to Peers or Members of this House until the year 1867. There was no regular count kept of the attendances, but the Sub-Dean stated that they were reduced to a minimum except when the Bishop of Peterborough was to preach, or some other popular preacher. This House was not consulted with regard to the discontinuance of the services because the expenses of those services, amounting to about £800 a year, was defrayed out of Her Majesty's Civil List.

THE SCOTCH-AMERICAN MAILS.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is the case that mails for America from Glasgow missed the steamer by which they were advertised to sail no fewer than five times in the course of January, 1890; and whether any steps are being taken to prevent a recurrence of that contingency?

Mr. James

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The right hon. Gentleman's statement is quite correct, and I regret the inconvenience which must have resulted from the delays complained of. As I explained recently in the House, these delays have been mainly attributable to the difficulties attending the conduct of the Railway Service in the North, and I trust that regularity will now be restored.

THE MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will lay upon the Table any correspondence that has taken place between the Indian and Victorian Governments and the authorities at home on the subject of the magazine rifle; if he can state what royalty, if any, is claimed or paid in connection with the charges that may arise out of its magazine rifles manufactured by private firms; and whether such royalty is included in, or is additional to, the stated contract price?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The correspondence with the Victorian Government consists solely of a demand, and its postponement. That with India, as regards pattern and other questions, extends over a number of years, and is very bulky; but that which relates solely to the supply of magazine rifles shall be placed in the Library, and printed if any one moves for it. Nothing has been paid to any one in respect of rifles manufactured for the Government by private firms. The remuneration, if any, to patentees will be settled in accordance with the regulations which I explained last week. In respect of rifles manufactured for the public, the Royalty claimed by the Lee Syndicate is 8s. 9d. The rifles marked "Lee-Speed" are not Government rifles, and we accept no responsibility for them.

MR. HANBURY: Will the 8s. 9d. mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman last week be added to the price of each rifle?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; that is the price charged to the public.

FULWOOD BARRACKS.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any decision has yet been arrived at with reference to the use to be made of the Fulwood Barracks at Preston, on which a considerable sum has recently been spent?

Mr. E. STANHOPE: The Fulwood Barracks at Preston will continue to be occupied by troops. The removal of the field battery depôt leaves them large enough to accommodate a whole battalion, which was not previously the case.

In answer to Mr. TOMLINSON (Preston),

Mr. E. STANHOPE said: Upon the whole, in the distribution of troops, it is thought best to have infantry at Preston.

ARMENIA.

Mr. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs why it is that no despatches from the Foreign Office to Sir William White, on the subject of the condition of affairs in Armenia, were included in the recently published Papers relating to Asiatic Turkey; and whether it is the intention of the Government to make those despatches public?

Sir J. FERGUSSON: There are no despatches from the Foreign Office to Sir W. White during the period over which the Blue Book extends (January-November, 1890), other than despatches calling for Reports or approving his proceedings, which will be found on pages 12, 19, 20, 41, 45, 57, 59, 65 (Nos. 8, 14, 15, 46, 52, 69, 74 and 83). On reference to Turkey No. 1, 1890, page 130, it will be seen that under date of January 24th, 1890, Her Majesty's Ambassador had instructions to take every fitting opportunity to impress upon the Government of the Sultan the danger of allowing the continuance of the state of things in Asiatic Turkey, which had been reported to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. F. S. STEVENSON: Are we to understand from that answer that since the 24th of January, 1890, no despatches from the Foreign Office to that effect have been sent to Sir William White?

Sir J. FERGUSSON: The instructions then given continue in force, and continue to be acted upon.

REVOLUTION IN CHILI.

Mr. DUNCAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will state what further information Her Majesty's Government have received, since the 30th January, with regard to the revolution in Chili, and to the position of British subjects in that country?

Sir J. FERGUSSON: We have used our best endeavours to communicate, but have not been able to ascertain whether our telegrams have been received.

RELIGIOUS DISABILITIES.

Mr. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether persons professing the Roman Catholic religion are eligible for the offices of Lord High Chancellor of England and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland?

Mr. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I wish also to ask the Attorney General if, according to the existing law, any religious qualification is necessary for the office of Lord Chancellor of England or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and especially whether a Roman Catholic or a Jew is eligible to hold either or both of said offices?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In reply to the questions of the hon. Members opposite I must respectfully decline to answer these questions. They involve points of law of great difficulty, which cannot be properly dealt with within the limits of an answer in this House. I know that very different opinions are entertained by lawyers of great eminence both in and out of the House, and therefore upon such a point my own personal opinion would be of no guidance to the hon. Members.

*Mr. CAUSTON: If I put the question on the Paper on a future day, will the Attorney General answer it, after he has had time for consideration? As this is a question of Imperial importance, I would also ask whether it is not the duty of the Attorney General, as paid Law Adviser of the Crown, to answer questions of this character put by hon. Members, or whether he simply gives his opinion upon questions on electoral law only?

SIR R. WEBSTER: As far as I am aware, most of the questions I have answered came from hon. Members below the Gangway opposite. I have no objection to answer proper questions. Whatever the day on which the hon. Gentleman puts this question down my answer will be the same.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicester, Mid.): May I ask whether there are any constitutional means of ascertaining what the state of the law is on the subject, for this is a matter of great interest to a great many of Her Majesty's subjects?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I am not aware of any means. Should any Government make any appointment which raises the question, it will then have to be decided.

THE UNITED STATES AND BRAZIL.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether attention has been directed to a cablegram in the Times of Saturday, headed "The United States and Brazil," and whether the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the rest of the British Empire will, under our present Treaty arrangements with the Republic of Brazil, be entitled to the same advantageous terms as are proposed to be granted by Brazil to the United States of North America?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have no Commercial Treaty in existence with Brazil, and we should not be justified, therefore, in demanding that the same advantages which have been granted by Brazil to the United States should be extended by Brazil to this country.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what steps have been taken for the relief of distress in County Cavan; whether he is aware that at a largely attended meeting of the Guardians of the Cavan Union, the Guardians present, elected and ex officio alike, complained that they had not been communicated with by the Inspector sent to report as to the existence of distress in the Union; and whether that Inspector did communicate with any Guardians; and, if so, with what Guardian or Guardians?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The condition of the County Cavan is very carefully watched, but so far no relief works have been deemed necessary. As regards the concluding portion of the question, I beg to refer the hon. Member to my reply on this subject to his question on the 27th January.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the serious distress existing among a large number of the small householders and poor of the town of Ballyshannon, in the County of Donegal; whether he is aware that potatoes, of the quality which this time last year fetched 4d. per stone, are now sold at 7d. and 8d. per stone, and that the destitution is so great that in some cases the straw of beds has been burned for fuel; whether he is also aware that in previous failures of the potato crop families have been mainly supported by the work of the women at sewed muslin, but that at present the McKinley tariff had almost destroyed the sewing trade; and whether, having regard to their great distress, there is any immediate prospect of employment being afforded to the people of Ballyshannon in order to avert the necessity of giving gratuitous relief?

MR. MADDEN: Resolutions containing representations to the effect indicated in the first paragraph have been received. I have no official information as to the second paragraph, but I am aware that potatoes are now, I regret to say, being sold in parts of Ireland at the prices mentioned. There is reason to believe that the McKinley Act has injured some of the Donegal home industries. Employment appears to be scarce in the town of Ballyshannon, but such scarcity of employment at this season of the year often exists to a greater or less extent among labourers in towns. This is much to be regretted, but it is not to meet cases of this kind that so exceptional a course should be taken as starting relief works out of Imperial funds. As regards the rural portions of the Ballyshannon Union, the Local Government Inspector, reporting a few days ago, was of opinion that there was no serious destitution therein existing. He hopes very soon to make a further inspection and report.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if it has come under his notice that a Memorial from Bundoran, County Donegal, was forwarded to the Government in November last praying for the construction of a light railway from Sligo to Bundoran and other works of public utility with a view to relieve impending distress; if he is aware that two very influential meetings were held on 1st January at the villages of Tullaghan and Cliffony, calling on the Government for employment by the construction of said railway, and asking for a proper official to examine the distressed state of the district; if he is aware that the Sligo Corporation Harbour Board and Sligo Board of Guardians have forwarded Memorials with the same object; and what steps, if any, have been taken to inquire into the matter?

MR. MADDEN: Numerous representations have been made in regard to this and other places, but the Government have no funds which would enable them to take any steps to provide the relief asked for.

MR. MORROGH (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has received copies of resolutions passed at a public meeting of the National League, Nohoval, County Cork, on Sunday, 1st instant, conveying the information that fever was prevalent in the district owing to the use as food by the destitute people of "blighted and unripe potatoes;" has any Report been received from the Local Medical Authority on the subject; and what steps do the Government propose to take to cope with the distress and outbreak of epidemic?

MR. MADDEN: Careful consideration is being given to the Resolutions in question.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has received copies of Resolutions adopted at a public meeting held at Tracton (County Cork) Petty Sessions Court on 30th ult., drawing attention to the distress in the district, and urging upon the Government the necessity of starting some public works (which were named in the Resolutions), so as to afford employment to the destitute people, and what action do the Government intend to take in the matter?

MR. MADDEN: A copy of the Resolutions referred to has been received and will be carefully considered.

MR. FLYNN: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to state that the Government are not in possession of any information as to this district?

MR. MADDEN: The Government are making the fullest inquiries possible.

IRISH TITHES.

MR. PENROSE FITZGERALD (Cambridge): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would state what portion of the annuity of £4 9s. per cent. which is charged to Irish tithe-payers for a term of 52 years for loans for the redemption of tithe rent-charge under "The Irish Church Act Amendment Act, 1872," represents or is required for the purpose of a Sinking Fund, and what is (accordingly) the rate of interest reserved or charged by the Treasury on such loans, and in cases where a tithe payer desires during the currency of the 52 years' term to redeem the outstanding instalments of his annuity, or where he is compelled to redeem them under the Irish Land Purchase Acts, what is the rate of interest allowed to him in the table for the Redemption of Outstanding Instalments adopted by the Irish Land Commission?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Irish Church Acts sell the tithe rent-charge to tithe-payers for 22½ years' purchase, and permit the debt to be paid off by an annuity of £4 9s. per cent. for 52 years. No rate of interest is mentioned in the Acts; but an actuarial calculation shows that the rate involved in that annuity is about £3 16s. per cent. The table under which the outstanding instalments of such an annuity are redeemed was framed, not by the Treasury, but by the Land Commissioners. Under it the instalments are discounted at slightly more than the rate of interest involved in the annuity.

THE IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, having regard to the fact that the Irish Constabulary, when serving in the cities of Ireland, have numbers on the uniforms like the Metropolitan Police, for the purposes of identification, and to the admission made by him that when members of the Irish Constabulary are removed from cities to country places, the numbers are taken from their uniforms; and, having also regard to the fact that constables of the Irish Constabulary have on several occasions declined to give their names when requested so to do, by persons who wished to report their conduct to the authorities, he will take steps to have the practice of putting numbers on the uniforms of the Constabulary identical both in cities and country districts of Ireland?

*MR. MADDEN: In reply to this question, I must refer the hon. Member to previous answers to the subject in November and December, 1889, and May, 1890. I may add that it is the custom of the police to give their names upon a reasonable request being made.

MR. MAC NEILL: Is it not the fact that members of the Constabulary have committed assaults and then refused to give their names? As a matter of fact, a constable at the Falcarragh evictions assaulted me and declined to give his name.

*MR. MADDEN: If the hon. and learned Member suggests that there have been any particular variations from the custom which I have mentioned, and will give a definite notice, I will make inquiry.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Does the custom of refusing to give a name rest upon an instruction from head quarters?

*MR. MADDEN: I am not aware that there have been any instructions.

MR. MAC NEILL: Do the Government distinctly refuse to have the members of the Royal Irish Constabulary numbered? In May last, constables were taken to Waterford and numbered, but the numbers were deliberately taken off subsequently, and the men engaged in a baton charge.

*MR. MADDEN: I must refer to the previous answers which I have mentioned in regard to that question.

LAND PURCHASE.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has now ascertained if there are any precedents for providing by Act of Parliament, as proposed in the Land

Mr. Mac Neill

Purchase Bill, for the issue of Stock to an amount unnamed.

MR. GOSCHEN: There are several Acts under which authority is given to the State to make loans without any limit being assigned as to the liability incurred. Loans for School buildings under the Education Acts may be instanced. How far these precedents are or are not applicable to the Land Purchase Bill I shall be prepared to argue in Committee.

MR. J. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what were the sums respectively realised by the five holdings put up for sale in 1888 in consequence of failure in payment of instalments of purchase money, by the 10 so put up in 1889, and by the 17 in 1890; and whether any, and, if so, what number of holdings were put up for sale by the Land Commission for the same reason between 25th November, 1890, and 7th February, 1891?

MR. MADDEN: The Land Commissioners report that all the holdings referred to were put up for sale subject to the Statutory Annuities. The sums realised by the five holdings put up for sale in 1888 were as follows:—1, Eliza Coffey, nil; 2, Laurence O'Neill, £120; 3, Laurence O'Neill, £170; 4, Laurence O'Neill, £155; 5, Laurence O'Neill, £110. The sums realised by the 10 so put up in 1889 were as follows:—6, Henry Burgess, £110; 7, Thomas Hahessy, £71; 8, Johanna Navin, nil; 9, Catherine Brien, £105; 10, John Neill, £45; 11, Edmund Delahunty, £100; 12, Andrew E. Johnstone, £100; 13, Johanna M'Mahon, £45; 14, Mary Keenan, £5; 15, Eliza Butler, £6. The sums realised by the 17 holdings so put up in 1890 were as follows:—16, Bridget Dermody, £25; 17, Denis Keefe, £65; 18, Thomas White, £40; 19, James Fitzgerald, nil; 20, Daniel Ahern, nil; 21, James Ahern, nil; 22, Bartholomew Foley, £55; 23, Catherine Cummins, £190; 24, Susan E. Keily, £28; 25, William Walsh, £65; 26, John Kerny, £16; 27, Patrick Dennehy, £24; 28, Bartholomew Dooling, £51; 29, Patrick Brennan, £55; 30, James Lenihan, £72; 31, William Shirley, nil; 32, Richard Taylor, nil. Two holdings were similarly put up for sale between November 25th, 1890, and February 7th, 1891, with the following results:—33, John Brosnan, £56; 34, John Harrington, no bidders at auction, but since offered £150. In the cases numbered 1 and 8 the guarantee deposits were applied in discharge of the arrears of annuity due and by consent of the owners in reduction of the original advances, and the holdings were assigned to the new purchasers subject to annuities on the advances so reduced. In cases numbered 19, 20, 21, 31, and 32, in which there were no biddings, the arrears of annuity were discharged out of the guarantee deposits, and the holdings (as stated in respect of three of them in the annual Report) are in the hands of the Commission pending resale.

PRISONERS IN CUSTODY BEFORE TRIAL.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he could state (approximately) in how many instances during the past ten years have the periods spent in prison before trial been allowed to reckon in commutation of sentences, either by the Judge taking into account the time which the prisoner had remained in custody before trial or by the Home Secretary permitting the period of detention previous to trial to reckon as a portion of the sentence?

MR. MATTHEWS: There is no information in the possession of the Home Office which would enable me to give a statistical answer to this question. The calendars which are supplied in every case to Judges of Assize, Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, and Records of Boroughs, give the date when each prisoner is committed for trial, and the Secretary of State assumes that the Judge, in passing sentence, takes this previous imprisonment into account, and does not therefore regard it as affording grounds for alleviation of sentence when the case comes under review at the Home Office.

COLONEL NOLAN: Has the right hon. Gentleman, within the last ten years, ever remitted a portion of a sentence on this account?

MR. MATTHEWS: Previous imprisonment is always taken into consideration.

COLONEL NOLAN: I am asking about a fact, and the right hon. Gentleman is answering about the state of the mind of the Home Secretary, of which I wish to know nothing. Has the right hon. Gentleman himself ever done it?

MR. MATTHEWS: Personally it has not fallen within my province.

HAULBOWLINE DOCKS.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has received a Memorial, largely and influentially signed by the inhabitants of Queenstown and other places in Cork Harbour, and which was forwarded by the Rear Admiral Commanding, urging the desirability of completing the Royal Docks at Haulbowline with workshops and plant to make it efficient; and what consideration are the Lords of the Admiralty prepared to give to the Memorial?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: No such Memorial has reached the Admiralty. The dock and basin at Haulbowline are complete. Existing buildings and machinery are being adapted or provided for fitters' workshops.

MR. MORROGH: How long will it be before the works are completed? Although £50,000 of the public money has been expended, nothing has yet been done in the way of utilising the docks.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Gentleman must be aware that this is a dry dock, and that no work can be done in it unless ships put in for repair.

IRELAND—UNTRIED PRISONERS.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if his attention has been directed to complaints raised by the Magistrates and Corporation of the City of Limerick to the practice of marching, handcuffed, untried prisoners, principally charged with trivial offences, through the public streets of Limerick from the County Gaol to the Court Houses, a distance of nearly two miles; and if, in view of such complaints, he will direct that a covered vehicle be in future employed for such purpose, as in other cities?

*MR. MADDEN: I have asked for a Report to enable me to answer the question.

THE DRAINAGE OF THE RIVER BARROW.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has received the copy of a resolution passed by the Mountmellick Board of Guardians, praying the Government to undertake the drainage of the River Barrow, and basing their request on the unhealthy condition of the towns through which the river flows, and the general want of employment among the people; whether he is aware that great poverty exists in Mountmellick and the neighbouring district among persons who are in want of work and cannot obtain it; and whether, in view of the forward state of Government business, he will re-introduce his Bill for the drainage of the Barrow?

*MR. MADDEN: In answer to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I have to say that the resolution to which he alludes has been received. As regards that part of his question which refers to the Drainage Bills, I must remind him that these Bills cannot be introduced unless preliminary notices are served upon the owners and occupiers concerned. In two or three successive years the Government undertook the cost and trouble of serving these notices, in addition to the expense of paying a staff of engineers for the purpose of framing the plans and advising the Government upon them. Each year these attempts to improve the condition of the flooded river beds of Ireland were rendered nugatory by the action of certain Members of this House. As there was no sign of any diminution in this opposition, the notices were, I believe, not given this year, and the Bills, therefore, cannot be introduced; but the Chief Secretary requests me to say that if he receives indications that the Bills are really desired, he will favourably consider the policy of taking steps to re-introduce them next Session. The Government have not altered their views as to the expediency of passing these measures.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: Will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration that a great deal of money has been expended in preliminary inquiry, and that there is a danger of its being entirely wasted.

*MR. MADDEN: It is not the fault of the Government if this money is ultimately wasted.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): Do the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman apply to the Bann also?

*MR. MADDEN: I believe so.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Will not the Government consider the desirability of treating the Barrow scheme separately?

*MR. MADDEN: I am not in a position to say that one scheme will be dealt with differently from the others.

MR. WALSH OF THE CASHEL SENTINEL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what was the date of the confirmation of the first sentence on Mr. Walsh of the Cashel Sentinel, the date of his second sentence, the date of the issue of the warrant in the first sentence, was it signed by the Resident Magistrates or County Court Judge, and the cause of the delay in issuing it?

*MR. MADDEN: The first sentence referred to in the question—that for inciting to assault and resist the police—was confirmed by the County Court Judge on the 10th of November, 1890. The date of his second sentence—that for conspiracy—was the 19th of November, 1890. The warrant in the case of the first sentence was signed by the Resident Magistrates who had originally convicted, not by the County Court Judge, on the 2nd of December. I have already stated, in reply to former questions, that it was impossible for the Resident Magistrates to issue the warrant in the appeal case before the commencement of imprisonment under the warrant in the conspiracy case, inasmuch as they had not then received the necessary certificate of the confirmation of the sentence by the County Court Judge, and I have also added that the delay in issuing this certificate took place in the office of the County Court Judge, and that the Executive are in no way responsible.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Referring to a conversation which passed on the subject of Public Business on Friday night between the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and myself, when I intimated that it might be necessary for me to ask for special facilities for the Tithes Bill, I hope that it may be possible that that step may not be necessary; but if we are not able to pass this Bill through its present stage this evening, I shall be under the necessity of asking for further facilities for it.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.—(No. 184).

CONSIDERATION. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

As amended, further considered.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [5th February],

"That the Clause (Limitation of penalties,)—(Mr. S. T. Evans),—be read a second time."

. Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(4.25.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): The Welsh people have great respect for the administrators of the law, but this large and unrestricted power of committing for contempt of Court ought not to be left to be exercised in these tithe cases by a possibly irritable and capricious Judge. We say that the County Courts ought not to have the power of imposing any disability, such as fine or imprisonment, for non-compliance with an order of the Court, except such non-compliance as is already specified in the County Courts Act. The power of commitment is one which ought not to exist, being one of an arbitrary nature and capable of being unfairly enforced. The proposal of the Bill is to incorporate the 162nd section of the County Courts Act, which gives the power of commitment if any person shall wilfully insult the Judge or any witness, registrar, plaintiff, or officer of the Court during the sitting of the Court. That is a provision we do not object to under proper regulations, as it is only proper that the administration of justice should be conducted with decency and respect towards those who administer it. But the section does not stop there. It goes on to declare that if any person shall insult the Judge during his sitting or attendance at the Court, or in going to or returning from the Court, or shall wilfully interrupt the proceedings of the Court, or otherwise misbehave in Court, it shall be possible for the Judge to order such offender into custody and commit him for any period not exceeding seven days. I maintain that that is a power which ought not to exist under any circumstances, as I know from personal knowledge that it may be used in a most arbitrary way. We are wise, I think, in insisting on the withdrawal of this source of irritation and friction. Whether you allow imprisonment or not, the moment you pass this Bill the Welsh people will be more determined than ever that the tithe shall not be paid. I do appeal to the House to consider whether at this moment it would be well to take a new departure of this kind simply in the interests of the dignity of the Court, without surrounding it by some safeguards by way of appeal or otherwise?

*(4.32.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bristol, W.): When the hon. Member first raised this subject I thought that all he proposed to do was to limit the power of the County Court Judge in these matters to the provisions of the County Courts Act, 1888. We are quite in accordance with that view, and I shall be prepared when the time comes to move a few words at the end of Sub-section 7, which would give, I think, effect to it. But now a far different matter is being raised, and it is impossible for us to concede what is being asked. The hon. Member proposes that

"The County Court shall not have power to impose any penalty, either by way of fine or imprisonment, for non-compliance with, or disobedience to, any order or officer of the Court in any proceedings under this Act, except only in the cases specified and provided for in Section 48 of the County Courts Act, 1888."

But I am sure the hon. Member is too well acquainted with the County Court Act not to see that the provisions of such a clause are far wider than he at first contemplated. He must be aware that Sections 50, 102, and 111 of the County Courts Act of 1888 set out offences punishable by fine, which nobody can say with any reason ought not to be so punished. Among these offences are extortion, misconduct, or refusing to account for money on the part of an officer of the Court, non-attendance of juror, and refusing to give evidence, to produce books, or to be sworn as a witness. Surely no one would desire to deprive the County Court of the powers it possesses in these cases, and no hon. Member would feel sympathy with offenders of this kind. Then Section 162 enables the Court to commit for a period of seven days for insults directed to the Judge, jurors or officers of the Court, or for misconduct in Court. When this clause was under discussion in Committee I understood that its supporters were willing that Section 162, as well as Section 48, of the Act of 1888 should be recognised as applicable to cases brought under this Bill.

MR. S. T. EVANS* (Glamorgan, Mid): For offences committed in Court.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I understood the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby as tantamount to a suggestion that both sections should stand.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): With some modification of Section 162.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not wish to doubt the right hon. Gentleman's recollection, but I do not remember that he suggested any modification of Section 162. An hon. Member has spoken of that section as a discredit to our system of administering justice. But the House will remember it was deliberately settled after a most patient investigation by a Committee a little more than two years ago, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton took a very active part in the consideration of the matter. Why should a law agreed to so recently as that be changed in respect only to actions for the recovery of tithe rent-charge? The House should observe that the power of the County Court Judge, under Section 162, is limited to committal for seven days. The section is intended to protect the Court from insult. There is no power, as has been suggested by some hon. Members, to fine a man for calling for "three cheers for Mr. Gladstone" while the process of recovering tithe rent-charge is being carried into effect. The forty-eighth section will only apply in a case where an officer of the Court is assaulted in the execution of his duty, or where a rescue is made or attempted. I have only to say, in conclusion, that if hon. Members opposite desire that it shall be made clear that the powers of the County Court Judge, under this Bill, shall be limited by the provisions of the Act of 1888, I am willing to insert in the measure words for that purpose. If, on the other hand, the intention is to take away from the Court some of the powers deliberately granted by the Act of 1888, I must resist it.

(4.40.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I understand—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman has already spoken on this Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Certainly. But I only wished, by the indulgence of the House, to make a suggestion to my hon. Friend. It is, that as the right hon. Gentleman will undertake to bring in words of his own to carry out my hon. Friend's wish, and as there will be an opportunity upon that Amendment to discuss the whole matter, it would be as well now to let the subject stand over until the House is in possession of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment.

*(4.42.) MR. S. T. EVANS: When will the words proposed by the Government be in our hands?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will put them on the Paper as soon as I can—probably to-night.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: Then I am prepared on that understanding to take the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

(4.43.) MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I have to propose a new clause, to the following effect:—

"In any action or matter under this Act, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff or defendant to require a jury to be summoned to try the said action or matter."

Now, trial by jury is a privilege possessed by all litigants, and no good reason has been urged by the Government for denying the same right to the tithepayer. I raised this question in Committee, and I again raise it on Report, because of the strong feeling in the Principality in favour of the clause. The tithepayers cannot understand why they should be deprived of the protection of trial by jury. Under Section 101 of the County Courts Act, 1888, there is no right to a jury except in cases where the amount claimed exceeds £5, unless by leave of the Judge. Now, that rule should not apply in this matter. The tithepayer should have an absolute right to trial by jury. I therefore hope the Government will concede this, as, if they refuse it, hardly a tithepayer in Wales will be able to take his case before a jury. The great majority of the cases arising under the Act will be under £3. In the largest agricultural county in Wales, Carmarthenshire, the average of the tithe is a little over £3, in another county it is £2 15s., and in a third £2 11s. The County Court jurisdiction runs up to the sum of £50; under the Employers' Liability Act it is up to £300, and on the equity side it goes up as high as £500. I take it, when the £5 limit was fixed it was intended that the poorest litigants should have the right to a jury. Now, these tithe cases are not without a political significance. The noble Lord the Member for Darwen the other evening seemed to deny that they were of a political character, and he went on to make the astounding statement that if they were of a political character then a Judge was the best tribunal to deal with them, and not a jury.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): What I said was that they ought not to be of a political character; but that if political feeling were improperly imported into them, then it would be better for a Judge to deal with them than to have a jury.

MR. RANDELL: I fail to see the distinction between my version of the noble Lord's remarks and the one he has just given. I maintain that these cases are not without political significance, and that, therefore, juries form the best tribunals to deal with them. There is another reason why the Government should concede this, namely, that I think, with one exception, the County Court Judges in the Principality of Wales—and I cast no reflection upon them for it—are English-speaking gentlemen, without any knowledge whatever of the Welsh language. It is, therefore, of importance that in matters like these they should have the intervention of a jury who understand both languages. Under the existing system, the evidence has often to be interpreted, and is very imperfectly translated. If the Government do not accept the clause, I must press my Motion to a Division.

Clause (Trial by Jury).—(Mr. David Randell.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(4.49.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am sorry that the hon. Member has thought it necessary to raise this matter, because it has been very fully discussed already in Committee, and all the arguments which he has now employed have been adduced before. I have listened carefully to his remarks, and I do not think he has added anything to his previous arguments. With regard to those small sums below £5, there is no particular grievance so far as Wales is concerned, because tithes to the like amount are to be found in every parish in England. I could name parishes where the number of small sums payable as tithe are quite as numerous as in any place named by the hon. Member. If the clause is accepted, there will be one law for the recovery of debts generally under £5, and another when the sums are due for tithe rent-charge, and I certainly see no reason why such a distinction should be drawn.

*(4.51.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I certainly cannot understand what the noble Lord the Member for Darwen meant by the distinction he drew between proper and improper political feeling. Probably he would say that Liberal political feeling was improper and Conservative proper political feeling. It is quite clear that some sort of feeling, whether ecclesiastical or political, does enter into the matter. As my hon. Friend said, if the Government do not accept the new clause, there will, in Wales, be practically no right to a jury at all, because in almost every case the amount in dispute will be under £5. The desire to have the matter tried by a jury does not depend upon the amount at all; it is a question of principle; and if the cases are tried by men who do not understand the Welsh language, the defendants will think they have not been fairly treated. The clause is in the interest of the County Court Judges themselves, who, I am sure, would desire to shift the responsibility to a jury. I may point out that the clause does not compel the parties to go to the expense of a jury: it will be optional.

(4.53.) MR. J. L. MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): If the Government desire that this Act shall work smoothly and easily, they would do well to accept this reasonable suggestion. We are told that the Welsh people will not suffer any grievance by reason of its rejection, but we know now that the average of the payment is about £3, so that a jury will be refused in nearly every case. The case of England is entirely distinct from that of Wales, because there the tithe payments are usually very much in excess of £5. Therefore the English tithepayer will be able, if he desires, to have his case tried before a jury—a privilege refused to the Welsh tithepayer. I should be the last man in this House to impugn the impartiality of the County Court Judges in Wales. I never have done so, and I hope I never shall. But that is not the question we have now to consider. The question is whether or not the people who are to be brought into the County Court will believe they will get justice if they are refused a jury. The Welsh tithepayers are a body of men most anxious to meet their just liabilities, but the tithe is a burden, the bearing of which they object to on moral grounds. Probably they have never before been brought into contact with the County Court, and they do not understand the English language; but if they have a jury it will go far to assure them that they will get justice, and they will not leave the Courts grumbling at the Judge and throwing out the suggestion that the case has not been properly tried. I hope the Government will accept this new clause.

(457.) SIR W. HARCOURT: It is quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman has suggested, that this question has been already discussed in Committee, but the whole object of our proceedings is that we shall have, not vexatiously, but on questions of principle, an opportunity of challenging the decision of the Committee. This is an important matter, although it may not be necessary to go into it at length; but it depends upon what we are going to do, whether this County Court jurisdiction is to be a blessing or a curse. Are you going to make that jurisdiction fall more heavily on the tithepayers? This matter affects the County Court just as much as it does the tithepayers. The County Court is, on the whole, a great blessing to the poorer classes; it is an efficient and, on the whole, a cheap method of recovering debt, and on that account we ought, if we can, to maintain the character and the popularity of the County Court in the country. But now what are you going to do? You are going to make the County Court the instrument, practically speaking, of fighting a political battle. That will be extremely injurious to the County Court, for the County Court Judge will then become, as it were, the protagonist in the tithe war in Wales. If you leave him the undivided responsibility you will inflict an immense injury on his position. In the interest of the County Court Judges, then, it is desirable the responsibility should rest, as far as possible, upon a jury. In the general administration of the law in this country it has been an enormous advantage to the Judiciary to have a jury to share the responsibility of decisions. There cannot be the smallest doubt that the measure as it stands will place the County Court Judge in a position of immense difficulty in this class of cases. It has been observed by a noble Lord on the other side that in political cases it is better to leave the decision to a Judge without a jury. But you are not going to exclude the jury from political cases where the sum involved exceeds £5. If a man happens to belong to the wealthier classes he can have a jury. In England the larger proportion of cases being over £5 there will be a right to a jury; but in Wales the poor tithepayers will hardly ever have a jury at all. That is a distinction extremely invidious. For these reasons the Government should re-consider their decision. They ought to reflect how their scheme will operate upon County Court jurisdiction. Upon the decision of the Government will depend whether or not we shall offer a strong resistance to the whole Bill, or at any rate to the County Court Clause. I am not in favour of County Courting the tithepayers throughout the country. You must take adequate guarantees that the County Court jurisdiction shall not be made oppressive. It is most important that in transferring the jurisdiction we should leave no elements of vexation that can be avoided. From the point of view of mitigating the difficulties of litigation it is most reasonable that in all cases the parties should have a right to a jury. You do not deny that right if the tithe payable is over £5. The Government say they are not enforcing a new principle. But my reply is that for the first time you are putting tithes under the County Court jurisdiction, and that in itself is a reason for considering how to make that jurisdiction least oppressive. I am quite sure, from what I know of the character of this question, both in England and in Wales, that this Act will give rise to serious friction, which will injure not only the interests of the parties, but also your County Court jurisdiction. Under these circumstances, I hope the Government will seriously consider their position with regard to this matter; at all events, there is only one course open to the Opposition, and that is to offer a most earnest protest, and to place on record the fact that we have contended strenuously with the Government to secure for the poor people of Wales a right to a jury in all cases arising out of tithe.

*(5.9.) MR. J. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I had hoped that in the interval which has elapsed since this matter was last discussed the Government would have seriously reflected on the position in which they find themselves, and have come to the conclusion that they would best serve their own interests by conceding this point. I contend that the Government, by conceding the Amendment, will serve, first, the interests of those to whom is confided the administration of justice in tithe questions, namely, the County Court Judges, who would gladly see themselves rescued from the invidious position of acting both as Judges of law and fact in the new and delicate administration intrusted to them; secondly, they will advance the interests of the people of Wales, because by far the great majority of cases arising in the Principality will involve sums of less than £5; and, lastly, they will serve their own interests, because there is much objection to the alteration of the law proposed by them of bringing the recovery of tithe within the County Court jurisdiction. Everything should be avoided which will tend to keep alive the dissatisfaction felt with this new mode of dealing with unpaid tithe, and it would give confidence to the people, and enable the Act to work smoothly, if this Amendment were accepted. In face of these advantages, to what disadvantages can the Government point? What is there to justify them in refusing to accept this Amendment? We have been told by an hon. Member opposite that a Judge is the best tribunal where political considerations are properly or improperly imported into a case. Now, whilst placing on record my belief that the County Court Judges in Wales will do their best to administer the law impartially, may I point out it is impossible for them to disentangle themselves from those prejudices which belong to them as men. If juries are prejudiced, so also Judges may be, and in choosing between the two it is well to select the tribunal most likely to have the confidence of the general public. The right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, whose courtesy we have had so much pleasure in acknowledging in these Debates, says we have advanced no new arguments; that may be taken, perhaps, as a tribute to the exhaustive nature of the arguments before adduced. It is clear, however, our arguments have not had the effect we hoped for. We believe this is a vital question, and we still hope that the Government will reconsider their decision, for they have not shown any disadvantages likely to arise from the concession.

*(5.15.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The remarks I addressed to the House upon this subject have been misunderstood. It has been assumed that if this Amendment is not accepted, cases under £5 will be precluded from trial by a jury. This is not so at all. My proposal is that in all actions where the amount claimed does not exceed £5 it shall be lawful for the Judge, on the application of either party, to order that such action shall be tried by jury. Therefore, if the Judge thinks fit, he will order a jury in cases under £5.

*MR. J. BOWEN ROWLANDS: That is so, but we say the right should be absolute, and that it should not be left in the discretion of the Judge.

*(5.17.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): The only objection to this clause put forward by the Government is that it will alter the County Court procedure. But I think that as the Bill will introduce an entirely new means of collecting the tithe, and a more expensive means than formerly, the right of a jury should be given in all cases, especially as the larger number of tithe claims are for amounts under £5. I can conceive no valid objection on the part of the Government to granting the privilege asked for. I do hope the President of the Board of Trade will re-consider his decision.

*(5.19.) MR. S. T. EVANS: If we have said nothing new in favour of the clause, the Government have said nothing new against it. It appears to me that the objection of the Government to the clause is simply an academical one, for they will not grant the concession because it is not in the County Court Act at present. But the right hon. Member for Derby has fully answered that objection, because, as he stated, a new jurisdiction is to be given to the County Court. What harm can possibly follow from the acceptance of the new clause? On the contrary, you will, by agreeing to it, preserve respect for the County Court Judge, and you will keep up the sympathy which now exists between the Judiciary and the suitors in the Court. It has not been shown that a single disadvantage will result from granting trial by jury in cases under £5, and I cannot understand why the Government so obstinately oppose it. Why should you make this difference between a claim for £5 0s. 1d. and one for £4 19s. 11d.? The objection of the Government is a purely pedantic one. Moreover, by the terms of the clause the right in such cases will be optional, and thus the point of expense falls to the ground. Surely if a plaintiff or defendant thinks he will have a better hearing with a jury, and chooses to pay the additional expense, he should in common fairness be allowed the privilege of a jury as well as in cases of more than £5. If the Government accept the clause they will facilitate the passing of this Bill. Can the Attorney General point out any disadvantage likely to arise from the adoption of the clause? If not, do not let us have it.

(5.23.) MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): I look on the clause as a sedative, which will allay the irritation likely to be caused by the Bill. By adopting it the collection of tithe will be made less distasteful. It will tend to the smooth working of the Act, and remove the natural irritation which will otherwise arise, especially among the small tithepayers, against the County Court system of collection. It will, moreover, relieve the Judges of a responsibility which I am sure they will have no desire to exercise. I number many of those Judges among my personal friends; and, speaking from their point of view, I say this duty if cast upon them will be a very distasteful one, and they would hail with pleasure the intervention of a jury. If the clause is not accepted you will have different practices in different districts. One Judge will allow a jury in cases under £5, and another Judge in the adjoining district may not, and there again will be cause for dissatisfaction. Again, if there is a right to a jury, a tithepayer will not necessarily demand one, but he will know if the decision of the Court goes against him it was only by his consent that the Judge adjudicated. The acceptance of this clause will take from the Judges a responsibility, the exercise of which would be most unpopular, and will throw it upon the class of people by whom the tithe has to be paid. I think that, under these circumstances, the Government should agree to the clause.

*(5.27.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): What particular point would have to be decided by a jury in these cases? That is a question I wish to put to hon. Members opposite. If a case goes into a County Court the only questions to be decided are those of apportionment and ownership. It is not like a running down or right of way case, in which there may be a conflict of evidence. I am perfectly certain the Judges of County Courts in England and Wales will be quite ready to exercise any responsibility the Legislature may place upon them, and will have no desire to evade it. I confess that I see no necessity for juries in these tithe cases at all, whatever the amount. The main points for decision will be for the Court, and not for a jury. The only thing for which a jury could be called in would be to say whether tithe shall be paid at all—that is for us—and surely it cannot be said that such a course will facilitate the recovery of tithe. It might lead to numerous disagreements of juries, and destroy the chance of recovering tithe. I have not heard a single argument to justify the adoption of the clause, and I fear that if it is accepted it will only open up new and serious sources of trouble.

(5.29.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): The argument of the hon. Member for Woolwich applies with as much force to cases over £5 as to cases under £5. If the clause is carried there will not be one law for England and another for Wales, though no doubt appeals to a jury will be of more frequent occurrence in Wales than in England. I trust that some answer will be given by the Government—by one of the Law Officers of the Crown—to the question raised by the hon. Member for Glamorganshire. The objections stated by the Government to having a jury in cases under £5 have been most extraordinary. After all, it is not a difference of principle that is involved at all. The difference is one merely of degree. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach) hinted that he was not in favour of having one law for England and another for Wales. If this clause were carried that would not be the case, because there would be one law only for the whole of Great Britain in this matter. I cannot agree with the suggestion that the clause should be made applicable only to Wales, because there are many cases in England in which the amount of the tithe is very small, although in comparison with the aggregate amount paid the number of cases of small payments in Wales is no doubt larger than in England. But if this concession is made in Wales I do not see why it should not also be made in England. An answer to those who raise objections to the clause on the ground that it would be rarely made use of can be supplied from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade himself. In one of the earlier stages of this Debate it was urged on this side of the House that the benefits of Clause 3 could not be obtained by the tithepayer except in cases where the matter had been brought before the County Court, and the right hon. Gentleman contended that in the great majority of cases the matter would not be brought before the County Court at all, but would be settled amicably. Probably in practice the number of appeals under this clause would not be as large as is anticipated in some quarters; but, on the other hand, the probability is that when they were made some important question of principle would be involved, and it is very difficult to see why a distinction should be drawn in this respect between cases of over £5 and cases involving less than that amount. The only result following upon the rejection of this clause will be the same as that which will follow upon the rejection of the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Lloyd-George), namely, that the settlement of these questions will be relegated as far as possible to a sphere in which the tithepayers will have no power whatever, and in which those who are responsible for the decision cannot be made amenable to public opinion on the spot. I think you are placing an extremely invidious task in the hands of the County Court Judges, and one which will recoil not only on those who perform these invidious duties, but on the Government which has cast such duties upon them.

(5.34.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I think I am correct in saying that tithe is assessed on the whole farm. Now, suppose a case in which a farm is split up into allotments amongst six or seven different proprietors. Whenever the tithe owner sues for tithe in such a case questions of the amount to be paid by each man, and boundary and other questions will have to be decided by a jury. This is not a mere conjectural case, because I was myself consulted in a case where one little peasant proprietor had for 30 or 40 years paid tithe on land which belonged to another owner, the tithe not having been properly allocated and assessed. I believe that such cases frequently arise, especially in Wales, and therefore I say that the proposed clause is specially applicable to Wales. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill has complained that we are reiterating the arguments we used in the Committee stage. That is not our fault. To not one of those arguments did the Government attempt to give a reply, and they did not even allude to them categorically. I think I am correct in saying that the learned Attorney General made the only speech on behalf of the Government, and that he made no attempt whatever to reply to the several speeches delivered on this side of the House. One of the arguments put forward was that the judgment in a case, which in itself involved only a question of £1, might decide the principle raised in 40 or 50 separate cases brought before the Court on that day. Why, it was asked, should there not be a jury in a case of that kind? Another argument that has not been answered is based upon the fact that in a civil debt case of £5 the defendant may demand a jury, and the Court has no option in the matter. In a tithe case it must be remembered that the payment involved is an annual payment, and I do not see why any distinction should be made between cases in which £3 or £4 and those in which £5 or £6 is involved. Under the circumstances, I think we are right in pressing the clause to a Division.

(5.59.) MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): Although we are not able to bring forward new arguments which are conclusive enough, in the opinion of Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, to justify them in acceding to our proposals, we are bound to carry out our duty to our countrymen. If we cannot any further argue the question with the Government, I am not ashamed to stand here and appeal to them on behalf of my fellow countrymen, against whom this Bill is directed. I am not ashamed of saying again that unless this clause is granted to us our people will not be upon equal ground with the English people in these matters. It is not sufficient to tell us that we cannot be dealt with differently from people in Yorkshire or in other large English counties. We say there is a great difference between the two cases. There is in Wales a strong repugnance to the payment of an impost for which the people receive no service. Indeed, we go further, and say there is a strong repugnance to keeping alive a class of people who will not work for their living. These people demand pull pay, although they do no work for it. We find on inquiry that four-fifths of the amounts in dispute in Wales will not be sufficiently large to secure the empannelling of a jury, whereas in England three-fourths of the tithes will be large enough to entitle the persons concerned to claim a jury without the option of the Judge. How can it be said, under such circumstances, that the two peoples are upon an equal footing? Again, I cannot refrain from referring to the right of all citizens to be tried by their fellow-countrymen, and in this respect there will be some inequality between the English and the Welsh. Three-fourths of the English people concerned in the payment of tithe will have the right to be tried by their peers, whereas you refuse the same right to four-fifths of the Welsh people, who are quite as law-abiding as the English. For these reasons we again ask the Government, if they despise our arguments, to listen to our appeal. If they want the law to be obeyed, let them help us to make this Bill work as smoothly as possible in the Principality. This Bill is about to be passed against the expressed wish and desire of five-sixths of the Representatives of Wales, and the remaining sixth do not care to come here to represent their constituents. There could not be a stronger indication of the real feeling of the Principality than the fact that the few Welsh Members who sit on the opposite Benches dare not say a word in support of the Bill. By this Bill you are only making a scourge for the people's backs, because 10,000 Bills would not change Welshmen's opinions as to your right to tithe.

(5.44.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I assure the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. W. Abraham) that we have no wish whatever to despise the arguments of the Welsh Members; neither have we any desire, as the hon. Member for the Eye Division (Mr. F. Stevenson) seemed to impute to us, to avoid the control of public opinion. But it must be borne in mind that the question to be tried is not whether tithe ought to be levied, but simply whether the land in question is subject to tithe, and whether or not tithe ought to be paid. There cannot be one case in a hundred in which there should be any political feeling, or which ought to be controlled by public opinion. As to the trial by jury of causes in the County Court, hon. Members know perfectly well that frequently applications are made to the County Court Judge for a jury, and that after looking into the circumstances he orders one to be empannelled. Depend upon it, if the County Court Judges feel they may, in certain cases, be accused of political bias, they will be the first to recognise the wisdom of empannelling a jury. But, knowing, as we do, that not only in Wales, but in England, there are in some parishes hundreds of tithe-payers, and that the tithe only amounts to a few shillings, we cannot see any reason why there ought to be any deviation from the ordinary rules applicable to the cases of small debts in County Courts.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: My contention with regard to public opinion was that if you allow public opinion to be brought to bear on juries in cases of sums over £5, you cannot consistently exclude public opinion in the case of sums of less than £5.

(548.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The Attorney General has stated very moderately his reasons for refusing to agree to this Amendment, and in view of his moderation I am surprised the Government do not accept the clause. We have been accused of the reiteration of arguments; but there is a new argument which, drawn as it is from experience in this House, will, I think, appeal to hon. Members: it is the argument of the Division List. It is really extraordinary that when you have, with one single exception, the whole body of Welsh Members supporting a request that there should be granted in these cases the right of trial by jury, the House of Commons should reject the proposal. Suppose that all the Representatives of our shipping ports, with the exception of one hon. Gentleman, were to protest against some Bill with regard to shipping which the Government had brought in, would the Government force that Bill through the House? Or if all the county Members of England were to protest against a Local Government Bill, is it credible that any Government would force the measure down their throats? It seems to me the Welsh Members have very good reason for the stand they are taking. This Bill is, as regards England, comparatively unimportant. It is true it will alter the incidence of tithe and will really be a nuisance to a good many landowners, but in Wales the case will be more serious. In Wales there will be a forcing of the consciences of the people, and here I come to the main argument of the Attorney General. He says that in the cases that will come before the County Courts no public opinion will be involved. Public opinion of the most important kind will be involved, namely, the public opinion of the community as to whether the judgment is a just one or not. You have not to consider the judgment only, but you have to consider what will follow the judgment. The execution of the judgment will be carried out under circumstances which we know occasionally involve disorder. By whom will the cases of disorder be tried? It may be by the County Court Judge proceeding by way of contempt of Court. The County Court Judge is an official against whom I can say nothing except that he is a lawyer with a lawyer's ideas of these matters and a lawyer's feeling that he must administer the strict letter of the law without regard to the conscience or politics of the people. Or the cases will be tried by Justices of the Peace, and who are the Justices of the Peace in Wales? There are counties in the Principality where four-fifths of the people are Nonconformists, where Nonconformity and the Church come into serious conflict, and yet where not three, not two, of the Justices of the Peace are Nonconformists; sometimes there is not even one Nonconformist on the Bench. It is the original decision which settles what amount of tithe shall be paid, and we ask that in all cases a jury may be granted if either party desires it. The Government acknowledged in the most handsome manner a day or two ago that there had been no obstruction of the Bill on these Benches. Since then, however, we have had Debates and Divisions of a very different character, because the Government have come to the point of resistance. I believe the Government would do well to give way on this point. I do not quarrel with the speeches they have made in favour of their view, but I say they have not argued in a manner to show it is of any serious importance whatever. I am told by hon. Gentlemen who know Wales that the question whether these disorders shall be serious or light depends a great deal on whether the people are handled in a kindly and considerate manner or not. The Government would do well to imitate on a large scale the example of those Chief Constables and Magistrates who have shown consideration on a small scale, and give way to the universal request of the Welsh Representatives.

*(6.0.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I know hon. Members are anxious for a Division, so I will only occupy a few minutes in speaking in support of this Amendment. An hon. Member has asked what are the questions of fact a jury may have to determine, and I suppose he will admit that on a difficult question of fact it is proper that a jury should determine. Well, I hope after the speech of the Attorney General the hon. Member will support the Amendment, for the Attorney General has shown that there are questions of fact to determine—difficult questions of fact relating to identity of parcels and other similar matters. I notice that the framers of the County Court rules have recognised the necessity of trial by jury in similar cases already. In the case of an action for the recovery of land a jury may be demanded by a defendant in any case, and the questions of fact in these cases are very often precisely those questions which will have to be determined under this Bill. If it be considered desirable that a defendant in an action for the recovery of land should be entitled to a jury, why in the name of common sense should these farmers be deprived of that right when questions of precisely the same nature have to be determined here? We are told there will be no question of fact suitable for a jury to determine, and yet at the same time the Government have consented that in all cases over £5 a jury may be empannelled. Why should there be a different law for the rich and poor? Why should not the small farmer have the same right to a jury on questions of fact as the large farmer has? Over or above £5 the issues would be precisely the same. The Attorney General dealt somewhat lightly with the powerful argument of the hon. Member for Carnarvon as to the fact that in these cases it would largely be a question of capitalised value which would have to be determined. The Attorney General says it would be open to the defendant to raise the same question year after year when asked to pay his tithe, and that, of course, as a matter of theory, is perfectly true; but, as a matter of practice, we may be pretty confident that when the County Court Judge has decided a case one year, involving (say) a troublesome question as to identity of parcels, the Judge will not treat with much consideration a defendant who, by his action, insists on having the same question raised again in the following year. As a matter of fact we know the same question would not and could not be raised year after year. In the jurisdiction of the County Court the difference between an annual payment and a total payment has been recognised. Up to 1888 the limit of actions of ejectment was £20, but in other matters £50. Why this distinction? Evidently because the Legislature considered the limit should be smaller where the annual value was affected. Why not apply the same principle in this case? There is one other matter to which I should like to refer, as it is to some extent connected with the working of a system of small farming with which I am acquainted, perhaps, better than many hon. Members who do not know the conditions of small farming, and how trying these conditions may be in a hard year. For instance, the loss of a cow may handicap a small farmer most severely in one year, and on such an occasion the considerate tithe collector, the parson who does not wish to be at loggerheads with all his parishioners will grant more time for the payment of the tithe. But if doing this makes the difference between an amount due of over or under £5, then the parson will be tempted to sue at once, because he may desire to avoid a jury, thinking that the judgment of the Court without a jury is more likely to be in favour of the tithe owner than the tithepayer. As a matter of practice I think this might press heavily on small tithepayers. We have been told the Amendment would allow a jury to be empannelled on merely frivolous grounds, but a defendant will, if he has a jury, where his defence is frivolous, have to pay 5s. in addition to his other costs, and I do not suppose a man to whom such sums would be of great importance will be foolish enough to incur this fine unless he feels there is some question of fact which in justice a jury ought to determine. I think our Welsh friends are right in pressing this Amendment; they are fighting an issue similar to one we have had to fight in Irish Courts of Justice, and ultimately in the House of Commons.

(6.10.) Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I join in encouraging our Welsh friends to press this Amendment. I have listened carefully to the arguments on this clause, and to the discussions we had in Committee, and it seems to me the arguments of the hon. Members for Wales are unanswerable. Undoubtedly this tithe Bill has especial interest to Wales; the question of tithe is a burning one there, and without such safeguards as these I am afraid this Bill will be regarded in Wales as a measure of coercion. I contend that this is not, as the Attorney General would have us believe it is, a question of legal nicety; there is a great principle involved, and we shall give Welsh Members our strenuous support. The Attorney General made a great point of the raising of frivolous actions in Welsh Courts on these tithe questions if the clause were adopted, but I do not see, because it is possible that the operation of a law may be abused in a few isolated cases, that this safeguard should be refused to the Welsh people on this subject on which they feel so intensely. If many cases arise of amounts under £5, that will be because the people have such strong feelings on the subject. Estimable as many of the County Court Judges may be as men, and excellent Judges on questions of law as in ordinary cases they may be, we may well conceive that there may be in Wales, as I know there are in Ireland, cases in which County Court Judges do not act as they do towards other cases. I know in Cork a County Court Judge of high character, but in any case where in the smallest and most remote degree the National League is concerned this Judge is hopelessly prejudiced. I can conceive that the same thing may happen in Wales in relation to the tithe question, and hence I think this clause most desirable. I really cannot understand why the Government should so obstinately resist the Amendment.

(6.15.) Mr. ABEL THOMAS (Cardmarthen, E.): I hope that even yet the Attorney General may see his way to accept the Amendment. I am sure hon. members on the other side cannot have so much experience of County Court juries as we have, or they would not have the fear of them they seem to entertain. In the tens of thousands of cases dealt with by County Courts in England and Wales at the present time not five in a thousand are tried by jury. I can speak from personal knowledge of the Courts in Wales, and I can say, in Cardiff, for instance, not more than one in a thousand cases goes before a jury, and, when there is such a case, it is because character is at stake, or it is a heavy liability action. If we have this Amendment inserted, it is utterly absurd to suppose that for more than one in a hundred of these tithe cases a jury will be summoned. It will only be when some case has caused great local excitement, and when there are oaths against oaths, and the opinion of a jury would be useful. Why is it to be imagined that Welshmen will be so foolish as to summon a jury in every tithe action where amounts of 20, or 30, or 40 shillings are concerned? It will only be done in cases where much feeling is excited in the neighbourhood, and on occasions when it will be the best thing for the Court that there should be a jury. There are in my recollection two tithe cases tried in Wales last autumn, cases in which I was engaged, and which caused a considerable amount of excitement. One of these was a question of illegal distress for tithe, and the other was an assault upon a bailiff. In both cases we had a jury; there was conflicting evidence on oath, half a dozen witnesses swearing different ways. In both actions the jury gave a verdict in favour of the tithe owner, not the tithepayer, and I venture to think that if a County Court Judge had given the verdict the jury gave in either case he would have been hooted throughout the length and breadth of the Principality, but the fact that a jury of their own countrymen had given the verdict settled the whole matter so far as the opinion of the people in the district was concerned, and I do not think the justice of the decision has been called in question. Only in extreme cases would the power of calling a jury be used, and in cases where it would be the greatest blessing for the Judges themselves. The people would know that Nonconformists and Churchmen would be represented on the jury, and that it would be an honest verdict according to the evidence. There could be no possible harm in the arrangement; the Amendment cannot injure the efficacy of the Bill, and it will give satisfaction to the vast majority of the Welsh people.

(6.21.) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): The feeling in favour of the Amendment is unanimous among Welsh Members, and those who have spoken in support of it have had practical experience in relation to these matters and to County Court proceedings. The force of the arguments used must be acknowledged, and I trust the Government will yet yield on this point of principle we consider it our duty to urge. If we cannot succeed in inducing the Government to accept this modification of County Court jurisdiction then we shall have to move the omission of the jurisdiction of that Court altogether. We have not been without encouragement in the Committee discussion; the majority against us dwindled to a remarkable degree. I hope the Government will yet accept the proposal and that we shall be saved the necessity of going to a division.

*(6.23.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: May I appeal to the House now to come to a Division? We entirely appreciate the ability with which the Amendment has been urged. We have listened attentively to the arguments, but I am sorry to say we cannot accept the Amendment.

(6.36.) MR. D. RANDELL: I beg to move the new clause which stands next in my name, and which is directed against the awarding of costs on the higher scale. I would point out what may be the result if some such clause be not inserted. In one case where only three guineas were recovered, the taxed costs of the successful litigant amounted to the sum of £19 14s. In another case, where £5 was recovered, the costs were as high as £35; in another they were £41, and in a case tried the other day, in which tithe amounting to 2s. 10d. was involved, the taxed costs of the plaintiff and defendant reached a sum exceeding £100. I say that the Bill would place too much power on this point in the hands of the County Court Judges. It is true that the Government have met us with respect to the costs to a certain extent by proposing to insert a schedule of costs in the Bill, but unless Section 119 of the County Court Act is made inoperative by the insertion of a special clause in the Bill, that will be of no use whatever, because it will always be in the power of the County Court Judges to award costs capriciously on a mere statement, that in his opinion the action involves a novel point of law, or that the litigation is of special or public importance. When a suggestion was made in this House some few evenings ago, that novel points of law might be involved, the Attorney General demurred, and therefore I assume that the Government do not anticipate that such novel points will come within the operation of the Bill. If the Government are sincere, as I take them to be, in this matter of keeping down costs to the lowest possible amount, I hope they will accept the clause.

New Clause (Costs.)—(Mr. David Randell.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

(6.40.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I regret that I am not able to offer the hon. Member any encouragement. His argument was a little inconsistent with what has already occurred. He appealed very strongly to us the other day to allow an appeal on all questions, because points of law might be raised. I expressed the view at the time that the right of appeal was already given, but in deference to the wish of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) and others, we inserted in the clause a provision enabling an appeal to be made beyond all question. Now I ask the House to consider what this Amendment is. No one suggests that the County Court Judge will wantonly allow costs on the higher scale. No one will suggest that Section 114 of the County Courts Act has been in any way abused, and I should say that it is only in the rarest circumstances that the County Court Judge will exercise the power possessed by him. A case has been suggested in which a farm has been purchased by two owners, and a difficult question of tithe, or a question involving the rights of a class is raised and a test case has to be tried. I ask whether any suggestion can be made by hon. Gentlemen opposite which would lead us to come to the conclusion that a County Court Judge would knowingly certify in writing that an action involved a novel or delicate point of law when it did nothing of the kind? It has been held in the County Court Acts that in order to prevent defences being raised which put the plaintiffs to expenses they ought not to be asked to incur, the County Court Judge should have this power. The power is essential in the interest of the tithepayer as well as the tithe owner. The tithepayer may be put to great expense in proving a point of law, and in his desire to get a certificate from the Judge may point out that his case is a representative one, and that the decision affects not only himself but 40 or 50 other people occupying portions of the same freehold; and yet, if this clause were passed, the County Court Judge would be debarred from certifying for exceptional costs. It seems to me that the clause would be unfair both to the tithe owner and the tithepayer, as well as contrary to the claim made by hon. Gentlemen opposite on the question of appeal, and I am, therefore, afraid we must refuse our assent to it.

*(6.45.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I think the attitude taken up by the Attorney General is inconsistent with his position on the last clause we debated, when his argument was that where the amount in dispute is small, the principle involved cannot be large, and, therefore, should not be referred to a jury.

SIR R. WEBSTER: That was as to questions of fact.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: But the argument now is that though the amount in dispute may be small, there may be important points of law raised, and the Judge should have power to impose heavy costs on either party. We have heard a case quoted by my hon. Friend in which the amount in dispute was only a few pounds, but, yet, the costs amounted to £100. I do not know whether any one will get up and say that however novel the point of law that was raised, or however much a body or class of persons was affected, the costs were commensurate with the claim. The Government have put down a scale of fees to be allowed in cases under this measure. I am not going to discuss that scale now, but I may be allowed to point out that it will be entirely inoperative if you permit the Judge to certify for exceptionally heavy costs on the plea that a novel point of law has been raised. We are bond fide in supporting this clause, because the Attorney General has pointed out that a novel point of law may be raised by the defendant as well as the plaintiff. We, as representing the tithepayer, say that whether the point of law is raised by the defendant or the plaintiff, we do not wish to see heavy costs saddled on either party. In view of the important discussions which have been raised on the matter of costs, I trust the Government will see that there is no reason why our proposal should not be accepted. I have never been able to make out why this power of certifying for heavy costs should be given under any Act at all. This discussion will be useful if it only brings out the fact, which I think is admitted, that the County Court costs under the ordinary scale are far heavier than they ought to be. Do not let us, under this new procedure, have a heavier scale of costs applicable to the small sums with which the Court will have to deal under this Bill.

*(6.49.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: This question was considered in the Committee over which I had the honour of presiding, and the 119th clause of the existing Act was adopted after full discussion. But in this case we must bear in mind the circumstances of the litigants. It would be ruin to many of the Welsh farmers to have to pay £100 costs in a tithe case. The Government will, I think, do well to accept the clause.

(6.50.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The argument used by the Attorney General in opposition to the clause is a complete refutation of the argument he used against the previous clause. I ventured then to instance a case where the farm was divided into so many allotments, and where there would be an opportunity of contesting the distribution of the tithe over the different lots. The learned Attorney General completely ignored that argument. He did not even allude to it in his reply; but now, when it suits his purpose, he uses it as a special argument in opposition to the clause moved by my hon. Friend. I venture to declare that in very few cases of that kind will the question of apportionment resolve itself into a point of law. It will always be a question of fact; so that for every 10 cases that would suit the argument of the Attorney General there will be hundreds of cases that would suit my argument. The Attorney General has confined himself exclusively to points of law; but I would point out that this clause refers to cases not merely in which complicated points of law are raised, but also in which questions of general public importance are involved. In Wales, every case that is tried will raise questions of general public importance. Every payment of tithe in itself is a matter of general public importance; so much so that the Government have framed a schedule of costs, and I submit that unless this clause is adopted that schedule of costs will be altogether futile. I think that, even if the Government refuse to withdraw questions in which legal points are involved from the power and competence of the County Court Judge, they should certainly withdraw cases of more general public importance which do not involve complicated points of law.

(6.54.) COLONEL HUGHES: I would point out to the Mover of the clause that by his proposal he seeks to prevent extra costs being imposed on the defendant, but not on the plaintiff.

(6.55.) MR. D. RANDELL: I am quite willing to amend the clause so as to include both parties.

(6.55.) MR. A. WILLIAMS: It certainly would seem that if this clause is not accepted the schedule of costs will be useless, and it is difficult to discuss the present proposal without going into the question of the schedule. What we want is to adopt a principle, and to lay down guiding rules under which it would be impossible in a County Court action, or in a claim brought under this Act, under any excuse whatever, to have a large bill of costs on either side. It was with the view of preventing the possibility of that that the Amendment has been framed. Do the Government mean to grapple with this question of costs so as to lay down a minimum of fees? Even if questions of law are raised, care should be taken that they are settled without imposing heavy costs on plaintiff or defendant. Sooner or later the Government will have to give the County Court law to the people free from the possibility of these shameful lawyer's costs, of which we have heard to-night, and if they do not make a beginning in the present instance all their promises are futile.

(7.12.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to move the following Clause:—

“No person shall be imprisoned for contempt for anything in contravention of the powers conferred by this Act longer than one month.”

I hope that it will be possible for the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to accept this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that this question is one which has occupied the attention of Parliament for a considerable period. I propose that you should introduce a change in the law as to the length of the term of imprisonment—a change which has already been sanctioned in principle in another place. The Government are probably familiar with the fact that a Bill passed through the House of Lords dealing with the general question of contempt, in the year 1883. True the punishment in that Bill was limited for all offences of contempt, including ecclesiastical offences, to three months. Of course, there is this difference between that limit and my Amendment—that the latter proposes a limit of only one month. I need not say that I do not stickle very closely for a period of one month. But it has occurred to me that it would be possible for the right hon. Gentleman, and only consistent with the position which the Tory Party, who are of course in the majority in the House of Lords, took up seven years ago, with regard to the power of imprisonment for contempt. This matter is one of considerable importance, not only from the point of view of Welsh Members, but from the point of view of the power of pardon by the Crown, and of the general law. The peculiarity of imprisonment for contempt, as I understand it, is this: that it has been laid down not only by the present Attorney General, but by his predecessor in the case against Belt, that there is no power vested in the Crown to pardon for contempt; and following on the lines thus laid down the Irish Law Officers, in the case of bankruptcy proceedings against Thomas Moroney, gave a similar opinion. Therefore, I think that in this case, above all others, it is desirable to put some limits on, the powers of the Judges with regard to contempt. The royal prerogative of pardon I take it cannot apply to imprisonment for contempt, and, therefore, it is possible that a prisoner might remain in gaol for the entire period of his life. At present, an ordinary bailiff could only proceed for assault, but now you are giving power to imprison for contempt, and the term of imprisonment might be equal to the man's natural life. I do not say that any County Court Judge would take such a course; still, I do think it reasonable and proper that some limit should be fixed. I have endeavoured to discuss the question solely from the legal point of view. I am not going into the general merits or demerits of the Welsh Nonconformists versus the Church of England. I have solely argued it from the point of view of the necessity of amending the procedure. I do hope Her Majesty's Government will consider it in a similar spirit. I think when you are introducing a novelty of procedure in the case of Welsh tithe, it is eminently an occasion when you should show the Welsh people that you are doing nothing to inflict upon them an unusual punishment. It is a cruel and an unusual punishment to give the Court power of perpetual imprisonment, and there is no reason in the world why the Government should not limit the power of the County Court Judge. This is not a case in which the Government should be heedlessly vindictive, for it would give the Welsh representatives an opportunity of going to their constituents and saying that you had not proceeded fairly in this matter. The difference between myself and Her Majesty's Government cannot be one of principle, but one of degree. You cannot say, I think, that the County Court Judge should have the power of perpetual imprisonment, and, therefore, if you are wise in this matter you will accept the principle of my Amendment, and so at once put a stop to the discussion.

Clause (Imprisonment for contempt.)—(Mr. T. M. Healy),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

* (7.22.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I quite agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that the question between us is merely one of degree, and that no County Court Judge should have the power of inflicting perpetual imprisonment for contempt of Court. The hon. and learned Member's view is that the sentence should not exceed one month; the view of the Government is that it should not exceed seven days. It so happens that by Section 162 of the County Court Amendment Act, 1888, no County Court Judge has any power to inflict sentences for contempt of court except for such offences as are defined in that Act. The term of imprisonment is fixed at seven days. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will see that the law already provides a stronger check on County Court Judges than does his Amendment, which provides that the imprisonment shall be for a term of one month.

(7.25.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Although the County Court Judge may not inflict more than seven days for one offence of contempt, yet he may impose cumulative punishments for separate cases of contempt of Court, and thus be in a position to imprison a man for six weeks for six separate offences.

(7.26.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The only effect of discussing the hon. Member's Amendment would be that the punishment for separate offences would be greater than that for one offence. As a matter of fact each offence must be separate, and there can be only seven days' imprisonment, and not more, for each offence.

(7.27.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I would point out that if a person insults the Judge, or misbehaves himself in the County Court, the Judge may make out a warrant committing the man for seven days. Pending the execution of the warrant, the man may commit another contempt. ["No."] Excuse me, I am following a case which actually occurred, and in that case the man, before the warrant was executed, made a strong remonstrance against the County Court Judge for having improperly issued his warrant. That was a separate contempt. It may be that a man might commit under this Bill four or five separate contempts for which separate warrants could be made out. The suggestion of cumulative punishments, therefore, is not so absurd as it appears.

(7.27.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I can quite conceive that the right hon. Gentleman will not accept the clause; but will he so far meet the suggestion of my hon. Friend as to clear up the matter with respect to cumulative punishments?

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): Before the Question is put, I would ask the Government if they will consider a limitation of the character of the offence which is to constitute a contempt?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: All the offences are defined in the Act.

Question put, and negatived.

(7.28.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move the following clause:—

"Where any person shall appeal from any sentence of imprisonment inflicted in consequence of resistance to and officer in the execution of this Act, or contravention of the powers conferred by this Act, or any attempt thereat, and shall appeal from such sentence, he shall be liberated on entering into securities for his appearance on the hearing of such appeal."

At present a man is entitled to bail, should the Magistrate grant it. My proposal is that he should be absolutely entitled to bail, pending the appeal. I see no reason why the law in that respect should not be definite. Though the matter is a very small one, I hope the Government will accept my proposal.

*(7.29.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I should like to ask you, Sir, whether this comes within the scope of the Bill? The County Court Judge has no power whatever to inflict the sentences referred to in this Amendment, and I gather from the remarks of the hon. Member that his Amendment would merely apply to the Court of Summary Jurisdiction. I wish to ask whether that is within the scope of the Bill?

*MR. SPEAKER: As far as I can understand the clause put forward, it refers to the case of an officer who is a constable, in which case the County Court would have no jurisdiction.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to call your attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that Amendments have been passed dealing with the question of appeals, and what I am dealing with now is the question of appeals from the Magistrates and I cannot see why bail should not be allowed pending those appeals.

*MR. SPEAKER: If an assault is committed, and the defendant is brought before a Magistrate, then in that case this clause would apply. It would not apply to the County Court; it would apply to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction other than the County Court.

Clause (Appeals,) — (Mr. T. M. Healy,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

(7.30.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not think the hon. Member for Longford has made out any case at all for this clause. I can assure him that, as far as I know, the practice would be unprecedented to keep a man in prison pending an appeal. The universal practice is when an appeal is pending to give bail. I cannot think it would be wise to take away the Magistrate's discretion in an extreme case. The County Court Judge has no power or discretion in the matter. Then as a matter of general policy, and knowing it is the invariable practice to allow personal bail pending appeal, I think it would be unwise to sanction any alteration of the general law. I certainly am not prepared to accept the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman without a much stronger case being shown.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I would point out that, as is the case at the present moment, there may be a question as to whether the sureties offered by the accused are worth the amount of bail demanded, and the argument applicable to an ordinary case would be equally applicable in a prosecution under this Bill. It is in the power of the Magistrates, where bail is refused, to keep the accused in custody for three months; and, consequently, it is most necessary that the accused should be able to obtain liberation on his own security. I do not see what hardship this would entail on any one. It could inflict none on the officer of the Court; the only failure of justice might be in case the accused absconded and left the country, which, from the point of view of hon. Gentlemen opposite, would seem to be the best thing that could happen, as it would tend to decrease the number of future agitators, and would lessen the resistance offered to the Bill. I cannot see why the Government should not accept the Amendment.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: I think the case on behalf of this proposal is stronger than the Attorney General seems to imagine. The constant answer offered from the Treasury Bench to the arguments used on this side in support of the Amendments we propose is that we are trying to alter the general law. Our reply is that it is the Government who are altering the general law, because they are pressing into the service of the tithe owners the officers of the County Court, and giving a jurisdiction to the Magistrates which they have not at present. It is not at all in consonance with our wishes to be attacking those who are engaged in the judicial business of the Principality; we do not want to reiterate time after time that the Welsh Justices belong to the landlord and the Tory class, and are not in sympathy with the people of the Principality; but we ask the Government what possible hardship can there be in liberating an accused person pending his appeal, especially as a man is supposed to be innocent until he has been proved guilty?

Sir R. Webster

*(7.37.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The hon. Gentleman opposite has been under some misapprehension in thinking that we are proposing by this Bill to make any alteration in the ordinary law on the particular matter to which this clause refers. No doubt by the word "officer" he refers to the officer of the Court, but the same action would be taken by the Magistrate if the assault had been on a bailiff or any other person; and whatever rights there may be of liberation pending appeal, on tendering securities they are in no degree affected by the change which this Bill makes in the law with regard to the County Court.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: The experience of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. Healy) in Ireland is very different from anything we know of in England, where we manage these things in a different way from what takes place in the Sister Country; but this does not make it a bit the less necessary that we should make the law in this case just. It is perfectly monstrous that a person accused of resisting an officer of the Court should, pending the hearing of his appeal, be kept in custody if the Magistrates refuse to liberate him on bail; and I hope the Government will accept this most reasonable proposal.

(7.40.) MR. CONYBEARE: I am not at all influenced by the Attorney General's argument that it is inexpedient to alter the general law in a matter like this. It seems to me that the general law is always in want of amendment. But here we have had an important admission from the Attorney General, who says that what is asked by this Amendment is always done, not as a matter of right, but as a matter of discretion by the Magistrates. I understood my hon. Friend (Mr. A. Williams) to say it was a matter of right for the accused to have bail.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: A matter of moral right.

MR. CONYBEARE: Well, we have it on the authority of the Government that what is now asked is the usual procedure; but the prisoner has no right to demand it, it being purely discretionary. I know something of Magistrates, and all I can say on this point is that from one end of the country to the other the less discretion you allow the Magistrates the better it will be for the people. If the Attorney General is right, there can be no strong reason for not embodying in the Statute what he admitted to be the general practice. I hold that in accepting this Amendment the Government will be strengthening the hands of the Magistrates, by requiring that they shall do what we are told they always do now as a matter of discretion. Say what you will, there is bound to be a considerable amount of political feeling and bias in these cases; and if imprisonment may result from action taken in a moment of excitement, it seems to me all the more obligatory upon us to take every precaution to ensure that the danger of biased or prejudiced procedure on the part of the Magistrates should be minimised to the utmost. I say that, in the interests alike of the Church, the Magistrates, and the people, who may be the victims of injustice, it would be well to accept this Amendment, because if you give opportunity for the suggestion that this measure tells unfairly against the tithe-payers, and that they are to be made the objects of political persecution, you will do more than anything else you could do to diminish the prestige, which is very small at present, of the Church in Wales, while at the same time you will be striking a blow at the authority of the Magistrates throughout the Principality. From my own point of view I should not be inclined to admit that anything which threatens to destroy either the position of the Church in Wales, or the authority of the Magistrates there, is not eminently to be desired; but we are not now arguing the matter on those lines. I am certain, however, that the more safeguards against persecution we can introduce the better it will be both for the Church and the Magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill says the Government do not propose to alter the law as to the position and authority of the Magistrates; but the fact that the Government have introduced a Bill which does make fundamental and important innovations in the general law entitles us to try and introduce such further alterations of the general law as we may deem necessary.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not intend to go to a Division, and shall, therefore, ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.45.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I now move the Amendment which stands next in my name, namely—

“Where any person for resistance to the officers in execution of this Act, or contravention of the powers conferred by this Act, or any attempt thereat, shall be ordered to find security for the peace or good behaviour, and shall make default in finding such security, a sentence of imprisonment in consequence of such default shall not exceed one month.”

I trust that the Government will in this case show some readiness to amend the Bill, and I think my Amendment is one they might fairly accept. No appeal is possible where a person is sentenced for not giving security for his good behaviour, and, consequently, I think it would be wise on the part of the Government to adopt the limitation of one month, which I suggest. I do not hear the Welsh Members suggest that the County Court Judges in Wales are too strong in the view they take against Nonconformists; but I do feel that there is among the Welsh Members a very natural anxiety to protect their countrymen from the possible hardships that may result from bias and prejudice. They apprehend that in cases where the sales, consequent on title recovery procedures, take place attempts may be made to bind persons over to keep the peace and be of good behaviour, and these charges may involve the proposition that they have been guilty of some breach of the peace or evil behaviour. In such cases in Ireland where a man, out of a feeling of self-respect or indignation, refuses to give bail the Magistrates regard that as a confession that he has done wrong, and there is no appeal against his sentence of imprisonment; but in such cases it is only reasonable that there should be a limit to the sentence. In England never more than six months' imprisonment is given; but six months is a very common sentence in Ireland in default of bail, and these punishments are often inflicted where there are no means of punishing persons under the Common Law. Take the case of a man who prints a newspaper article over which the Magistrates would have no control at Petty Sessions. The accused can be asked to give sureties for good behaviour, and if he refuses he may, and has been, sentenced to six months' imprisonment. I can conceive a case in which a Welsh Nonconformist, taking a strong view of the tithe question, comments on a sale for the recovery of tithes in such a way that some busybody Magistrate may say, "I bind you, Jones, or Brown, over to keep the peace. I cannot deal with your newspaper because I have no power, but I can deal with you, and I ask you to give bail for your good conduct in future." This is constantly done in Ireland, and I want an assurance that if it be done in Wales the period of imprisonment shall not be more than one month. Of course, we shall be told that the spirit in Wales is entirely different, and I must confess that the Government have shown a very different spirit in meeting the opposition of the Welsh Members to what they have shown in the case of the Irish Coercion Bills. I hope the right hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill will now show himself similarly amenable to the influence of argument on behalf of the Welsh people. At the same time, because I am an Irish Member, I do not therefore wish it to be supposed that I am not free to take an interest in what takes place in Wales, especially on this tithes question, on which, if there is one subject more than another wherein the Irish can be closely linked with the Welsh people it is that of the payment of tithes—a question which, fortunately for them, the Irish people have seen disposed of long ago. I respectfully urge the Government to agree to this Amendment. If they will not, I, at any rate, have endeavoured, in proposing it, to amend this Bill on a point upon which I think it stands greatly in need of amendment.

Clause (Limit of imprisonment in case of default of security).—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

Mr. T. M. Healy

*7.55.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I hope Her Majesty's Government may see their way either to the acceptance of this Amendment, or to explain to the House what is the principle on which they resist it. They may, perhaps, object to the form it takes; and in case they approve the principle, but suggest that it should be dealt with by employing another form of words, I do not think any objection would be raised on this side of the House. The principle of the clause is perfectly harmless. It does not deal with cases of assault or grievous bodily harm, but with mere cases of resistance; nor can it be said that this is an attempt to alter the general law. The matter here dealt with is a simple misdemeanour, of a special kind, and one in which no claim to privilege or exemption can be made for any purpose inimical to the general law. One of the difficulties that arises in regard to the matter is this: when securities are given not only does the person giving them enter into his own recognisance, but he offers the sureties of other persons, and there may be many men who are unable to give such securities as the Magistrates may be reasonably prepared to accept. In that case we know what takes place. If sureties are offered the Magistrate at once applies to the police, and asks them to make inquiries as to the sufficiency of the sureties. It is for the police to say whether or not they are satisfied on this point; so that, to a large extent, they have the power of saying whether the securities should be accepted, and the accused person set at liberty. This is a tremendous power, and practically enables the police to refuse almost any security. The existence of this difficulty renders it all the more important that in the case of those who might find difficulty in getting bail, such as would be accepted by the Magistrate, there should be some limit to the term of imprisonment. As the Bill stands, there is no such limit, and I think I may fairly challenge the experience and knowledge of my learned Friend, who now so worthily represents the law on the Treasury Bench (the Solicitor General), to say whether in what is here asked any harm could possibly be done.

(8.1.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): I will explain in a very few words why the Government cannot accept the clause now proposed. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down appeals to the Government, if they cannot accept the clause, to at all events grant some limitation of the period of imprisonment. At present, under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, there is a limit of six months, so that the hon. Member's suggestion as to the despair and sorrow of the man who does not know when his imprisonment will come to an end can have had no foundation since 1879, when the Summary Jurisdiction Act was passed. The hon. and learned Gentleman talks about the difficulty of getting sureties for keeping the peace. I never heard of a case in which any sureties who came forward to enter into recognisances on a question of keeping the peace were refused. Where a man is himself prepared to enter into recognisances to keep the peace almost any sureties that can be produced are very willingly taken. Now, I would ask the hon. Member for Longford whether, under the circumstances—

MR. T. M. HEALY: I was aware of the six months' limit.

SIR E. CLARKE: Oh! I did not suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman was not aware of it, but I hope he will see fit to take the same course as he did on the last Amendment. Really this is a matter which touches upon the general law with respect to summary jurisdiction laid down by the Act of 1879. There is nothing in the character of this Act which differentiates the charges that may arise out of its operation from the things dealt with under the Summary Jurisdiction Act. For instance, a threat to kill a person is precisely of the same character whether it refers to an objection to pay a tradesman's debt or an objection to pay a sum due in respect of tithe; and it is most undesirable to insert in different Acts of Parliament exemptions from the general law settled and laid down in 1879, when the Act of that year codified the proceedings which referred to summary jurisdiction.

(8.4.) MR. CONYBEARE: I think the appeal, made with great moderation by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Waddy), ought to have received some consideration at the hands of the Government; and, as I observe the senior Law Officer of the Crown is present, I think it would be very desirable that he should, if he would be so kind, give us his opinion on the question, because it has not been an unusual occurrence in these Debates, that after the junior Law Officer has stated his views he has been promptly overthrown by the senior Law Officer. It has been pointed out that if this limitation is not introduced the poor men who may be sent to prison under this Bill will, perhaps, be subjected to unduly long terms of imprisonment. My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Waddy) undoubtedly laid somewhat too great stress on the fact that there would be uncertainty in the man's mind. That uncertainty has been removed by what has fallen from the Solicitor General, who has pointed out that under the Summary Jurisdiction Act the limit will be six months. I put it, however, to the Attorney General, with some confidence, whether in a case like this the six months would not be a monstrously unfair term of imprisonment to subject a man to because he could not find security? Is it an unreasonable supposition that a man in this plight may not be able to find security? The Solicitor General says he never heard of such a thing as any difficulty about finding sureties where a man is willing to enter into recognisances himself to keep the peace. There are some of us, however, who know as much about that as the Solicitor General. There are cases in which all sorts of difficulties are or may be raised for the purpose of obtaining the incarceration of an unfortunate defendant who may be unpopular with the Bench. Many of these defendants will be poor men, who may find it very difficult indeed to provide the security asked for, and what guarantees have we that the Bench will not impose such heavy terms as will render it impossible to obtain sureties? If this clause be rejected it may be necessary for us to move an Amendment limiting the amount of security that may be asked for. I am not anxious to multiply Amendments upon this stage of the Bill, and I think if the Government can see their way, either to limiting the security that can be exacted, or to limiting the term of the imprisonment to be imposed in default of security, they will be doing only that which is just. The Solicitor General has once more brought forward the favourite hobby of the Government, that it would be prejudicial to introduce alterations in the general law by means of a measure of this kind. But you are altering of your own motion the general law of the country; and if we find that, in consequence of that alteration, particular points of the general law will come into conflict with the just liberty of the subject, we have a right to improve the general law if we can do so. If it can be pointed out that the law, as it stands, will operate unfairly against any class, we have a perfect right to try and secure its amendment.

(8.11.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I think it a matter for regret that the Government have met this clause with a non possumus, instead of agreeing to a reasonable compromise. In poor districts in Wales men may sometimes find it very difficult, either to raise security for themselves, or to get others to act as sureties for them, and the same thing may happen in some parts of England. The people will find it difficult to provide the cash—

SIR R. WEBSTER: What cash?

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: To find the security. The result will be that over a great part of the Principality there will be formed Guarantee Associations, whose object will be to provide security in such cases, and, therefore, you will actually by this measure foment the very kind of agitation which you are desirous of allaying. There are also cases of conscientious objection which would be met by this Amendment. Both the cases of poverty and those of conscientious objection will be left in exactly the same position as they are in now from one point of view; but, while you alter the general law in one respect, you will not consent to a trifling alteration in it from another point of view.

*(8.14.) COLONEL HUGHES: I understand that this appeal is made on behalf of conscientious poor men who resist the officers of the law after judgment has been given. But what business has anybody to resist the officers? Why should we make easy terms for people who improperly resist the judgment of the Court? I am surprised to hear such arguments used by Members of this House. There can be no reason for allowing in these cases any less limit of what it is necessary to enforce than in any other class of cases.

*(8.24.) MR. SPEAKER: The next two clauses, standing on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Lloyd-George), are out of Order. The first proposes to empower a person who appeals to Quarter Sessions to require a jury upon the trial of such appeal. On Thursday the appeal was negatived, and, more than that, we have to-day negatived the proposed new clause of the hon. Member for the Gower Division of Glamorganshire (Mr. D. Randell), namely, that

That being so, the House would be violating two of its decisions if it allowed this new clause to be taken. With regard to the 2nd clause, which provides that no change of venue shall be permitted in a criminal charge, it is a matter of such importance that I am quite clear it could not have been moved in Committee without an Instruction. That Instruction not having been moved, it is out of my power to allow it to come on on Report.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: On the point of Order, Sir, may I point out that the proposal of my hon. Friend (Mr. Randell) was only meant to refer to civil cases, and the clause I moved on Thursday last applied to cases where no appeal is at present allowed.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is an attempt to re-open the whole question, and I cannot allow the clause to be put. (8.26.)

* (8.59.) MR. S. T. EVANS: The Amendment I have to propose is the addition of words at the end of line 16, providing that the receipt shall expressly state that the payment is on account of tithe rent-charge. This is the sub-section which provides that the occupier shall pay the sum the landlord has to pay for tithe rent-charge.

(9.0.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

* (9.2.) MR. S. T. EVANS: The section of which this sub-section forms part does away with all contracts between occupier and landlord, whereby the occupier is liable to pay the tithe, and in the discussion on certain words which have now been struck out of the clause, it was mentioned that the tithe might be reduced in amount. Supposing the tithe rent-charge which the occupier would have paid last year under his contract with the landlord were £25, and next year the landlord has to pay a reduced tithe rent-charge of, say £20, the occupier will be compelled by this section to repay that sum to the landlord. In order that the occupier may know that he is not called on to pay anything more for tithe rent-charge than the landlord has to pay, I think the Amendment is necessary and reasonable.

Amendment proposed in Clause 1, page 1, line 16, at end, to insert the words—

"And every receipt given for such sum shall state expressly that the sum is paid in respect of that tithe rent-charge."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(9.3.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not quite see what the object of this clause is, but it seems to me that there would be no harm in accepting it. I should be a little more satisfied if I understood the object of it, but as the hon. Member thinks that some object is to be gained I will not oppose it.

Question put, and agreed to.

(9.4.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): As the right hon. Gentleman has been good enough to intimate that he will accept my Amendment I will not detain the House any longer than to say that it provides that the occupier shall pay the full share of his tithe rent-charge and no more.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 1, page 1, line 16, after the word "rent-charge," to insert the words—

"Provided that where the lands, out of which any tithe rent-charge issues, are occupied by several occupiers who have contracted to pay the tithe rent-charge, any of such occupiers shall be liable only to pay such proportion of the sum paid by the owner of the lands on account of such tithe rent-charge as the rateable value of the lands occupied by him bears to the rateable value of the whole of the lands occupied by such occupiers."—(Mr. Morton.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

(9.5.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I hope the Government will assent to the Amendment I am about to propose. It is, I think, exceeding reasonable and only fair. I want to make the clause read as follows:—

"That such sum shall be recovered by the occupier in like manner as rent in arrear." The position is this: In the case to which alone this clause refers the occupier has covenanted with his landlord that he will pay the tithe rent-charge. At present, if he fails to do so, the landlord may pay it if he likes, and, if he does, he can bring an action against the tenant to recover the amount paid and any damage to which he has been put, and can enforce judgment against the tenant in the ordinary way. Under this Bill you rightly compel the landowner to pay the tithe rent-charge, and then, in cases where the tenant has contracted to pay it, you deprive him of all the remedies he has at present, and reduce him to the one remedy of distress. I submit that the landlord ought not to be deprived of his present remedy against the tenant who has contracted with him to pay.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 17 and 18, to leave out the words "by distress."—(Mr. Sydney Gedge.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'by distress' stand part of the Bill."

* (9.8.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope my hon. Friend will not press the Amendment. We propose to give the landowner the remedy the tithe owner now has, and that the occupier shall occupy relatively the position he now occupies.

Question put, and agreed to.

(9.9.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I beg to move to insert in page 1, line 19, after the word "otherwise," the words—

"Provided always, that in the event of the bankruptcy of the occupier, the said sum shall not be deemed to be a preferential payment within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts, nor shall a sheriff or officer of the Court in possession of the goods of the said occupier under process be in any way liable to pay such sum."

A similar Amendment was moved in Committee, but it was only between the tithe owner and the owner of the land. In that case it is open to the Government to contend that the tithe rent-charge was the first charge on the land, and that, consequently, it would be unfair to reduce it to the level of an ordinary debt. That argument, however, is inapplicable in the present case. As between the owner of the land and the occupier the tithe is only a contract debt. In the Bill it is provided that the landlord shall pay the tithe notwithstanding any contract to the contrary, but that the occupier shall be liable for the amount to the landlord. It is a contract debt and, being such, I fail to see why it should be regarded as preferential any more than a debt between the occupier and a tradesman. Suppose there is a contract debt for seeds or manure which are used in the cultivation of the land, or suppose there is one for wages. Why should the contract as between the landlord and the tenant be preferential, whilst that between the tenant and the tradesman or labourer is not? That it should be is most unfair for the reason that the landlord as a rule is a man of wealth and can afford to lose a paltry sum of £4 or £5, but to the labourer who works on the farm for the occupier the loss of £4 or £5 would mean the loss of the whole of his wages for two or three months. It would be a great hardship if for the benefit of the landlord, who is wealthy and can afford to lose £4 or £5, the labourer who is tilling the soil and improving it, and whose family depends entirely upon the little he has earned, should be required to lose his wages. I, therefore, press on the Government to accept this Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, after the word "otherwise," to insert the words—

"Provided always, that in the event of the bankruptcy of the occupier, the said sum shall not be deemed to be a preferential payment within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts, nor shall a sheriff or officer of the Court in possession of the goods of the said occupier under process be in any way liable to pay such sum."
—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

* (9.12.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: In a case in which the tenant has to pay the tithe rent-charge he pays it as a charge upon the land in preference to everything else that the hon. Member has referred to.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: It is not a matter between the tithe owner and the occupier.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: When this Bill becomes law such a tenant will not pay the tithe rent-charge. Why will he not? Because Parliament enacts that the landlord should pay it instead. That being so, the landlord having paid the tithe rent-charge Parliament gives the landlord the right to recover the sum from the tenant. It is only fair that this sum should be put in the same position as the tithe rent-charge, seeing that the charge is upon the land, and should be a preferential claim against the tenant.

*(9.13.) MR. S. T. EVANS: The reasons of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade are clear, but I do not think they are conclusive. The preference given to tithe rent-charge is a preference in favour of the tithe owner. By the Act of 1836 it was intended that the landlord should pay the tithe. The landlords, as a class, thought it to their interests to make the tenants contract to pay it, and now, by the force of circumstances, it has been found inconvenient that that system should continue. The law is now going to enact that the landlord shall be bound to pay, and shall not contract out of it. The substituted sum to be paid by the occupier to the landlord then becomes simply a contract debt between them. The preferential character of the tithe is still preserved. The tithe owner gets it from the landlord, and there only remains the contract debt between the landlord and the tenant; and the question is, ought the contract debt between the landlord and the tenant to be placed, under this Bill, in a more favourable position than any other contract debt? Very often the grocer or the draper is a poor man and can ill afford to do without the debt the occupier owes. The landlord is a rich man. There is no difference in the nature of the debts, and there is no reason why the landlord should have a preference for his contract debt over the draper or the grocer. It may be said that the arguments we are using, in so far as this debt resembles rent, go to sweep away the preferential character of rent. Well, if they do so I am quite prepared for the consequences. I do not think, if we were passing an enactment in the present day, that Parliament would dream of making rent a preferential claim, and requiring other creditors to wait until everything had been swept off by the landlord. I will take the facts as stated by the President of the Board of Trade, but all the reasons he has enumerated go to show that the landlord should not have this preferential claim in this case.

(9.17) MR. CONYBEARE: This proposal is so obviously fair and just that I am surprised the Government should put the House to the trouble of arguing the point. I agree with my hon. Friend that it is time the preferential character of rent should be done away with altogether. The Government have it open to them to say that they cannot, by accepting this Amendment, undertake to alter the general law, but I can only say in reply to that, that if our position is a strong one in reference to the other points we have urged, we should proceed to alter one of the most inequitable and unpopular features of our law, and reduce the preferential character of rent generally. It appears to me that this is a very wide and far-reaching Amendment in the way it bears on the equitable treatment of many other classes besides those directly interested in the question of tithes. It is not a question of the fair treatment of the tithe owner alone or the tithepayer, but here we are endeavouring to introduce a provision which will secure the right of all those other classes who may be brought into contact with the tithepayer as creditors. It seems, therefore, that we have the strongest reason for urging on the Government first that it is highly incompatible with the popular feeling at the present day that anything should be done in any way to extend the preferential rights that landlords have already; and, secondly, because it is most desirable to extend as far as possible whatever protection you can to the other classes of creditors of the tithepayer. For these reasons I will support my hon. Friend if he goes to a Division, and I can only express my regret that the Attorney General, who is usually a reasonable person, does not see his way to shorten debate by accepting the Amendment.

(9.21.) MR. STUART RENDEL: Perhaps one point may have escaped the vigilant observation of the Attorney General as to the obligations the bankrupt occupier must fall under when he owes for seed and labour. The issue is whether the preference which exists in the case of the tithe owner should be extended to the landlord who has entered into a contract with the tenant. I think not, because after all tithe is the result of agricultural operations, and, if there is to be a preferential charge, it ought to be given to labour and to seed, and the other elements without which the produce cannot be obtained. It is contrary to reason that in the case of bankruptcy the landlord should have a preference to the exclusion of claims which are necessarily incurred to give the tithe existence.

*(9.23.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: Under a Bill which has become law—the Preferential Payment of Wages Bill—I take it that wages would have a preferential claim in the case of bankruptcy; and, if wages have a claim as compared with tithe rent-charge, much more would they have a claim as regards rent which has been substituted for tithe rent-charge. If the Government refuse to accept the Amendment—and I speak subject to correction—the position will be that you will give a preferential character, not to the tithe rent-charge, but to the rent which has taken the place of the tithe rent-charge.

ment of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. The position is this. At present the tithe owner has a preferential claim, the tithe being prima facie payable by the occupier. We are now saying that the owner shall pay notwithstanding any contract with the tenant, and it seems to follow that the owner who is made to pay temporarily during the currency of the contract should at least be in as good a position as the tithe owner, who is admitted to have a preferential right. It is said that the landlord should not have a better claim than the man who supplies the seed or anything else necessary to stock the farm, but I must remind hon. Gentlemen that the tradesman need not give credit unless he wishes, but the tithe owner is obliged to allow the land to be occupied until the tithe becomes due.

(9.27.) The House divided:—Ayes 94; Noes 118.—(Div. List, No. 40.)

(9.35.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I now propose to move the further proviso which I propose to add to the clause. The object of this proposal is to guard against what might occur where there is a contract, such is contemplated by this section, in which the occupier is liable to refund to the owner of the land what he has paid in respect of tithe. I wish it would be distinctly provided, that the landlord shall not be entitled to refuse the payment of the rent because the occupier does not at the same time tender payment of the tithe. It may be that the occupier may think he is not liable to the amount of tithe paid by the owner, or he may have some other objection with the tithe which he conceives to be a valid objection and may, for one or other of these reasons, refuse to pay the tithe. In that case I want to provide against the costs being chargeable against the occupier on the full amount of the rent and tithe taken together, because of his simple refusal to pay the tithe. Let me take a case where the rent is £100 and the tithe £10, the total being £110. Suppose the tenant offers to pay £100 for rental only, the landlord may say, "You contracted to pay the tithe as well as the rent, and I want £110." The tenant may, however, object to pay the £10 for tithe, saying, "I do not think I am liable, or I dispute the correctness of the amount." According to the law as it stands the owner might issue a writ for £110, and the only way in which the occupier could meet the claim would be by paying £100 into Court. Nevertheless he would be liable to the costs on the whole £110, which is not just, because he ought only to be liable upon the £10, which is the real amount in dispute. I hope the Government will see their way to the acceptance of this Amendment which, as far as I am able to see, cannot possibly do any harm.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, after the word "otherwise" to insert the words—

"Provided always, that the owner shall not in any such case be entitled to refuse to accept payment of any sum tendered to him by the said occupier in respect of rent on the ground that the said occupier does not at the same time tender payment of the sum due, under any contract, in respect of tithe rent-charge."—(Mr. Lloyd-George).

(9.40.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I have given close attention to what the hon. Member has stated, and in reply to him I would point out that in this Bill we have said that when the landlord or owner has to pay the tithe he shall have no other remedy except by distress. In case he wants £100 rent and £10 tithe he will bring an action to recover the rent, which the occupier will pay into Court, and the landlord could not refuse: he must either take it out of Court, or leave it there, and no landlord would do the latter. I feel assured that if the hon. Gentleman will only look at the matter from a practical point of view he will see that there is no necessity for this Amendment.

*(9.42.) MR. TAYLOR (Norfolk, S.): I now beg leave to move a proviso which I have put on the paper. As the Bill now stands, the owner, without some such provision as this would be left without any sufficient remedy for the recovery of the tithe; the owner will now always have to pay the tithe formerly paid by the occupier and he ought to have some facility for recovering the money, and if some such facility as is here proposed be not given he may not have the power of compelling the outgoing tenant to refund the sum he has paid.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, after the word "otherwise," to insert the words—

"Provided that, where the tenancy of an occupier who is liable under a contract made before the passing of this Act to pay the tithe rent-charge is at any time hereafter about to determine, the owner of the lands may at any time during the last three months of the tenancy pay any instalment of the tithe rent-charge that such occupier would, but for this Act, have been liable under contract to pay, and may, notwithstanding such instalment not being yet due, recover the same from the occupier in manner as in this Act provided."—(Mr. Taylor.)

Question proposed "That those words be there inserted."

(9.46.) MR. CONYBEARE: I do not know whether the Government propose to accept this Amendment.

*MR. SPEAKER: I put the Question and no voice was expressed against it. I am not able to do more.

Question put.

*MR. SPEAKER: The ayes have it.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): No, certainly not.

(9.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 124; Noes 99.—(Div. List, No. 41.)

(9.51.) MR. STOREY: Sir, I beg to move—

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I beg to move the Amendment in my name.

MR. STOREY: I beg to move the Adjournment of this Debate, and I do so at the special request and with the full consent of hon. Members from Wales who are mainly interested in this Bill. The circumstances under which I do so are peculiar. An Amendment was moved by an hon. Member on this side of the House, who, however, does not belong to us. That Amendment strikes at the interests of occupying tenants throughout the country, and I think I am fairly entitled to move the Adjournment of the Debate, so that we may have the opportunity of putting on the Paper in legal fashion an Amendment which will remedy the injustice which has been committed. I do not think the House can have grasped the fact that the Amendment is so foolish and unfair that a Government of justice and fairness should never have accepted it. But what happened? Without a word of comment from the Treasury Bench, the Motion was put, and, to our utter astonishment, the Government accepted an Amendment which, I venture to say, the common sense of the House, if it had examined it, would have rejected. We must have time, and, therefore, I must detail to the House what is the evil and injustice. ["Order!"] If I cannot discuss the Amendment, I cannot state the case. What is more unfair than that an outgoing farmer shall be called upon under the terms of the Amendment which has been moved.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Storey.)

*(9.59.) MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Motion for the Adjournment, I understand, is founded on the fact that the hon. Gentleman, and those acting with him, did not oppose the Amendment which was accepted by the Government, and it is within the recollection of the House that the Ayes had it, and the Noes expressed no voice. That being so, and when I stated that the Ayes had it, and the Noes expressing no voice, I was precluded from putting the question further in order to clear the House for a Division. The hon. Gentleman was taken by surprise, and, therefore, allowed the Motion to pass without challenge. Under these circumstances, he moved the Adjournment of the Debate, in order to counteract what had been done. The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to re-discuss the Amendment.

(10.0.) MR. STOREY: Of course, we quite recognise what it is the duty of the Speaker to do. It was to our surprise that the Government accepted this Amendment, for we all thought they would have said "No." I will not discuss your ruling, of course. We said "No" when the question was put, but to our surprise the Government said "Yes," for we expected everybody would say "No." I put it to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade if I were a tenant farmer about to leave my tenancy, and two or three months before the end of my tenancy the landlord pays to the clergyman a sum of money which is not and will not be legally due from me—concrete form the abstract of the Amendment.

MR. STOREY : I admit, Sir, that I am doing so, and, of course, I will not pursue it. I think I have indicated enough to show hon. Gentlemen opposite who do not take the parson's view of this matter that an injustice has been committed in this matter quite by inadvertence. We had no idea the Government would have accepted an Amendment which makes the tenant liable for something not legally due. I must press my Motion. We were utterly surprised at the Government giving their consent. The First Lord of the Treasury will be the first man to admit that when the Government assent to a change in their Bill it is customary for some one to rise and intimate as much. But not one of us dreamt the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would accept such an atrocious Amendment, and I put it to his sense of fairness—and we have not been unfair to him during these Debates—now to give the House an opportunity of remedying this evil. If we have time we can devise an Amendment which will counteract this evil, which is against the interests of the tenants. Upon these grounds, and without further troubling the House, I beg to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Debate be now adjourned.”—
(Mr. Storey.)

*(10.5.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN : I am certainly not surprised at the course taken by my hon. Friend. I was quite unprepared for the Government accepting this Amendment, which is a most important one. When the hon. Member rose to move the Amendment, I went out for a moment, and when I came back I heard that the Motion had been accepted without a word of discussion. The Division was really snapped. But I am most sincerely anxious to finish this Bill to-night, and that desire is shared by many of my hon. Friends. I will, therefore, put it to the hon. Member for Sunderland, is it worth while to press this Motion to a Division?

*(10.6.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH : There are three causes of complaint against me. The first is that I accepted an Amendment from the other side of the House.
Mr. Speaker

MR. STOREY : From your own friend.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH : That I accepted it without saying anything about it ; secondly, that hon. Gentlemen opposite did not see fit to express their own objections to the Amendment ; and, thirdly, that the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken did not happen to be in his place when I accepted it. For myself I can only say that on several occasions I have accepted Amendments from every quarter of the House without saying one single word, not thinking it necessary in the circumstances to add to the length of the debates. As to hon. Members not stating their objections that is no fault of mine, and it is no reason why they should move the Adjournment of the Debate. Of the right hon. Gentleman opposite I will say nothing ; he has been a constant attendant, and I am sure he will be more constant in future. I am utterly amazed at the importance which appears to be attached to this particular question. I do not attach any great importance to it either way. It is a common thing for a tenant to agree with a landlord that he will pay the tithe rent-charge during the currency of the tenancy.

*MR. SPEAKER : Order, order !

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH : I do not wish to infringe the Rules of Order. I will undertake to reconsider the whole matter. I trust the hon. Member will not press his Motion to a Division.

(10.9.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON : If I might be permitted to make one suggestion—it is that, by omitting a single line in the Amendment, the whole sting will be taken out of it.

MR. CONYBEARE : Is it a pledge that the Government will re-commit the Bill? Have we a distinct understanding that they will re-consider their position on this Amendment? I want to be clear on those points.

*(10.10.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH : Hon. Members seem to believe that this Amendment goes further than I think it does. We will re-consider the matter, and I shall be happy to communicate the result to the hon. Member for Glamorganshire.

MR. STOREY: Of course, I am quite willing, under the circumstances, to withdraw the Motion if the right hon. Gentleman will make it clear how he proposes to deal with the matter. At what stage can it be dealt with? We are now in Report, and if that be passed, the only remaining stage is the Third Reading, and upon that an Amendment cannot be moved.

*(10.11.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It must be done in another place, I believe. It is impossible for this House to alter the Amendment now.

MR. STOREY: It can be done by re-committing the Bill. I have no respect for what is done in another House.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will give an undertaking which probably will satisfy the House—namely, that an Amendment on this particular Amendment shall be introduced in another place, so that the House may have an opportunity of re-considering it.

*(10.12.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I think we should have an assurance from the Government that they will re-commit the Bill so as to enable us to put a new clause in. If we have no such assurance, then I trust that my hon. Friends below the Gangway will go to a Division.

MR. STOREY: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say he will undertake that such an Amendment is put into the Bill in the other House as will enable this House to re-commit the clause. If so, I admit that that is entirely fair.

*(10.14.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Government will do their best, of course, to do so.

MR. STOREY: Oh, that is not enough.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Government is not all powerful.

MR. STOREY: As I am very loth to press the matter to a Division, I ask leave to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and negatived.

(10.14.) MR. J. L. MORGAN: I now move to omit Clause 2. The matter has already been thoroughly discussed, and I do not propose to make any observations further than to again utter my protest against the principle which is embodied in it.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 2.—(Mr. Lloyd Morgan.)

Question proposed,

"That the words, 'Where any sum due on account of tithe rent-charge issuing out of any lands is in arrear for not less than three months, the person entitled to such sum may, whatever is the amount, apply to the county court of the district in which the lands or any part thereof are situate, and the county court after such service on and hearing of the owner, as may be prescribed, may order that the said sum, or such part thereof as appears to the court to be due,' in page 2, stand part of the Bill."

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I rise to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and unless the Government can see their way to amend the procedure, I shall have to oppose the whole Bill under the law. As it at present stands, the tithe owner is entitled to come upon the land and distrain without the intervention of the County Court, or any other Court; and as he knows that if he does anything contrary to the law he may be mulct in damages, we have a certain amount of protection, but when the duty is transferred to the County Court we shall no longer have any remedy against the tithe owner for illegal distraint. You are substituting an utterly irresponsible official for a responsible person. Hence it is we think we ought to have the protection of a jury in every case. The Government have strenuously resisted our demand, for that although immediately a Liberal Unionist moves anything it is accepted, I think it is the duty of the Welsh Members to resist this tooth and nail until the Government interpose the protection of a jury.

*(10.21.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I should like to say a few words in condemnation of this clause. You have, in fact, made the County Court Judges the collecting agents of the tithe owners. By doing so, you have imposed the most invidious duties that can be cast upon a Court of Justice, and the effect will be to create litigation where it was not known before. I ask once again, Who is it wants this County Court jurisdiction? No single person does, as far as I can make out. The tithepayers do not, neither do the tithe owners, nor the County Court. And last, but not least, the Welsh Members as a body join in protesting against it. Only one Welsh Member, the representative of the Pembroke Docks, has voted with the Government on this Bill, and even he has disappeared on this occasion. The parsons, too, are by no means unanimous for it.

*(10.23.) MR. S. T. EVANS: The principle originally underlying the Bill was simply to make the landlord liable for tithe instead of the occupier, and we were given to understand at the commencement that the occupier was not to be put in a worse position by the new system than he was in under the old. But the whole aspect of things has changed since the Bill was in Committee. The Government have refused our appeal for the right of trial by jury in all cases, and it has been made evident that the object of the Bill is to serve the interests of the clerical tithe owner. The noble Lord the Member for Darwen dissents, but he was willing to vote for taking away from the lay proprietor of tithe $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. of his property. We have not made strenuous opposition to the proposal bettering the mode of procedure for the recovery of tithe, because we hope very soon to be put in possession of this public property, but we do protest against the introduction of the County Court if the occupier is thereby to be damnified. On the question of costs, the Government agreed to accept the principle of a schedule, but their Amendment simply deals with fees, and does not touch solicitors' costs. In future, instead of the alliance being between Church and State, it will be between Church and County Court; as I think the Government are making worse the position of Welsh peasant proprietors, I shall join issue with them, and vote for the rejection of the whole clause.

Mr. G. Osborne Morgan

(10.27.) MR. STUART RENDEL: I do not think the House is surprised that the Welsh Members are obstinately resisting this clause, because it is one that gives to the Bill that punitive character which we regard as an injustice to Wales. The Bill, it must be seen, metes out very uneven justice to the Principality. In England undoubtedly there is some necessity for tithe legislation, as there has been a disposition to attack the property of the tithe owner. In England, too, the Bill holds out some prospect of a remission of tithe; it whittles down the tithe, and is the first step to dealing with it—a step which can only be justified on the ground that it is national property. But the Welsh have no interest in the remission which the Bill is going to give. They will gain nothing, while the small yeoman is hit hard by the County Court clause. Is it, then, to be wondered at that we naturally resist this uneven-handed justice? I hope that even at the last moment heed will be paid to the strong objections of the Welsh people, for you are only creating difficulties for the future.

(10.29.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I hope that some Member of the Government will answer the arguments of my hon. Friend. It is a serious thing that the Welsh peasants are going to be sent to prison for non-payment of tithe without being tried by a jury. The Government, I hope, will be advised to alter their decision. Their majority on this point was not very magnificent—only 27—and that shows that many of their moderate supporters would not uphold them in this. Let them now promise to reconsider this matter. Liberal Members from Wales may fairly complain that hon. Members from Wales who sit opposite never venture to put in an appearance in these Debates. They hardly venture to put in an appearance in the House. One or two of the Members who represent the interests of the Church in Wales may walk through the Division Lobby, but not one of them will say a word in the House. I really think it would be well that some of the hon.

Members' English friends should induce them to stand up and explain why the Welsh tithepayers should be sent to gaol without the advantage of trial by jury. I imagine the Welsh Conservatives fancy that if they only vote quietly they may escape the notice of their constituents, but if they do they will be sadly mistaken. I trust the Welsh Conservatives on the Government will answer the arguments—the very strong arguments—advanced by the Liberal Members from Wales.

*(10.37.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I cannot admit that the argument of the hon. Member who has just sat down can properly be characterised as a strong one. The hon. Member complained that the Welsh Conservative members have not spoken in these Debates. I think it is better that hon. Members should refrain from taking part in these debates as much as possible if they are in favour of the measure. And with regard to those who oppose the measure, I think they also should refrain from taking part in the discussions if they have not studied the Bill. It is evident the hon. Member (Mr. Philipps) has not studied the Bill; indeed it is easy to see he has been spending the evening more pleasantly elsewhere. The hon. Member suggests that tithepayers in Wales are subject to imprisonment without trial by jury, in some extraordinary forms to which tithepayers in England are not liable.

MR. PHILIPPS: I never said so.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The hon. Member is doubtless unaware that a provision has been inserted in the Bill at the instance of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. Osborne Morgan) by which a tithepayer, whether owner or occupier, cannot be subject to imprisonment merely for the non-payment of tithes. This clause which is an important one, merely substitutes the process of the County Court for the present system of recovery by distraint. We think that substitution will be a benefit to the tithe owner and the tithepayer and specially to the occupying class who by that substitution will be free from the present distraint on their goods.

(10.39.) MR. CONYBEARE: The Bill does not preclude the possibility of tithepayers being sent to prison; it only says "by reason of the non-payment of such tithe rent-charge." It has been amply shown in the course of the Debate that tithepayers will be liable to be sent to prison for what we conceive to be the most trivial offences, offences such as those which come under the heading of contempt of Court. My hon. Friend (Mr. Philipps) is perfectly right when he says you are proposing to send men to prison without giving them trial by jury. I think he animadverted with proper severity upon the continued absence of the Welsh Tory Members during these debates. We have a right to ask that we should have the views of the Tory tithe owners placed before us by their accredited representatives in this House. Although I believe there are six Welsh Tory members, five-sixths of them have been continuously absent from our deliberations.

(10.40.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I am anxious to say a word or two upon this clause as one who is exceedingly desirous of facilitating the collection of tithe and keeping up its value. I do not think this clause is at all calculated to facilitate the collection of tithe. It might have been if some of the Amendments proposed had been accepted. If a jury had been granted in cases under £5, if the appeals had been granted which have been asked for, and if the costs had been regulated as was desired by the proposer of one Amendment, this clause might have worked; but without these Amendments I believe the clause is calculated rather to irritate public opinion in Wales, and in England as well, than otherwise. This clause may be described as the coercion clause of the Bill, a coercion clause specially designed for Wales. I do not think that irritating coercion of this kind is calculated to facilitate the collection of tithe. You can only facilitate the collection of tithe in one way, and that is by conciliating public opinion. I only know of one way of conciliating public opinion in regard to tithe, and that is by applying tithe to very different purposes to the present. This clause is only another instance of the absurd superstition, that all you have to do, in regard to enforcing the law, is to bring power, might, violence enough to bear upon the people. We have yet to learn that the only way in which law can be made to work easily and smoothly, is to reform in opposition to public opinion. I contend that the second clause of this Bill violates public opinion, tends to irritate public opinion in Wales; and I believe you will find far more difficulty in collecting tithe in the future than you have hitherto experienced. Therefore, I shall vote most heartily with my hon. Friend for the rejection of this clause.

*(10.43.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I beg the Government to take the humble advice of a humble individual, and strike Clause 2 out of the Bill. Some of my hon. Friends think it is proper to put this charge on the landowners. Speaking for the Midland Counties, and more especially for the portion of the Midlands I have the honour to represent, where there are a large number of small landed proprietors, I disagree with my hon. Friends. But we are all agreed on this side of the House that the introduction of the County Court as a means of collecting the tithe is most objectionable, and that Clause 2 should be struck out of the Bill. This is really a Coercion Bill for England. It will cause such irritation that after 12 months' experience the Government will deeply regret having passed it.

(10.44.) MR. STOREY: I shall not join my hon. Friend who has just sat down in appealing to the Government to withdraw this clause. I am well aware they cannot. I shall vote against it, and simply set forth the reason why I do so. If any one could with success appeal to the Government, I think the moving appeals that have been made by various Members on more delicate points than this would have gone home. The fact of the matter is the Government are thin-skinned in this matter, and they have made up their minds. I am much more concerned at the present moment to ask where is the promised help from the Front Opposition Bench which we were led to expect in the early hours of this evening. I remember, as in a dream, a right hon. Gentleman of magnificent proportions standing at that Table and declaring that if the Government did not concede a certain Amendment, a strong, strenuous, and determined opposition would be offered to the 2nd clause of the Bill. The Government did not concede the Amendment, probably because they knew that right hon. Gentleman too well, and here we are at the 2nd clause and where are the Members of the Front Opposition Bench? What is the use of fighting the Bill on principle if, when the very clause in which the principle is involved comes on, those who ought to lead the Opposition, either run away or remain silent? The explanation is that earlier in the Debate the Front Benches had not made their bargain; but now it is arranged that if the Bill is passed through its present stage to-night, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle can proceed with his Motion on Thursday! I am not concerned about that Motion. The two Front Benches will tilt at each other with blunted spears, while the rest of the House sit and watch the performance, and a sorry performance it will be. What is the use of wasting time at present in talking about Ireland? Ireland is settling her—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is not speaking to the clause before the House.

MR. STOREY: It is for that reason I want to talk about Wales. I object to this 2nd clause, because I cannot see that it is either necessary or desirable. I admit the Government have displayed good sense in transferring the collection of tithe from the holders of the land to the landlord. From the point of view of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) and all of us who want the tithe to be held and not to be diminished, that is a change for the better; but I cannot see why the landlord in the collection of tithe should have any further remedy than the original tithe owner has;

the landlord has much more influence over the tenant than the tithe owner has. The landlord is brought into daily, hourly, and monetary contact with the tenant, and, therefore, he is much more likely to be able to influence the tenant to pay his tithe property than the tithe owner will be. Though I admit the tithe owner in Wales, and rightly so, has found it extremely difficult to collect his tithe, I do not believe the landowner would have the same difficulty, and, therefore, I want to know why the landowner should be singled out by the House and enabled to go to the County Court for the collection of his tithe? If that had been all I should not have objected to the clause. Why should the tenant not have the right to have trial by jury in the settlement of his case? The Government's objection to that, though, from their point of view, founded in reason, makes the Bill repellent to a man like myself. I am astonished to find a Conservative Government objecting to that ancient Conservative stronghold, a British jury. Why could not this matter have been left to a jury? Again, I must say I think the Government most unreasonable in not providing for some limitation of expenses other than the mere opinion, or judgment, or temper of the County Court Judge. I have heard a great many gentlemen from Wales glorify the County Court Judges, but I noticed that most of the gentlemen who did so were of the legal profession. Personally the members of the legal profession are very agreeable, but I am not fond of them as a body. It may suit lawyers and barristers in this House to glorify even to deify the County Court Judges as perfections of earthly wisdom and justice, but my knowledge of County Court Judges leads me to the conclusion that to them no more than to any other men would I leave the fixing of a high scale of costs in matters of politics in which their own prejudices enter. This will be a political question, and there is no doubt that the County Court Judges in Wales, perfect though they may be in many respects, are not in sympathy with the people who are to be tried in their Courts—their sympathy is with the landowner and the parson, not with the tenant and the yeoman. It is, I think, most unfair that the Government should have juggled with the House. When the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was pressed to make a Schedule, he agreed to it. My unsophisticated Friends the Members from Wales, clever and able, but newer to the House than some of us, thought they had gained the whole point; but when the Schedule was produced it was found to be absolutely damnified by another clause in the Bill, which permits the Judge to contract himself out of the Schedule, and to fix a larger scale.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not think the hon. Gentlemen would like to use the word juggle without some reason. The facts are these: In response to an appeal from the hon. Member for Mid Glamorgan (Mr. S. T. Evans), I undertook to insert in the Bill a Schedule. That Schedule applies only to fees, and was never intended to apply to costs at all. In proof of that I appeal to the fact that the Schedule the hon. Member for Glamorgan placed on the Paper applied only to fees, and not to costs.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: My proviso stated that they were to be the "total costs, charges and expenses to be recovered."

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Schedule itself only dealt with fees.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: There was not a single word about "fees" either in my Schedule, or in the proviso relating to it.

MR. STOREY: Of course, I would not use the word "juggling" in the sense of imputing to the right hon. Gentleman that he deliberately juggled with the House. I am sure he would not. But I assert there has been an entire misapprehension between the right hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friends. Hon. Members thought they had by their Schedule distinctly provided against the tenants being saddled with heavy costs; they find now they have not succeeded in doing so. Whatever may have been the intention of the Government, they have entirely failed to meet the objections of my hon. Friends, and, as I think, to meet the demands of justice and fair play.

(11.14.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I now move to insert after the word "due" the following words:—"and not to exceed the rentable value of the said lands." Under this section, as it at present stands, the County Court is to be satisfied that the tithe is due and bears a proper proportion to the value of the land, and then an order is to issue. I propose that the County Court Judge shall be empowered to enter upon another inquiry as to the value of the land. If the tithepayer can prove that the assessed value of the land is in excess of its real rentable value, then the Court shall have power to remit the amount of tithe in excess, and make an order equal to the rentable value. Under the 3rd section the County Courts may, when it is proved by the Income Tax Assessment that the tithe exceeds the value, remit a third of the amount, and my objection to that I will state when we come to it. For the moment I would say that I do not recognise the Commissioners of Income Tax as a competent tribunal for the purpose; there is no evidence given before them on oath, no cross-examination, and no bona fide inquiry made as to the value of the land. The Attorney General stated the other night that if one of the parties feels aggrieved there may be application for a valuer; but the appointment of the valuer is in the hands of the Commissioners, and they will have no difficulty in getting their own creature to value the land in the way that suits them best. But if the investigation is entrusted to the County Court the Court will arrive at its conclusion after hearing evidence from the tithe owner and the occupier of the soil, and there will be a full inquiry into the value of the land. The inquiry will be conducted in open Court, will be reported in the local papers, and there will be every security by publicity for an impartial inquiry. To secure this impartiality the investigation ought to be entrusted to the County Courts in the first instance. I have a later Amendment in the event of the House rejecting this suggestion, whereby it is provided there shall be an appeal from the Commissioners to the County Court; but this, my present proposal, is for a more simple procedure, going at once to the County Court for the inquiry instead of first to the Commissioners, then to the valuer, and then to the Court. My Amendment merely provides that a remission shall be made where the tithe is in excess of the annual value of the land. The Government propose that one-third shall be taken off; but that means that one-third of the value of the property is to be taken from the nation and put into the pocket of the landlord. That, I submit, is a monstrous proposal, simply confiscation and robbery. Something has been said about driving land out of cultivation; but if the provision is simply limited to cases where the tithe is in excess of the value, and is limited to a reduction to the rentable value, I do not see that there will be a danger of the land being thrown out of cultivation. I object to a third of the national property in tithe being transferred to a perfectly idle class of the community, while at the same time you are depriving a great Ecclesiastical Corporation of the amount with which in some places they may be doing some good, whereas the landlords are doing no good whatever. There is no pretence they are doing anything in return for what they receive; and if tithe is nationalised, as no doubt it soon will be in Wales, our educational endowments will be deprived of a third of what is due to them.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, after the word "due," to insert the words "and not to exceed the rentable value of the said lands."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

(11.20.) MR. PICTON: I should have thought the Government would have had something to say in reply to the reasonable suggestion made. I think this is the farthest limit to which concession should be carried by sound political economists, by true friends of the nation and supporters of national property. My hon. Friend proposes that the tithe shall not exceed the rentable value, and that seems such a moderate proposal that at first sight I should be inclined to agree with him. When the subject was discussed in 1836 several landowners took part in the Debate who foresaw the time when it would be beneficial to them to surrender these lands to the nation rather than continue to pay tithe, but this proposal does not go so far as that. There is a certain school of political economists, not to be undervalued in their growing influence, who insist that the whole value of the land ought to be made over entirely to the nation. I hasten to say I am not yet convinced by their arguments. I do not entirely agree with them; but so far as this I do go, that whereas in 1836 a bargain was made between those who enjoy the land and the Church as representing the people at large, that bargain is not to be set aside simply because what the owners are required to pay amounts to the rentable value of the land. I think that is reasonable. I hope the Government will yet bethink them of what a serious step they are taking in upsetting the bargain made in 1836. There is an old proverb about the letting out of water, and the truth of it will be proved in this case, unless you can find a reasonable and sound basis, such as I think my hon. Friend has suggested in his proposal that the tithe should not be allowed to exceed the rentable value of the land. It is my confident opinion that this is the utmost limit to which concession should go upon this question of tithe in its relation to the nation.

(11.36.) Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, after the word "be," to insert the words "together with the costs."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CONYBEARE: I think it is quite bad enough that these extraordinary powers should be attached to the tithe; but when it comes to adding the costs, and we cannot get any consideration from the Government, I think it is time to protest. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman will be disposed to consider a slight amendment of his Amendment. I object to the introduction of costs here altogether; but I do not wish to enter upon the general question of costs, which will be raised later. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would accept the introduction of the word "taxed" before "costs"—[An hon. MEMBER: "Costs" means "taxed costs"]—well, whether he would not say, "according to the Schedule." I make this suggestion in a spirit of conciliation. I am anxious not to unduly prolong these discussions. Of course, we shall be prepared to show that even in the County Court, as things are at present, the costs which may be charged are out of all proportion to the amount that is claimed against the debtors. In many cases the tithe is of small amount; but it is clear that if the lawyers, for whom, it seems to me, this Bill has been principally framed, are allowed to pile up costs without any restriction, some of these unfortunate farmers will be liable to be absolutely ruined. I, therefore, move to add, after the word "costs," the words "according to the Schedule."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to add the words "according to the Schedule."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Question proposed, "That those words be added to the proposed Amendment."

*(11.41.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I would submit to the House that the question as to whether there should be a Schedule of costs would be much more appropriately and conveniently raised on the Amendment of which the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. S. T. Evans) has given notice as an Amendment to that which I have placed on the Paper. I hope the hon. Member will not press this Amendment. I have moved these words in the interests of Members opposite, because it was suggested to me during the discussions that the costs might be recoverable by some other process than distraint. We always intended that the costs should be recoverable in the same way as tithe rent-charge, and the only effect of the hon. Member's objection to this Amendment of mine would be that the matter might be left in doubt, and the tithepayer might be saddled with a personal liability for the payment of costs. I do not think Members on that side of the House would wish that. I have moved this Amendment at their request.

* (11.44.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I think these words were proposed by the hon. Member for North Kensington in Committee, and the Government on that occasion thought them unnecessary. The only danger of leaving the word "costs" in would be that it might preclude us from discussing the Schedule, unless it were limited by such a phrase as "costs under this Act."

Words inserted.

Amendment made.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 14, after the words "or other powers," to insert the words—

"Provided that if the officer satisfies the Court that there is no sufficient distress on the lands liable to the payment of the tithe rent-charge, the Court may authorise the owner of the rent-charge to sue out a writ of habere facias possessionem, in accordance with Section 82 of the Tithe Act, 1836."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(11.57.) MR. STOREY: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman tell us what this horrible thing means?

(11.57.) SIR R. WEBSTER: In Committee a point was raised whether the words in the Bill would not authorise the officer of the Court not merely to distrain for tithe rent-charge, but also to enter on the farm and farm it if there were no distress under the provisions of the Tithe Act of 1836. It was not our intention that the tither owner should retain that remedy in the event of there being no distress, but that he should exercise the power he has under the existing law. It was on the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), that we put down the Amendment to make the point of law clear.

* (11.58.) MR. S. T. EVANS: These words have appeared on the Paper for the first time on Report, and they raise an important point as to the working of the Bill. They enable the tithe owner to become the possessor of the land.

* SIR M. HICKS BEACH: They give him no greater power than he possesses at present.

* MR. S. T. EVANS: If that is so, what on earth is the use of inserting these words? I venture to say there are certain safeguards in the Act of 1836, that are not in this proviso. The officer here is to satisfy the Court that there is not sufficient distress on the land. The officer may not be able to reach the goods on the land, and it does not seem clear that anyone will be able to contend with the officer in this matter. The Act of 1836 gave 40 days before any proceedings could be taken at all.

It being midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

MOTION.

LABOURERS' COTTAGE GARDENS BILL.

On Motion of Sir Edward Birkbeck, Bill to confer Powers on Rural Sanitary Authorities with respect to providing Gardens for Labourers' Cottages, ordered to be brought in by Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Jesse Collings, Colonel Eyre, Mr. Hobhouse, Sir Charles Hall, Mr. Francis Maclean, Mr. Bond, Viscount Ebrington, and Mr. Fellowes.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 195.]

COMMISSION.

The following Bill received the Royal Assent:—

Tramways Order in Council (Ireland) (Athenry and Tuam Railway).

BETTING BY INFANTS BILL [H.L.].

A Bill to render penal the inciting infants to betting and wagering — Was presented by the Lord Herschell; read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 34.)

EAST INDIA OFFICERS BILL [H.L.].

A Bill to amend the law relating to certain officers in India — Was presented by the Viscount Cross; read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2nd on Monday next. (No. 35.)

STANDING ORDERS RELATING TO STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from the Select Committee considered (according to order).

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): I rise to ask your Lordships to agree to the alterations in the Orders relating to Standing Committees which were recommended by the Committee appointed by the House for the purpose of investigating these Standing Orders. It may, perhaps, be convenient to the House that I should very briefly state the objects of the proposed alterations. They are intended to meet the objections which were raised during the last two Sessions to the composition of these Committees and to the circumstances under which they were appointed. The chief objections, as your Lordships will remember, were directed to the fact that by the existence of those Committees a large number of the Members of your Lordships' House were liable to be excluded from the consideration of Bills, and that exclusion was characterised by a noble Lord, whom I see behind me, Lord Brabourne, as disfranchisement. I am not prepared to say there were not some grounds for the complaint which was made; and I can quite understand that noble Lords should have objected to the fact that some of the Bills which have come before your Lordships were not considered in Committee of the whole House. There was another objection which was also raised by the noble Lord behind me, and that was to the limitation in the numbers of noble Lords appointed to serve upon those Committees. Your Lordships will remember that under the Standing Orders as they had previously existed the number was limited, and power was given to add 10 noble Lords to any Committee appointed to consider any particular Bill; and upon one occasion the noble Lord behind me, being naturally desirous of acting upon the Committee with reference to a Bill in which he took great interest, applied to be added to the Committee, of which he was not then a Member, but he was informed that the full number of 10 Peers had already been appointed, and that it was therefore impossible for him to be put on the Committee. I think that is a most substantial grievance, and I may explain that a large number of these Amendments are directed to the exclusion of all limitations as to the number of the Peers to be appointed on Committees. Then we also recommend your Lordships to remove a limitation as to the number of Committees that can be appointed. Under the old Rules, as they were worded, it was impossible to appoint only one Committee, and we were not to appoint more than four. That has been struck out, and it will be for the House to appoint through its Committee of Selection any number of Committees it pleases from one upwards. Then, my Lords, what I think will probably be considered the most important of all the proposed changes is that under the proposed Rule 45, which provides that all Bills shall pass through Committee of the Whole House. I need hardly remind the House that that formed the gist of a large number of complaints, and I think it will be considered that the change recommended by the Select Committee in that respect is satisfactory, and that the House will be disposed to agree that under the proposed Rule the amendment is entirely free from objection. Perhaps I may be allowed to read that Rule, in order to show exactly what the procedure will be:—

XLV. As early as convenient in each Session of Parliament one or more Standing Committees shall be appointed, to which, or one of which, every Bill shall be committed after passing through Committee of the Whole House, unless, on motion made when the Bill is reported by the Chairman of Committees, the House otherwise order; and the Bill shall be reported from the said Standing Committee, and shall be considered in the House on such Report."

There is another line in the Rule which I propose to ask your Lordships not to adopt when the Question is put by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. I think I have intimated sufficiently the objects which the Committee had in view in framing these recommendations. They will certainly, I think, satisfy some noble Lords, in that all Bills will now pass through Committee of the Whole House. They will, I believe, conduce to more elasticity in the management and arrangement of the Committees, and I trust that your Lordships, having had a week to consider them, will agree to the new Orders and alterations which I now beg to move. There is one further purely verbal alteration in a later Order, and if the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack puts these Orders seriatim, I would ask leave to make any verbal Amendments as we proceed.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, I am extremely glad that attention has been directed to the Standing Committees, and I am pleased to hear that one of the Orders is for Bills to be committed, in the first place, to the Whole House, so that it will be a separate Motion to refer any Bill to a Standing Committee. I could only gather from the speech of the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal that the proceedings of your Lordships' House have been much advantaged by the Grand Committees. The House does not know what is going on before them, and it is all so hurriedly done that when the Bills are re-committed to the House it is found that there has not been anything gained. I would ask the noble Lord whether on Tuesdays the House is to meet at half-past 5, in order to give the Standing Committees time to proceed with their work, in view of the regulation which prevents their sitting while the House is sitting? There is no one who is more solicitous for the honour and dignity of the House than the humble individual who is now addressing your Lordships, and I trust you will pardon any shortcomings on my part.

Earl Cadogan

EARL CADOGAN: I am sorry to interrupt the noble Lord, but he has made use of one expression to which I wish particularly to call the attention of the House lest there should be any mistake. He speaks of the re-committal of Bills to the Whole House. I hope noble Lords will understand that all Bills will pass through Committee of the Whole House before they go to the Standing Committee.

Standing Orders Nos. XLV. to LII. considered and amended; and a new Standing Order agreed to: Then Standing Order No. XXXIX. considered and amended: The Standing Orders as amended to be printed. (No. 36.)

(No. 6.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without amendment: Standing Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3^d on Thursday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 10th February, 1891.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LEICESTER EXTENSION BILL.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [9th February]—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that the Committee do provide that those parishes or portions of parishes which under the Extension Bill are included in the borough but exempted from the payment of School Board rates, shall also be exempted from voting for Members of the School Board so long as their exemption from these rates continues, and that the Leicester School Board shall remain free from responsibility as to the school attendance in those areas."—(Mr. James Ellis.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*(3.15.) MR. JAMES ELLIS (Leicestershire, Bosworth): In moving this Instruction, I wish to explain that Clause 70 of the Bill provides that the parish of Knighton and portions of other parishes in the immediate neighbourhood of the borough of Leicester shall be specially exempted from the payment of School Board rates until the Education Act in pursuance of the Elementary Education Act of 1870 shall provide that further school accommodation is necessary in such parishes, and shall declare that such accommodation, not having been provided by the parishes themselves, has been provided by the Leicester School Board at the request of the Education Department. I am sorry to appear in any way to oppose the Corporation of Leicester. I admit that the Bill which is now before the House is one which is much needed, and one of which I heartily approve, except in regard to this simple provision. I believe that the time has come when it is absolutely necessary that the old boundaries of the borough should be extended, and I think that the present proposal to take in the parishes enumerated in the Bill is as wise as any that can be proposed. But I am also of opinion that when they are taken in they ought to be taken in once for all and on the same terms. In this matter I simply represent the educational body of Leicester—the Leicester School Board. I do not profess to criticise the Bill as a whole, but simply to take exception to that part of it which affects the School Board. The parish of Knighton, in fact, represents the richest part of the town of Leicester, and it happens to be outside the boundary of the borough. But the wealth of Knighton is derived from Leicester. In olden times a tradesman lived close to his warehouse, and a shopkeeper close to his shop. It is, however, the custom in modern times for tradesmen and manufacturers to live outside the town. That fact does not lessen their interest in the town, or relieve them from the obligation to contribute towards its rates. My contention is that they ought no longer to be allowed to evade the rates. They receive immense benefit from the borough of Leicester; they get their gas at a very cheap rate, and water is brought to them which they could not possibly bring for themselves. But, although they derive enormous advantages from their connection with the borough, they desire to escape the obligations which ought to fall upon them. I must say I am surprised that they should be unwilling, while they take part in the administration of the affairs of the borough, to avoid paying what is due from them. The Leicester School Board consists of 15 persons. It was elected two years ago without a contest, and it fairly represents the whole of the inhabitants, not only in a religious but a political point of view. It comprises a clergyman of an antient parish, several Churchmen, a Roman Catholic, a Baptist, and other Dissenters, and I myself represent the Society of Friends. So far as politics are concerned, we represent everybody in this House except our Irish friends below the Gangway, and upon this question we are absolutely unanimous. There is not a single dissident from the opinion that the onus now laid on the part of the borough we represent is unjust. The question does not rest with Knighton alone. Knighton is provided already with a school equal to the education of its present inhabitants, and perhaps some 200 more. No one knows for a fact whether that is so or not, because there is no efficient management of the children with a view of bringing them into the school, for the Rural Authority takes little or no interest in the matter. But the difficulty does not stop there, because there are other parishes adjoining, such as the Abbey Lands, where Cardinal Wolsey died, and others which are unprovided for. At present the children have no schools to go to, except those within the borough. I maintain that it is unjust to the ratepayers of the borough that they should be required to provide education to the children of these parishes at a cost per head of 12s. 6d. Unless something is now done to remedy this evil and anomaly, I venture to prophesy that for the next 20 years the question will not be one of this or that education, but of teaching the children out of the borough rates. I have no wish to labour the question, but I think we have a very strong case. In Germany, houses, warehouses, schools, and everything are mapped out and placed in their proper places; but in this country, unfortunately, the system is to allow every individual to do pretty much as he likes. My contention is, that if we pass this Bill as it stands we shall introduce a new element of confusion and disorder. I therefore ask this House, not only in the interests of the people of Leicester, but of all other towns to assent to this Instruction, or something equivalent to it.

(3.27.) MR. TAPLING (Leicestershire, Harborough):* The hon. Member opposite has given a history of this case from his own point of view, but I hope to put a different complexion upon it. I think it is an error to say that there is any unwillingness, as far as Knighton is concerned, to come into the borough of Leicester. The hon. Member has alluded to other districts, but they are of very little importance, and Knighton alone is really aimed at in this Instruction. The Corporation of Leicester have been anxious to enlarge the boundaries of the borough, but they have been met with very great opposition. They have now come to a definite arrangement with the principal inhabitants of Knighton. The circumstances of Knighton are somewhat peculiar. There is a very good school there, towards which large sums of money have been subscribed through the liberality of the inhabitants. As yet there has never been a school rate in Knighton, and when the inhabitants were asked to be included in the Leicester rate they made the reasonable request, that if they are to continue to carry on their school at their own expense they should not be saddled with the school rate of Leicester. The Corporation have assented to that principle, and are willing to carry out an arrangement to that effect. But, after all, this is not a permanent arrangement, because in future it will become, in all probability, the duty of the School Board to supply additional accommodation in Knighton, in which case the ordinary School Board rate will be imposed on the ratepayers of that place. The agreement between the Corporation and the inhabitants of Knighton is embodied in the 70th section of the present Bill. And I may add, that the Manchester and Stockton-on-Tees Improvement Bills contain similar provisions. If this Instruction is carried it will involve the Corporation of Leicester in a breach of faith towards the inhabitants of Knighton. And on that ground I ask the House to reject it. The latter part of the Instruction asks that the Leicester School Board shall remain free from responsibility as to the school attendance in the new areas. If the Bill is assented to by the House it will have the effect of providing that the Attendance Committee of the Union, which includes Knighton, shall in future have no jurisdiction at all in Knighton as regards the School Board. There would thus be absolutely no educational control whatever in Knighton. I venture to think that my right hon. friend the Vice President of the Council will not be prepared to tolerate such a state of things for a single moment, seeing that it would inflict a serious injury upon the cause of education in Knighton and upon the Voluntary Schools there, which up to now have been eminently successful. The expense of an attendance officer from Leicester to look after the attendance at Knighton would be very small indeed, and is not likely to be for an indefinite period, as I have no doubt that the parish before long will be included within the borough for education purposes. The proposal of the hon. Member, if adopted, will have the effect of abolishing all control over the attendance of the children at Knighton, and will practically take them out of the operation of the Education Act. I am not authorised to say so, but I do not think my constituents would feel inclined to hold out about the question of votes. That, however, is a matter which may be considered in Committee. and the Bill amended accordingly. I ask the House to leave the discretion in the matter to the Committee upstairs, instead of imposing this mandate upon them. I am afraid that if the Instruction is carried it will seriously jeopardise the passing of the Bill, and I therefore trust that the hon. Member will withdraw it.

MR. JAMES ELLIS:* If the hon. Member will give an assurance that the inhabitants of Knighton will forego the voting power I am ready to withdraw the Instruction.

MR. TAPLING:* I am not authorised to give that assurance on their behalf.

(3.35.) SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): The Corporation of Leicester are at present engaged in the difficult task of making arrangements with the outlying parishes in order to increase the area of the borough. I know how difficult such an operation is, especially in regard to a great and important borough like Leicester. At the first sight I was inclined to support the Corporation in the arrangement they propose to make, but I feel that it is introducing a new principle, which is altogether unconstitutional. Hitherto I have always been taught that taxation without representation is a kind of tyranny, but here we are going to have representation without any taxation whatever. I think it would be a mistake to introduce into the Bill the principle of giving to a certain number of the inhabitants the power of electing members to the School Board without requiring them to contribute to the School Board rates. I think the suggestion thrown out by the hon. Member for the Harbrough Division (Mr. Tapling) is a wise one, and I trust that it will be adopted.

(3.40.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I think it is a pity that this discussion should be continued, because it can scarcely be seriously maintained that the parish of Knighton, while not contributing to the school rate for Leicester, should yet possess the power of voting at the School Board elections. I believe that any Committee upstairs would view such a proposal with distrust and dissatisfaction, and I therefore hope that some agreement will be come to. I listened to the remarks of the hon. Member for the Harbrough Division in opposition to the Instruction, and I think he exercised great discretion in intimating the practicability of bringing the parish of Knighton within the borough of Leicester, with the proviso that so long as it was not called upon to contribute to the school rates it should not possess a voting power in the election of the members of the School Board.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

MR. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to—

1. Tramways Order in Council (Ireland) (Athenry and Tuam Extension to Claremorris Railway) Confirmation Act, 1891.

LEICESTER EXTENSION BILL.

Debate resumed.

MR. TAPLING: I have only a word to say, with the permission of the House. I wish to repeat my own strong opinion that my constituents at Knighton would give way on the question of voting, if the hon. Member opposite will give way as to school attendance. That would be a compromise. I will do my best to get it agreed to.

MR. JAMES ELLIS: I am very glad to assent to that proposal, and I beg to withdraw the Instruction.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY (RATES AND CHARGES) PROVISIONAL ORDER.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under 'The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888,' containing the Classification of Merchandise Traffic, and the Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges applicable thereto, of the Great Northern Railway Company, and certain other Railway Companies connected therewith."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

(3.58.) MR. P. STANHOPE (Wendlesbury): Before the Question is put I should like to obtain, if possible, an undertaking from the President of the Board of Trade that he will give the House an opportunity of discussing the general principle contained in this and the other Bills about to be brought forward. I admit, of course, that the general terms of these Bills have already been more or less defined by the Railway Act passed two years ago; but there are other proposals made by the Board of Trade which, in my opinion, ought to be fully discussed by the House before the Bills are sent to a Select Committee. I will therefore ask if the right hon. Gentleman will undertake that the Committee shall be large one, and representative of all sections in the House, so that this question may be fully and adequately discussed?

*(4.0.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Some time must necessarily elapse before the Second Reading of the Bills can be moved, and in the interval it will be my duty to ascertain what is the desire of the House in the matter. I should like to point out that it is absolutely impossible for the details of the classification or of rates to be discussed in a Debate in the House of Commons; these matters can only be settled by a strong Joint Committee of both Houses, to which I hope these Bills will be referred without any unnecessary delay.

Question put, and agreed to.

OFFICERS TRAINING ROYAL NAVY AND ROYAL MARINE ARTILLERY.

(in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 273, of Session 1889).—(Sir Robert Fowler.)

QUESTIONS.

THE INDIAN HOSPITAL CORPS.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is the case that the men of the Indian Hospital Corps and bearer companies in war time receive less rations than the Sepoy; are allowed only 10 lbs. weight of kit against 33 lbs. allowed to the Sepoy; are entirely unarmed when in the field; and are rewarded only by a bronze medal, while the Sepoy receives a silver one; and whether anything can be done to remedy these conditions?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The statements contained in the question are substantially correct. The arrangements referred to are made by the Military Authorities in India, and the Secretary of State sees no ground for interfering with them.

MAGAZINE RIFLES FOR INDIA.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the War Office asked the Indian Government £5 10s. apiece for magazine rifles to be supplied to it, or at what price these rifles are now being offered to the Indian Government; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence which has passed between the War Office and the Government of India on this subject; and whether, before it is "decided what royalty or other payment shall be made in connection" with Mr. Speed's patents affecting the new magazine rifle, an opportunity will be given to this House of expressing its opinion on any such proposed decision?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Government of India will take two-fifths of their supply from contractors, and the remaining two-fifths from Government Factories at a higher price, thus sharing with the Government the higher price, which is the rule in regard to contract-made weapons. My answer to the second question of the right hon. Gentlemen is, that by the Patents Act, 46 and 47 Victoria, Cap. 57, Sec. 27, the responsibility rests with the Treasury of approving the payments which may be awarded for royalties.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell me whether the Government did ask £5 10s. each for the rifles supplied by them to India?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Certainly, Sir; I told the right hon. Gentleman about it the other day. £4 15s. was the cost of preparing them (without the bayonet) at the ordnance factories, and £4 at the works of the contractor. Three-fifths came from the ordnance factories and two-fifths from the contractors.

GOLD COINAGE BILL.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to introduce the Gold Coinage Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): After mature consideration, I have come to the conclusion not to press forward this measure till I see my way clearly as to whether it may not be convenient and expedient to link the restoration of the gold coinage with some further proposals relating to currency.

THE MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL.

MR. PHILIP STANHOPE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the recent application of the Manchester Ship Canal Company to the Corporation of Manchester for financial assistance, and to the fact that the Manchester Ship Canal Acts contain provisions for the vesting of the undertaking, under certain circumstances, in a public Trust; and if, in view of this application, he will afford facilities for the discussion of the Canal Development Bill, now before Parliament for the fourth succeeding Session, or will allow it to be referred to a Select Committee, in order that the whole question of the development of canals under responsible Public Authorities may be adequately considered?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir; I am aware of the application of the Manchester Ship Canal Company to the Corporation of Manchester, and of the provisions of the Manchester Ship Canal Act. I do not quite see the connection between the first part of the hon. Member's question and the second, and at present I do not propose to ask the House to consider the whole question of the development of canals.

LAUNCH OF NEW WARSHIPS.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether arrangements can be made for the accommodation of such Members of the House as may desire to attend the interesting ceremony at Portsmouth Dockyard on the 26th instant, when Her Majesty the Queen is expected to be present to name the two new powerful ships Royal Sovereign and Duke of Connaught, about to be added to the British Navy, now in course of construction at that dockyard; and whether Members can be accompanied by their wives or daughters?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Believing that certain Members of the House would desire to witness this ceremony I have had 500 places reserved for their accommodation. The Secretary of the Speaker has been good enough to undertake their distribution under the same conditions as tickets were issued for the late Reviews.

ADMIRAL FIELD: About the ladies?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I propose that every Member shall have power to take with him either a wife or a daughter.

BANK OF ENGLAND NOTES.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, under the present law regulating the issue of bank notes, the Bank of England is bound to pay five sovereigns (or other equivalent gold coin) for each £5 note of their issue, and similarly for notes of a larger denomination, or whether the Bank can legally tender for such notes 40s. in silver and the balance only in standard gold coin?

MR. GÖSCHEN: No, Sir; the Bank of England cannot tender 40s. in silver in part payment for a £5 note. They are bound to pay the whole amount in standard gold coin.

METROPOLITAN STREET ACCIDENTS.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the statement in the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, for 1889, that during that twelve months no fewer than 5,330 persons were run over by vehicles in the streets of the Metropolis and maimed and injured, and that 140 persons were run over and killed; and whether he contemplates taking any steps, by legislation or otherwise, to ensure a better and safer regulation of street traffic?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; the figures are correctly quoted, and they are extremely serious. The matter is receiving the careful attention of the Commissioner of Police, who already employs a large number of police in regulating the traffic and protecting foot passengers. Should he find that the powers of the police are insufficient to cope with the difficulties of an ever-increasing traffic, he has promised to lay before me suggestions for securing better and safer regulations.

LIVERPOOL POSTMEN.

MR. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received Petitions from the postmen at Liverpool, praying, amongst other things, for the removal of the limit in the number of stripes, for a limitation of the total number of hours over which their daily duties are spread to twelve, for modifications in the uniform supplied, for improvements with regard to their pay and overtime allowances, and for the reckoning of all Sunday work as overtime; and whether he is now prepared to give an answer to the petitioners?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, Cambridge University): My hon. Friend is perhaps aware that Petitions such as those to which he alludes in his question are by no means confined to the postmen at Liverpool, but have been received from several other large towns. Such being the case I thought it best to refer them to a Committee which has had under consideration the position of provincial postmen generally throughout the country. The Report of this Committee I hope to receive very shortly; but I may mention that in anticipation of it, endeavours are already being made to reduce as far as possible the period over which the daily attendance of postmen is spread, whenever a revision of the outdoor duties at any office takes place.

THE BARNSELY MAGISTRATES.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has seen the following paragraph in the Barnsley Chronicle of Saturday, 31st January :—

"Why not the man as well?—Ann Meadows, widow, Barnsley, was charged with having accosted people for an improper purpose in Pontefract Road, Friday night last. P.C. Harris proved the case. Defendant had only come out of Wakefield Gaol on that day (Friday). In the course of the proceedings, Mr. Carrington (the magistrates' clerk) made a private communication to the Bench. A sotto voce conversation ensued, in which Superintendent Kane also joined. Defendant was sent back to prison as a rogue and vagabond, for three months."

If it is in accordance with the approved practice in our Courts of Justice that words should be used to influence those who are sitting in judgment which cannot be heard by the accused person ; and will he consider whether a more lenient sentence would not be a more just sentence in this case ?

MR. MATTHEWS : I am informed by the Clerk to the Justices that the only communication made by him during the case was in reply to a question asked by one of the Justices, having reference to the man who was in the company of the defendant, and that nothing said by him, or by the Superintendent, had the slightest bearing on the case against the prisoner. Nothing, therefore, seems to have occurred contrary to the rules which should govern the practice of the Court. The woman was a bad character, having been convicted no less than six times for similar offences since July, 1889, and it was in respect of these convictions, coupled with proof of gross public indecency, that the Justices passed the sentence, with which I am not able to advise any interference.

LONDON TRAMWAY MEN.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the desire of the London Tramway Men's Union that their excessive hours of work should be reduced, and that they should form the subject of a Government inquiry ; and whether he would include in the duty of the Committee on the Hours of Labour of Railway Servants an inquiry also into the hours of labour of tramway men, or whether he would move for another Committee on that subject ?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH : No, Sir ; I have not had any communication on the subject referred to by the hon. Member. I do not propose to ask the House to inquire into the hours of labour of tramway men. The conditions of their employment, and the incidents of their work, differ very largely from those of the employés on railways.

TELEGRAMS.

VISCOUNT CURZON (Bucks, Wycombe) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there is any general order under which telegrams, not fully addressed, are not delivered when the officials have no reasonable doubt for whom they are intended ; and whether the system of delivery of telegrams can be made the same as that of letters, in which case the delivery is made to the most likely person ?

MR. RAIKES : In reply to my noble Friend I must, I fear, say that it is impracticable to make the system of delivering telegrams identical with that for delivering letters. The object of the Telegraphic Service is instant action, and it would not be possible, without serious injury to other persons making use of it, to detach messengers on voyages of discovery, which would necessarily very seriously retard the delivery of other telegrams. I hope that as a general practice the postmasters endeavour to meet the convenience of the public when they have no reasonable doubt respecting the addressee of a telegram. But I must own that I have observed with regret, in some particular cases which have been brought to my notice, a reluctance to interpret liberally the regulations of the Department, which I have never failed to visit with appropriate censure.

CHAPEL ROYAL, WHITEHALL.

MR. JAMES (Gateshead) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury to what balance the saving effected by the closing of the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, is carried, whether of the Civil List or of the Estimates.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : The expenditure on the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, was defrayed from the Civil List. Reductions of expenditure from the Civil List accrue to the Civil List.

ARDCHATTAN AND MUCKAIRN SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether School Boards have any power by law to examine the school register or roll of attendance of private schools within their jurisdiction; whether he is aware that in filling up the Schedule 33 (a) for the year ending 31st May, 1890, and giving the attendance at the Episcopal school, the School Board of Ardochattan and Muckairn filled in 40 as the number on the roll upon information furnished to them by the Episcopal school authorities, and whether to this Return was appended a memorandum by the School Board to the effect that several children were entered on the register both of the Ardochattan public school and the Episcopal school; whether in the Return for the year ending May, 1887, the number on the roll of the Episcopal school was returned, in a similar manner, at 68; whether the accuracy of these Returns is now disputed by the School Board, and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the register of the Episcopal school, giving the names, addresses, ages, and daily attendances of the children from the opening of the school in 1886 till date; what was the average attendance at the Episcopal school for the school year completed prior to December last; what were the numbers alleged to be on the roll and the average attendance when an application was made but refused in 1886, and what were the numbers alleged to be on the roll and in attendance when the application was granted in December last; what were the special circumstances, if any, which induced the Department to grant in 1890 an application which they had rejected in 1886; and whether the resignation of the School Board has now taken effect, and what steps the Department intend taking with the view of carrying on the educational work of the parish?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): Under Section 30 of the Education Act of 1872, a School Board is entitled, but only in so far as is necessary to enable them to discharge their duties under the Act, to access to the school register of any school. Before any such right of access could be exercised, it would be incumbent on the School Board to specify, and, if need be, establish the existence of the duty in respect of which they asked access to the register. I am not aware upon what information the School Board filled up the Return in 1890, the contents of which they certified to the best of their knowledge and belief. A memorandum to the effect stated by the hon. Member as to entry of certain children on the registers of both schools was added to the Return, but it is obvious this had the same bearing upon the attendance at the public school, as upon that at the Episcopal school. In the Return of May, 1887, 68 children were entered as on the registers of the Episcopal school, but a note appended to that Return reduced the number to 31 children of school age. No such note was appended to the form of 1890. I am not aware that the Board has ever disputed the accuracy of its own Returns, although the statements it now makes with regard to the attendance at the Episcopal school are at variance with them. The Department is not in possession of the information which the hon. Member desires me to lay upon the Table, and it is not such as could properly be made the subject of a Parliamentary Paper. As the Episcopal school has not been on the annual grant list for a year, the amount of its yearly average attendance cannot be given. The numbers alleged to be on the roll of that school in 1886 was 26, but the statement in respect of attendance and the probable continuance of the school did not appear to my Lords to be so proved as to establish a claim that the school should be placed on the annual grant list. As I have already stated, my Lords were of opinion that sufficient proof of the existence of a body of children for whom the school was required, and of the probable continuance of the school, had in 1890 been given to entitle the school to be placed on the annual Grant List in 1890. My Lords have been informed that the resignation of the members of the School Board has taken effect, and they propose to issue an order for a new election.

THE CARDIFF STRIKE.

SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff): I wish to put a question to the Home Secretary, of which I have not been able to give notice. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that soldiers are being employed at the Cardiff Docks, thereby causing extreme irritation and apprehended breaches of the peace? Can the right hon. Gentleman state whether this extraordinary measure has been resorted to, and, if so, by whose authority?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no knowledge on the subject of the hon. Member's question, except what I have seen in the papers.

SIR E. J. REED: I will put a question to-morrow.

RAILWAY EXTENSION AT KINSALE.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has received a Resolution passed by the Town Commissioners of Kinsale, asking the attention of the Government to the recommendation of the Fisheries Commission in reference to the extension of the existing line of railway to deep water, and asking that facilities will be afforded to the Cork and Bandon Railway in carrying out the said recommendation, with a view to afford employment so as to cope with the serious distress caused by the almost total failure of the potato crop in the district; and whether it is the intention of the Government to comply with this request?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): A resolution of the nature mentioned was received in November last. The Government have no funds at their disposal for the proposed railway extension. As the result of recent inquiries it is not apprehended that any serious distress will arise in the district referred to, or any cases of such a nature as cannot readily be dealt with under the powers of the ordinary Poor Law.

IRISH DISTRESS.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he has received copies of a Resolution adopted at a public meeting in Timoleague, County Cork, on Sunday, 1st instant, and signed by Rev. Father Mulcahy, P.P., Rev. E. Donovan, rector, by local Justices, and the local dispensary authorities, calling attention to the great distress prevailing amongst labourers and small farmers in the townlands of Abbeymahon, Cregane, and Timoleague, and pointing out several useful and reproductive works on which employment could be given, so as to relieve those poor people from destitution; and, what steps do the Government propose to take as regards this district?

MR. MADDEN: The Resolution referred to has been received, and the matter referred to is undergoing consideration.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the Government propose to start any relief works in the parish of Lower Templemore, County Donegal, as it is admittedly one of the most congested and distressed districts in that county; whether information has reached the Government that people on several occasions assembled at the Police Barracks in the east of the parish clamouring for work to tide them over the distress so acutely felt; and if he can explain why the engineer who was sent in December last to open up relief works in the district was recalled in a few days?

*MR. MADDEN: The matter is receiving the careful consideration of the Government.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Having regard to the fact that large sums have been contributed by this House for the relief of distress in Ireland, that large sums have also been voluntarily subscribed, and that hundreds of families in Donegal are in a state of absolute destitution, may I ask when the relief will be begun?

*MR. MADDEN: The relief has begun, and works are actively in progress.

IRISH PAWNBROKERS.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if it is his intention, this Session, to introduce a Bill to regulate the trade of pawnbrokers in Ireland, with a view of shortening the hours of labour in pawnbroking establishments?

*MR. MADDEN: Yes, Sir; a Bill dealing with the Law of Pawnbroking is in course of preparation under my directions. I am not able to say how far, if at all, it will be possible to deal with the special matter referred to in the question. I shall be glad to consider suggestions from any hon. Members who may take an interest in the subject.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to assimilate the law in Ireland to that which now exists in England?

*MR. MADDEN: The Bill is a measure to consolidate and amend the law in Ireland which at present is in an unsatisfactory state, and, so far as is practicable, to assimilate it to the English law.

THE M'KINLEY TARIFF BILL.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicester, Mid): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is true, as reported in the Times of the 9th instant, that the M'Kinley Tariff Bill has ruined the sewed muslin trade of Ballyshannon, County Donegal; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will introduce a Bill to raise such sums upon American imports as may be required to start fresh industries in the poverty-stricken districts of Ireland?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have no knowledge of the subject treated in the first part of the hon. Member's question. As regards the second part, I cannot say that I have any intention to start a policy of retaliation against the United States in consequence of the M'Kinley Tariff Bill, especially as it is to be hoped that the Americans will see that they have made a great mistake in passing it.

MR. DE LISLE: Have any representations been made to the Government of the United States pointing out all the evils which the tariff has created?

MR. GOSCHEN: That is not a matter which comes within my power.

UNTRIED PRISONERS AT LIMERICK.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if his attention has been directed to complaints raised by the Magistrates and Corporation of the City of Limerick to the practice of marching handcuffed, untried prisoners, principally charged with trivial offences, through the public streets of Limerick from the county gaol to the Court houses, a distance of nearly two miles; and if, in view of such complaints, he will direct that a covered vehicle be in future employed for such purpose, as in other cities?

*MR. MADDEN: The matter referred to in the hon. Member's question is not one in which the Government can undertake to interfere.

MOTIONS.

SITTING OF THE HOUSE (ASH WEDNESDAY).

(4.26.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do meet to-morrow at two of the clock.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.27.) MR. HENEAGE (Grimsby): I for one feel bound to protest against this Motion. I do not know whether it is moved in the interest of the officers of the House or of hon. Members. So far as the officials are concerned they can attend service and yet be here at 12 o'clock; and it is quite certain that so far as the occupants of the Treasury Bench are concerned they would not be here at 12 o'clock in any case. There is an important subject to be debated to-morrow, and although I should be prepared to take a Division upon it at once, as there is nothing new to be said upon it, I am afraid that all the time available will be required.

(4.28.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): This annual Motion is simply an ancient and hollow formality. I think there ought to be a Return of the number of Members of the House of Commons who go to church on Ash Wednesday. If it is found that a majority or any considerable number do attend, there might, perhaps, be some reason for the Motion. But everyone knows without any Return at all that the contrary is the fact. No doubt there may be a few here and there who go to church, and I not only respect their ideas on the subject, but I honour them. The vast majority, however, do not go, and I, for one, feel bound to protest against the Motion as a sham.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.

*(4.40.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster), in rising to move—

"That the proceedings on the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill have precedence of the Notices of Motion and the other Orders of the Day on every day on which it may be appointed."

said: I think it only respectful to the House to take the opportunity of explaining the course which the Government propose to adopt with regard to Public Business. The position is such that they are compelled most reluctantly to take the time of private Members this day, but they hope that it will not be necessary to take advantage of the Motion on subsequent days. I think it will be admitted that the Government have done everything in their power to render unnecessary the course which they now find themselves compelled to take, and I hope, therefore, that the Resolution will not be met with prolonged criticism on the other side of the House. I have been—the Government have been—from the first most anxious to meet the challenge of the right hon. Member for Newcastle, and to supply an opportunity for the discussion which the right hon. Gentleman desires to raise on the conduct of the Executive in Ireland. But hitherto the Government have been prevented, by the slow progress of the Tithe Bill, from giving the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity which I am sure the right hon. Gentleman desires, and which we also desire. In the circumstances, we have no alternative but to ask the House to agree to this Motion, upon the understanding that if the consideration of the Tithe Bill as amended is completed this evening it will be put down for Third Reading on Thursday, and Wednesday's business will not be interfered with. I take it almost for granted that the measure will be read a third time on Thursday, and, therefore, that the Government would not find it necessary to avail themselves further of the powers conferred by the Motion. But the House will understand, having regard to the prolonged consideration which has been bestowed upon the Tithe Bill up to the present, that it will be unwise in the Government to ask for any less powers than they now seek. If the Bill is read a third time on Thursday, we shall place Monday next at the disposal of the right hon. Member for Newcastle for the Vote of Censure of which he has given notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the proceedings on the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill have precedence of the Notices of Motion and the other Orders of the Day and every day on which it may be appointed."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.44.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I am bound to say it seems to me that this Motion is not warranted by the circumstances at the present period of the Session and in the present condition of Public Business. The Government have no ground whatever to complain of the progress of their business or of the discussions upon the Tithe Bill and the other measures which they have submitted to the House. The time has not arrived for breaking in upon the ordinary Rules of the House in this violent manner. The right hon. Gentleman says that if the Tithe Bill is read a third time on Thursday he will not make any further use of the Motion; but, according to my recollection of the conduct of former leaders of the House, it is not usual to ask for powers a great deal in excess of those that will probably be wanted. If the Bill is read a third time by the 12th of February, and in that I myself see no difficulty, the Government, I think will have no reason to complain. I must vote against the proposal, because, under the circumstances, I think it is unnecessary.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I am, unfortunately, not a disinterested party in this Debate, because I have on the Paper for to-night a Motion dealing with a subject of great importance and interest to the country. Without entering into the merits or demerits of that Motion, I think hon. Members on both sides of the House will admit that it is of national importance and urgency, and, therefore, I should not feel justified in acquiescing in the action of the Government, having regard to the extreme importance of the subject of my Motion, were it not that I feel that when the Government bases its claim on the ground that the exigencies of the Public Service require that progress shall be made with particular measures before a given date, unofficial Members are bound, so far as they can, to facilitate the course of business. Unofficial Members of the House of Commons in times past have been, and justly so, very jealous of their rights and privileges, but they have invariably allowed cases of emergency like these to be dealt with. I understood from the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, the other night, that it was submitted that the requirements of the law made it necessary that the Government should proceed with financial measures at a given date, and under such circumstances, I think that unofficial Members would scarcely be justified in insisting upon their extreme rights. But in acquiescing in the Government proposal, I am bound to point out that if demands of this kind are to be made at the beginning of the Session, it will be extremely difficult for private Members to discharge their duties to their constituents. It so happens, however, that the question which I intended to raise to-night also figures on the Notice Paper for this day week in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, and I trust we shall have the assurance of the Government that there will then be no interference with the fair consideration of that question, the importance and urgency of which are admitted by all. On the understanding that we are not to be asked to give up our rights and privileges except in a case of emergency like this, I, for one, shall be prepared to accept the Motion.

(4.50.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Like the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken I am interested in this matter, and I am so interested in two ways. In the first place my Motion stands in front of his, and in the next place he will have an opportunity this day week of obtaining a discussion upon the subject in which he is interested. But I know from long experience how little facility is given to a Member whose one ewe lamb is taken away. I may mention that this is the ninth year in which I have, without intermission, endeavoured to obtain a discussion on the subject of my Motion in this House. It is a subject which excites very great interest, and I think the Government have done wrong in endeavouring to stifle the discussion upon it. The right hon. Gentleman has talked about the Public Service, but he gave no reason whatever to prove that there was urgency in the matter of this Tithe Bill. Last year we met on the 11th February. This is the 10th February, and I submit that there is no precedent whatever for taking private Members' privileges away so early in the Session. This is a new departure which I hope will excite considerable displeasure in the House. I shall merely express my belief that the Government would do well to propose a Standing Order putting it in their power to take the time of the House whenever they please, for it has now become almost a farce to suppose that this House sits here for any other purpose except to deal with the questions which it may please the Government to have discussed.

*(4.52.) SIR JOSEPH PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I want to ask the House what is going to become of private Members' nights if proposals such as that made by the Government are constantly to be brought forward. During Session after Session, at any rate during the last two Sessions, a great majority of the nights which properly belonged to private Members have been taken by the Government. As to the present Motion, the House has now only just reached the date at which Parliament generally meets. There has already been held an Autumn Session in order that the Government might be enabled to make good progress with its own Bills, and as the result of this, two important measures, so called, have been advanced from stage to stage with great rapidity. Yet already, on the 10th February, private Members are asked to give up their nights in order that the Government may be enabled to proceed still more rapidly with one of these measures—the Tithe Bill. The Tithe Bill is not a measure which has created any great public interest. People who have to pay the tithes do not seem to care for the Bill at all, and those who receive them would, as far as can be made out, be quite as well off without the Bill as they will be with it. In short, the Tithe Bill is emphatically not one of those measures to whose immediate progress the rights of private Members ought to be sacrificed at so early a period of the Session. If the hon. Member for the Isle of Thanet Division of Kent, who, though an interested party, has announced his intention of supporting the Government on the Motion, carries out that intention, he will be foregoing his privileges as a private Member in a most unnecessary and unwarrantable manner. For my own part I shall divide against the Motion, in the firm conviction that the course proposed by the Government can have no support from any Members who has the welfare of the country at heart. If private Members' rights are taken away on the 10th of February where will they be later on, in the middle of the Session?

(4.55.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): As one who has taken an active part in the discussion on the Tithes Bill I should like to say a word or two upon this Motion. I have not observed that anything has been said to show what is the urgency of this particular question. I am informed that the only justification for a Motion of this kind at any time is urgency. We have been reminded that this is only the 10th of February. We are sitting before Parliament is ordinarily called together, and before this Motion is carried I think we ought to hear from the Government Benches what is the urgency of the question. The Tithe Bill is an important Bill, which ought not to be rushed through its various stages. It is a Bill dealing with a very large amount of property—property of the value of £4,000,000 a year, and I certainly do not think that a discussion extending over seven nights is too prolonged for a Bill of this kind. I can only conceive two arguments which might be used to show the urgency. One is that the passing of such a Bill as this might be necessary in the interests of “law and order.” Hon. Members who urge that know very little of the Principality of Wales, except what appears in the newspapers. I can assure them there has been no real disturbance in the Principality. Interested persons have called for the assistance of the military, but let me give the House one instance to show that it was utterly unnecessary to call out the military in certain cases in which they had been called out.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is quite beside the question before us.

MR. S. T. EVANS: Then if law and order do not constitute the urgency of this matter, the only other point is that the persons in the Principality should have their pay. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade will say that we Welsh Members have unduly prolonged the discussion; and therefore I ask, why should Members be put to inconvenience and lose their rights in order to enable the Government to push forward this measure?

(4.57.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Thanet Division of Kent spoke of the duties of unofficial Members. I think there may be a difference of opinion as to what those duties are, and undoubtedly they generally differ according to whether their leaders are in or out of office. As to the official Members, it is their bounden duty to lay before the House grave reasons for taking such steps as are embodied in this Motion. It has been often assumed by the Government that unless this or that measure is passed by a certain time awful consequences will happen. But in the past such consequences have not resulted, and I think it is time that the Government learned a little better as to the nature of their responsibilities towards the country. I earnestly hope that this side of the House will show some spirit in the matter, and make a determined protest against this most unjustifiable and tyrannical invasion of the rights of private Members.

(4.59.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I have listened in vain for arguments as to why the time of private Members should thus be monopolised by the Government. If the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House succeeds in getting his comprehensive Resolution passed, not only will the rights of private Members be lost for this evening, but to-morrow also may be gone, and my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar, who has the first place for an important Resolution on Friday evening next, may lose the opportunity of bringing that forward. It means that the whole of those hon. Members who have taken the trouble to ~~ballot~~ at the beginning of the Session, in order to obtain a favourable place for the Bills which they have in charge, are, because the right hon. Gentleman chooses to think that certain progress should be made with Public Business, to lose those chances. I hope that hon. Members will vigorously protest against this action of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman is introducing these gagging Resolutions earlier and earlier each succeeding Session. I think it ought to be borne in mind that last Friday night the right hon. Gentleman had an opportunity of pushing forward the Tithe Bill, and he failed to avail himself of it. It was well known that the Motion which stood first on the Paper for that evening would not occupy the whole of the evening, and he might very well have proceeded with his Tithe Bill after 8 o'clock. But on the plea of the fatigue from which he and his colleagues were suffering as the result of their labours during the week they facilitated a count out on purpose that they might go home. Why, under such circumstances, should private Members be robbed of the facilities which are given to them under the ordinary Rules of this House? I think it behoves us to strenuously protest against this action of the First Lord of the Treasury, and I, for one, shall go into the Lobby against him.

*(5.2.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): It is very true that "there's many a slip twixt the cup and the lip," and that saying is exemplified by the fact that after nine years of long weary waiting my hon. Friend the Member for South Aberdeen had at last got the opportunity so long desired of bringing forward a question in which Scotch Members are so much interested, and he is suddenly deprived of it by this proposal of the leader of the House. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to give my hon. Friend any facilities for bringing on this Motion at a later stage of the Session? I am sure my constituents would be very dissatisfied with me if I did not take the opportunity of making a protest against the proposal to prevent the discussion of a matter in which they take a great interest. I have had many communications from public meetings in Scotland asking me to back up my hon. Friend in this matter, and I am certain that the decision of the Government will cause extreme disappointment to many of the Scotch electors. The zeal of the leader of the House for this Tithe Bill is of a somewhat suspicious character. It does not strike me that there is any overwhelming necessity for pushing forward the Tithe Bill. At any rate, no proof of that has been shown to-night. I think that probably the object of the Government is to burke and shirk the discussion of the question involved in my hon. Friend's Motion. I have no doubt that such a discussion would be extremely inconvenient to many hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite.

Mr. J. Rowlands

(5.4.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House will facilitate the progress of Public Business by the course he has taken. We find, year by year, more and more time is taken up by Supply. We also find that more and more private Members' nights are taken away by the Government, with the result that, as hon. Members are deprived of legitimate opportunities of raising questions in which they are interested on those nights, they seek the opportunity in Committee of Supply, and thereby prolong the discussion of the Estimates. I think that if the right hon. Gentleman would only utilise the time of the House in a better fashion he would help on Public Business. I must say that, outside the crofter question, the subject of access to mountains is one which has caused more disturbance in Scotland than all other Scotch questions put together; and therefore it is a great pity that the opportunity my hon. Friend, after so many years' waiting, has secured for bringing it on, is now to be taken away from him. I venture to say that the interest in that question, and also in the question involved in the Motion of the right hon. Member for Thanet, is greater than that embodied in the Tithe Bill. Of course, we expected a conspiracy of silence from the Government. We knew they would not attempt to answer our arguments. But, indeed, we ought to have from the First Lord of the Treasury some reason for, at this early stage of the Session, taking away private Members' nights. One effect of this Motion will be to induce private Members to conspire together to see how best they can circumvent the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House said the Government had done everything within their power to facilitate the progress of business; but how was it they allowed the House to be counted out last Friday evening? Knowing something of the Members who were to have spoken on the Motions down for that evening, I assert that the Government might have reached the Tithe Bill by 8 o'clock, and would then have had four hours to deal with it. But for some reason it suited the Government Whips to allow a count out, and thus four hours were deliberately thrown away. If you take away the time of private Members we shall have to retaliate, and take away a good deal of your time in discussing questions which we desire to have debated.

*(5.8.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I must enter my protest against the implication of the First Lord of the Treasury that discussion on the Tithe Bill at its various stages has been unduly prolonged. If the right hon. Gentleman had been as constant in his attendance of these Debates as has his colleague the President of the Board of Trade, he would have known that the very reverse is the case, and that at the close of the Committee stage the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill had nothing but words of commendation for the actions of Members on this side interested in the Bill. Indeed, the only words of criticism which fell from his lips were directed against one of his own supporters. It will also be in the recollection of many hon. Members that a very important Amendment indeed, affecting the future relations of landlord and tenant, was last night passed without a word from the Government and without any discussion from this side. Can it be said, then, the discussion was unduly prolonged on that point? When we consider that during the Autumn Session the First Lord swooped down upon private Members and took the whole of their time, it seems an extreme proposal on his part to pursue a similar course now.

(5.12.) MR. A. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I think the hon. Member for Caithness must be of a confiding disposition if he really thinks that any number of Members staying in the House on Friday night would have enabled the Government to reach the Tithe Bill that evening. The length to which the discussions on the Tithe Bill have been protracted has rendered necessary the Motion made by my right hon. Friend. What has necessitated the prolonged discussion on the Tithe Bill? Has it been questions arising out of the merits of the Bill, or is it something ulterior lying behind? I do not suppose there is any hon. Member who doubts for one moment that it is the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle is not ready to debate his Motion with regard to events in Tipperary; and it is a significant thing that, whereas the right hon. Gentleman was sitting in the House up to the moment when this subject arose, he has now removed himself from the House. I doubt whether we shall see him again at the present Sitting. Doubtless the leader of the House regrets that he has taken away the opportunity for the hon. Member for South Aberdeen and the right hon. Member for Thanet bringing on their particular Motions; but his action is the only way of dealing with the obstructive tactics applied to the Tithe Rent-Charge Bill.

(5.14.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): It is interesting to find that at least one Member has risen to support the Government Motion by argument. I leave it for the House and the country to say whether the Debates of the Tithe Bill have been unduly prolonged. Hon. Members generally should remember that they are dealing not with the particular question in hand, but with the certainty that private Members will lose their nights altogether during the rest of the Session. For, if this thing was done in the green tree, what will be done in the dry? If the time of private Members is taken away for a measure like the Tithe Bill, what are we going to do when the Land Purchase Bill comes on? What is the good of the House coming together in Autumn Session if, before the time that Parliament usually sits, private Members' time is to be taken away? Remember, that hardly any great question has become matured for legislation which has not first formed the subject of exhaustive discussion on private Members' nights, and one of the great causes that have led the Government into difficulties is the want of consistent and steady action they have shown in regard to measures before the House, and the fact that they have not taken sufficient opportunity to ascertain the opinions of private Members in regard to them. It is not an unimportant point to consider in connection with this Motion how the Government have used the time of private Members in previous years when they have taken it. They have, in fact, practically wasted that time over Bills in regard to which they did not know their own mind, or the minds of Members on their own side, and which they eventually had to withdraw. I oppose the Motion also because, if it is adopted, I believe it will endanger the Motion of the hon. Member for Poplar on Friday night, on a question in which the working classes of the country are very deeply interested. I should have liked, too, to hear what arguments could have been adduced by hon. Gentlemen opposite in support of the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet. It would be very interesting to see if there are any new ideas to be advanced. I rather fancy the Government are not anxious to have that Motion brought forward.

(5.18.) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): If this Motion is to be interpreted as a reproach to Welsh Members for the manner in which they have conducted the Debates on the Tithe Bill, I think it is not justifiable. I understood that, as far as the Committee stage of the Bill was concerned, we had not only no reproach, but distinct commendation and approval from the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. Certainly there has been on no single occasion any opportunity of prolonging the Debate unduly, because the Government have been most conciliatory and ready to meet the wishes of Welsh Members. The action of the Government seems to have followed in consequence of what has taken place on the Report stage of the Tithe Bill; but I maintain that there has been no waste of time, and that fact has been admitted by Members of the Government. In making the Motion, the right hon. Gentleman has hardly assumed that there is any great urgency for it; and notwithstanding the slur that has been cast on the Welsh Members by the drastic character of the Motion, I repeat that they are entirely free from any charge of having by collusion needlessly wasted the time of the House.

*(5.21.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am perfectly certain my right hon. Friend meant to cast no slur upon the conduct of Members from Wales in reference to the proceedings on the Report stage of the Tithe Bill. There has, however, been delay, and on the Report stage, from other quarters. I may point out, however, that if the House comes to a decision on the Motion, they will have the whole of the evening for the remainder of the Report, which may be perfectly well concluded in that time, and thus this will be the only day of which private Members are likely to be deprived.

(5.22.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Not only is this a most unwarrantable invasion of private Members' rights, but I think the Scotch Members have special cause to complain of the conduct of the Government in their treatment of Scotland. I am afraid, however, that this is only a part of their customary policy. If they introduce any measure affecting Scotland it is one opposed to the wishes of the great majority of the Scotch people, and it has to be carried by the votes of English Members. This evening a question of great interest to the whole of the people of Scotland was to have been discussed, and yet the First Lord of the Treasury selects this above all other days to advance a wretched and miserable Bill, in which even the people of England have no interest, and we are deprived of one of our rare opportunities of scoring in this House another Scottish majority against the Government. But I do not complain, for the Government are giving to the Scottish people another object lesson in the necessity of Home Rule for Scotland. It is another illustration of the necessity for making some provision for the consideration of Scottish questions, and if we cannot have our business transacted in this House we must transfer it elsewhere. This is the conduct of a Government which came into office to demonstrate the beauties of the Union and the advantages Scotland derives from it; and I anticipate that, as a result, the next General Election will see the return to this House of a large number of Members pledged to vote for Home Rule for Scotland.

(5.25.) MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): The House will, I am sure, pardon me for entering my protest against the action of the Government in thus taking away the rights of private Members on the pretence of urgency for pressing forward the Tithe Bill. I think the Government have themselves to blame entirely for greater progress not having been made with the Tithe Bill. There are points in the Bill which the Welsh Members could not pass over without protest and strong resistance—points involving injustice to the Welsh.

people which the Government might well have abandoned. At the same time, although the Government have sought to push on the Bill from stage to stage with great haste, there is little, if any, demand or necessity for it in Wales. Not a single class of people—not even the clergy themselves—have united in any demand for the Bill; and I cannot conceive a more frivolous excuse for the important Motion proposed by the First Lord of the Treasury than the one which has been given. If the time of private Members is to be taken away in this manner, the attendance of private Members will soon become of little use, and we may as well stay at home and await the call of the Whips, who will, in due course, force us, like dumb driven cattle, into the Division Lobbies. I believe that this feeling is growing on both sides of the House. The private Members ought not, without urgent necessity, thus to be deprived of their rights, for some of the best and most useful legislation ever passed by this House has been initiated by private Members.

*(5.28.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I am sure the hon. Member for the Kingswinford Division of Staffordshire is entirely misinformed as to our views with regard to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. Personally, in consequence of the pressure put upon me by the Whips, who desired the Bill to go through last night, I abstained during that Sitting from making more than one or two remarks. I want the House to consider for a moment what happened last Friday night. At considerable personal inconvenience I came back at 7 on that evening to help in the discussion of the Tithe Bill, and was at once informed that the Government had arranged a count out. My information has been confirmed in many quarters since, and yet now, in the middle of February, when, under ordinary circumstances, Parliament would be discussing the Queen's Speech, we are asked to take away the time of private Members. The First Lord of the Treasury has often twitted me with not having brought in a Bill respecting the appointment of Managers and Trustees of Charities. You might just as well ask a private Member to jump over the moon as to pass a Bill when the time of Members is taken away so early in the Session. Really, Mr. Speaker, I think Her Majesty's Ministers ought to consider what a very bad precedent and example they are setting in forcing this proposal upon the House.

(5.32.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): There is a Motion standing next on the Paper which we must vote upon without discussion, as far as this Debate is concerned, as it would not be in Order to discuss it now. I only mention it to remind the House of its existence, and to ask at what hour the Government propose to close the discussion on the Tithe Bill, in the event of the Motion being carried. As I understand, the First Lord of the Treasury says this is a case in which he will pick and choose. He will not give facilities for the discussion of the Motion respecting access to mountains in Scotland, but he says if we do not dispose of the Report stage of the Tithe Bill to-night he will not to-morrow impinge upon the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. What business has he to say he will shut out the Scotch discussion, but will allow an English discussion to take place because certain Dukes and Lords are interested in it?

MR. J. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): May I remind the hon. and learned Member that the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill applies to Ireland?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Of course, I am not such a fool as not to know that. The Government say, in effect, that they will keep us sitting as long as they like—and why?—because they are determined not to interrupt the discussion about the deceased wife's sister. I say that is a most offensive proposition to put before this House; and if it is a question of the relative merits of access to mountains in Scotland and marriage with a deceased wife's sister—in which only Dukes and Earls are interested—between the health of Her Majesty's subjects and the matrimonial alliances of members of Her Majesty's family, the former ought to be considered first. What the Government ought to say is, that if the Tithe Bill is not finished by 12 o'clock, they will sacrifice the deceased wife's sister to-morrow. Do the Government mean to put before us the issue that the Deceased Wife's Sister

Bill is more important than the Tithe Bill? The supporters of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill may be ready to sit up all night in order to obtain a discussion of that Bill to-morrow, but I am not ready to do so. If the Government have any bond fide belief that the Welsh Tithe Bill is of such immense importance, let them put it down for to-morrow. Those who remember the time when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian led the House of Commons will recollect that he never made a Motion to take the time of the House towards the end of the Session without having a long string of precedents on which to support his proposal. When the Fourth Party, under which I was schooled, used to sit on this side of the House in the Parliament of 1880, precedents used to be wrangled over if it was proposed to take half an hour of the time of private Members. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), or some other Member who was acquainted with all the precedents, from Genesis to Deuteronomy, used to bring them forward, saying, "In such a year so and so was Prime Minister, and he said so and so," and he used to go on quoting until he came down to what Lord Beaconsfield said or did. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian never made such a Motion without a string of precedents as long as your arm being brought forward. The First Lord of the Treasury is so brazened in this matter—I use the phrase merely in a Parliamentary sense because, if he will allow me to say so, he is "the mildest mannered man" that ever cut a Parliamentary throat—he is so brazened in this matter that he comes down to the House, merely says he wants to-morrow, and must have to-morrow, simply because he wants it. This House, it must be remembered, met in November, apparently for the right hon. Gentleman's amusement, and it is now the 10th of February, a date at which the House of Commons has frequently not begun its labours. The right hon. Gentleman, however, is so greedy for the despatch of business that he absolutely wants to have the most important Bill of the Session read a third time at a period when the House has not usually met at all. Under the circumstances, I should like to know when Parliament is going to dissolve—on what day in the month of April is the Prorogation to take place? I suppose everything is going to be in proportion. In view of the way in which the Welsh Members, whose grievance you admit, are being treated by the Government, I tremble to think what the Irish Members may expect when the Chief Secretary comes back. The Welsh Members have ventured to say three or four words in a mild manner, and they have been charged with obstruction of the most atrocious character. When we get into March, and the landlord's month is open a yard wide for British treasure and finds it not, what will be said of the Irish Members if they venture to discuss the Land Purchase Bill? It is not one, but probably every private Member's day that will be taken for that measure. I regard the action of the Government in this business as absolutely revolutionary. If, in the words of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), some hon. Gentlemen opposite who now receive £1,000 a year for holding their tongues in the House were sitting here below the Gangway, I tremble to think of the amount of rhetoric which would be discharged at the head of the Government if a Motion of this kind were made. This House of Commons has practically become a house of placemen. The Government come down with their Bills and Motions, and if anybody else ventures to propose a measure he is shut out. Private interest is no longer of any importance, and the people of the country ought to understand that no Member can successfully legislate unless he has a salary of from £1,000 to £5,000 per annum.

*(542.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. and learned Gentleman has asked me up to what hour I shall ask the House to sit this evening. I trust it will not be necessary to ask the House to sit beyond midnight. It was hoped that it might be possible to conclude the consideration of the Bill last night. I certainly trust it will be concluded to-night. With regard to to-morrow, I have no desire whatever to interfere with the progress of Bills if it can be avoided; but if the consideration of the Tithe Bill is not completed to-day, I shall be constrained to put the Order down for to-morrow.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION FROM THE STANDING ORDER).

(5.58.) Motion made, and Question put,

"That Proceedings on the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, if under discussion at Twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order, Sittings of the House."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

The House divided:—Ayes 242; Noes 172.—(Div. List, No. 47.)

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON (SUPERANNUATION BILL).—(No. 49.)

(6.13.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Bartley be a Member of the Select Committee on the School Board for London (Superannuation) Bill."—(Sir Richard Temple.)

*MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I object to the Motion, on the ground that I have a Motion for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the whole subject as affecting teachers in England and Wales. It seems to me it is a subject that should not be dealt with piecemeal, but that before action is taken there should be a general examination into a superannuation system, and it is not desirable to proceed to the nomination of this Committee until the House has had an opportunity of considering the Report of a Committee upon the whole question.

*(6.14.) MR. SPEAKER: The position is somewhat peculiar. The Mover and Objector are permitted to make short explanatory statements, but if there is evidence of considerable opposition to the Motion, it is obvious that the discussion cannot proceed now, and under Standing Order XVI., it was never contemplated that it should proceed under these circumstances. I am invested with authority to put the question at once for the Adjournment of the Debate, and as there is evidence of opposition to the Motion, I do so.

Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): To what day, Sir.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. Baronet must fix the day for himself.

SIR R. TEMPLE: To-morrow.

Debate adjourned till to-morrow.

MOTION.

PUBLIC HEALTH (INTERMENTS) ACT (1879) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. J. W. Sidebotham, Bill to make better provision for the regulation and control of Cemeteries provided under "The Public Health (Interments) Act, 1879," ordered to be brought in by Mr. J. W. Sidebotham, Mr. John Albert Bright, Mr. William Cross, Mr. Godson, Mr. Lees, and Mr. William Sidebottom.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 205.]

ORDER OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.—(No. 184.)

Order read, for resuming the adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to the Bill [9th February] (on consideration, as amended.)

And which Amendment was, in page 2, line 14, after the words "or other powers," to insert the words,—

"Provided that if the officer satisfies the Court that there is no sufficient distress on the lands liable to the payment of the tithe rent-charge, the Court may authorise the owner of the rent-charge to sue out a writ of habere facias possessionem, in accordance with Section 82 of The Tithe Act, 1835:—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Debate resumed.

*(6.16.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I would invite the close attention of the House to this proviso. It provides that in any case where the officer—it does not say by what means—satisfies the Court that there is not sufficient distress on the land where the occupier is the owner, then there may issue a writ of habere facias possessionem, and the entire property of the small freeholder will be handed over to the tithe owner. The President of the Board of Trade last evening said there was a provision of this kind in the Act of 1836, and that it would take effect under this Act; to which there was the obvious retort, if that is so, then there is no necessity for the insertion of the Amendment in the Bill. But on further considering the Bill I think it will be evident that without the incorporation of these words there will be no power of the kind under the Bill, because by the 1st sub-section of Clause 2 it is expressly enacted that tithe rent-charge as defined by the Act shall not be recovered in any other manner than that provided under this Bill. That would clearly repeal any provision of the Act of 1836, which is inconsistent with the provisions of the present Bill. I would point out how severely the occupiers and small freeholders are dealt with under this Bill, and it is apparent from this and other provisions that the interest of the tithe owner is considered first, then the interest of the landlord, and last of all the interest of the occupier and small freeholder. By way of illustration I may mention that the landlord is allowed three months before proceedings are taken against him, but the occupier is allowed no time at all. By the next sub-section of this clause no similar provision is made for seizure or sale of land which is let by the landlord to a tenant. Without stretching the imagination, a case might be conceived where it would be impossible that the rent and profits from the farm would equal the tithe rent-charge, and yet the Government have not inserted any provision to secure the payment of tithe in such a case, though that might be done by the sale of, or a charge upon, the land. I might put a case where rent and profits would not be sufficient for payment of the tithe. Take the case of land let in consideration of buildings being erected, or a fine or premium being paid—say let for 14 years with only a peppercorn rent for the first seven years; what is there then for the Receiver of the Court to receive? Where the landlord is not himself in occupation, where he is a big landlord letting to small tenants, there may be cases where the tithe rent-charge is not recoverable at all, and the only way to secure it would be by a charge upon, or sale of the land. That, of course, would not be to the interest of the landlords, but to many classes in the community it would be an advantage to have land sub-divided more than it now is. The Government are not prepared for that, but they are prepared on the ipse dixit of an officer to allow a writ of habere facias possessionem to be issued. The Bill was thoroughly discussed in Committee, but I do not know by whose suggestion this proviso is moved, or why there is no similar provision in the case where the land is let. You say that the powers of the tithe owner are not to exceed those under the Act of 1836, and the first sub-section of Clause 2 expressly states that the tithe rent-charge shall not be recovered in any other manner than by this Act.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Will the hon. Member look at Sub-section 2, which, of course, governs these words—

“The order shall be executed by the appointment by the Court of an officer who, subject to the direction of the Court, shall have the like powers for the recovery of the sum ordered to be paid as are conferred by the Tithe Acts on the owners of a tithe rent-charge for the recovery of arrears of tithe rent-charge, and no greater or other powers.”

That includes the officer's right of entry.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: But the right hon. Gentleman has an Amendment.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The hon. Member will allow me to explain that as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby urged that the words might be construed to give the right of entry to the officer and not to the tithe owner, our object is to remove uncertainty from the construction to be put upon the words.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: I hold that the words are very clear. There does not happen to be a law officer on the Bench opposite at the present moment, but there is a great legal luminary there who could decide between us. The words of the sub-section run as follows:—

“Where it is shown to the court that the lands are occupied by the owners thereof the order shall be executed by the appointment by the court of an officer, who, subject to the direction of the court, shall have the like powers by distraint for the recovery of the sum ordered to be paid as are conferred by the Tithe Acts or the owner of a tithe rent-charge for the recovery of arrears, and no greater or other powers.”

The words “by distraint” were inserted last evening, and it is clear that only the powers of distraint are intended. I am sorry to find myself in conflict with the right hon. Gentleman, but I have no doubt that only the powers of distraint are given by the words of the section. Coming back to my first point let me say this. If you have power already under the Act of 1836, will that power be still applicable, and if so let me ask what is the necessity for incorporating this proviso at all? If the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to confer more power than already exists—why put in the proviso? The proviso itself is very much more obnoxious than Section 82 of the Act of 1836, to which he has referred. I contend that that section does not apply, but if it does then let it be so, but this is a very different proviso, that the Court without hearing evidence shall be satisfied with the ipse dixit of its officer.

(6.24.) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): I hope this proposal will be thoroughly threshed out, for from the landowner's point of view it is most important. I cannot understand why this addition is proposed to be inserted. As the hon. Member opposite has said, if it is in the Tithe Commutation Act why insert it here? I cannot help thinking from the experience we get of the wishes of the tithe owners that they must have some very good reason for this Amendment. There is another objection. With other hon. Members I have had the advantage of a classical education, but I must confess I have forgotten the Latin I learned in my younger days, and of this I am quite certain, that when yeoman and tenant farmers come to read over this Bill in which they are so much interested, they will stumble at this proviso, scratch their heads, and wonder how it is an English Parliament cannot use English words. I know the right hon. Gentleman has said that the Act of 1836 gives power to enter on land for the recovery of tithe, but I will say that this clause in the Act of 1836 is the most objectionable clause in the whole Act, and is ten thousand times more objectionable now than when it was enacted. The conditions of agriculture have immensely altered, there are thousands of pounds invested in agriculture now where there were tens or hundreds of pounds in agriculture in 1836. This Bill puts into the power of the tithe owners to enter on a man's land and take possession of what is known as tillages. Under the Agricultural Holdings Act it is specially laid down that tillage and a variety of acts of husbandry shall be considered property for which the person entering on the land shall pay, but here you allow the tithe owner to come in on a yeoman farmer's land, seizing the whole of the tillages without any allowance whatever. I do not see why the tithe owner should have greater freedom in taking another man's property than any other man in the kingdom. When the tithe owner takes advantage of this clause there will be several courses open to him. He might enter on a man's land, and, devoting the whole of it to grain, breaking up most valuable pastures, he might do an incalculable amount of mischief to the land and cause great loss to the owner; he might get in a large crop to satisfy himself, ruining the land for years to come. The land might be farmed badly or too well, causing future loss. There is another course which the tithe owner may adopt, and which he generally does adopt when he takes possession of the land. If the tithe owner, when he takes possession, does not pay for what are termed tillages, it is perfectly clear that when he goes out of possession neither he nor his tenant, if he have one, can have any claim for tillages. I should like to know what respectable farmer at the present time will enter upon land upon such conditions. The tenant will have to quit directly the tithe owner is satisfied, without being able to claim any notice. No respectable tenant farmer would give anything like a reasonable rent for land that has to be let upon such conditions. The result will be that the tithe owner, by taking advantage of this clause, will be able to keep the landowner out of the possession and enjoyment of his land, not only for a year or two years, but possibly for the whole of his life-time. I think it is a most objectionable clause, and I propose to move a slight addition to the words proposed by the right hon. Gentleman with the object of, to some extent, obviating the difficulties I have mentioned. I propose to add the following proviso:—

“ Provided always that any person obtaining possession of any lands by virtue of such right shall make such payments to the owner as would be due from an incoming tenant under the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883, and shall during his occupation be subject to the provisions of that Act and to the custom of the country."

Clearly, if a man has to pay for tillage on coming in, he will have some claim for them on going out. Under my Amendment it will not be in the power of the tithe owner, as I believe it is at the present moment, to destroy the tithepayer's property. It would be the most wanton destruction for a tithe owner who took possession of pasture land to plough up that land for the purpose of securing one good crop to satisfy his claim. I hope this matter may be thoroughly discussed, and that the yeoman-farmers and land-owners generally will be protected from the rapacity of the tithe owners.

Amendment proposed at the end of the proposed Amendment, to add the words—

"Provided also that any person obtaining possession of any lands by virtue of such writ shall make such payments to the owner as would be due from an incoming tenant under 'The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883,' and shall, during his occupation, be subject to the provisions of that Act and to the custom of the country."—(Mr. Henry Farquharson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be added to the proposed Amendment."

(6.38.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I think my hon. Friend rather misconceives the occasions on which this proviso would operate. This sub-section has nothing whatever to do with a case where land is let.

MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: My suggestion is that the tithe owner would let the land to cover the tithe.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Of course if the tithe owner let the land he would become subject to the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 like any other landlord. That is not the case which the Amendment, as my hon. Friend has moved it, would deal with. The case it would deal with is that in which an occupying owner fails to pay the tithe rent-charge and the tithe owner, finding nothing on which to levy a distress, enters upon the land. In that case there will clearly be no tenant on the land. My hon. Friend proposes, that the occupying owner shall be paid by the tithe owner when he enters into possession for acts of husbandry and other compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act. Now, what acts of husbandry could there be? Of course, there could be no hay or straw on that land, because if there were the tithe owner would distrain, and the case that it is desired to meet could not arise. There might be growing crops; but the tithe owner would be entitled to those. They would be his right; he would come in by right of ownership of the tithe. The acts of cultivation which have produced those crops will have been done by the owning occupier with the money with which he ought to have paid his tithe rent-charge, which is the first charge on the land, and when the crops come to maturity the tithe owner has the right to seize them as, under the existing law, he has the right to seize hay and straw. There can come in no question of compensation at all. I have endeavoured to deal with the case from the hon. Gentleman's point of view, but from my own point of view the case where this right of entry would come in force, would not be that of farms under cultivation, but that of derelict farms in the legal occupation of the owner, which he is unable to cultivate and on which there is no distress. The tithe owner in those cases would enter upon the land or let it under the provisions of the Act of 1836. If in doing so he committed waste by breaking up pasture or any thing of that kind he would be liable for damages for that waste. I confess I do not see in what way the words moved would apply to the case in point.

(6.43.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): This Amendment arises in connection with the question of derelict farms, and it is a singular fact that the case of such farms was overlooked by the framers of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of these discussions fairly enough, but I hope no one behind him will say we are delaying the Bill, seeing that we are discussing an important feature which was not even considered by the framers of the measure. We have had Tithe Bills before us now for two years, and have gone through them clause by clause, and Amendment by Amendment, and that the attention we have bestowed upon the Bill is amply justified is shown by the fact that the Government never considered this subject until now. We know that in several parts of the country land has not yielded any rent at all, and there being no means of distress, the farms have become derelict, and have passed into the hands of the tithe owners, very often into the hands of the colleges, who—as I once took the liberty of saying, and I think further inquiries justified the statement—are not the best cultivators of the soil in the world. I have seen an example given where the land passed into the hands of the colleges under such powers as are now proposed, and was let subject to the condition that it should not be cultivated according to the custom of the country. Now, what did that mean? It meant that the land would be run out. The custom of the country is intended to preserve the fertility of the soil, and, by keeping up a proper rotation of crops, to prevent its exhaustion. But in the case to which I refer, in order to facilitate the letting of the derelict farm, it was tendered subject to conditions which would be possible under the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, and which led to waste of the land as complete as could be. The right hon. Gentleman has introduced this Amendment, but he has not at all met the objection I took, and in consequence of which this proposal has been submitted, because I asked what was going to happen in the case of the County Court if the land under this process, which is known in connection with the old tithe rent-charge as a writ of habere facias possessionem, passed into the possession of the Court? Before, the tithe owner was the person who came in under this writ, but here, under this Amendment, the Court may authorise the owner to sue under a writ of habere facias possessionem, and it is not clear that the County Court itself will not take possession in the person of its receiver.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The right hon. Gentleman has omitted to notice that we have inserted the word “distrain,” so as to show that the only power the officer of the County Court will have will be that of distrain.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I want to know what are going to be the exact limits of the County Court powers in this matter of derelict farms, because it is a very material question. You know the tithe owner is not placed in permanent possession of the land. He is only placed in possession for a period sufficient to repay the distress and the costs. That is the object with which he receives possession of the land, and when he has satisfied the tithe-charge and the costs, the land is restored to the original owner. What we want to know is what will be the treatment of the land in the interval, because after three or four years' treatment in the manner I have just referred to it would become so dilapidated that when returned it would be in a worse condition than it was at the beginning. These are matters which arise on the question of derelict farms, and I shall be very much surprised if hon. Gentlemen opposite, who take some interest in the treatment of the land, do not give consideration to these points. Simply to introduce this right under the authority of the County Court without any further provision or explanation as to how it will act seems to me a most unsatisfactory thing.

*(6.49.) MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): The point under discussion is a much more important one than the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade seems to think. It is quite true that if there are crops on the land which can be turned into money, the tithe owner will have the right to turn them into money. But there may be a considerable number of acres on the farm under what is called tillage, on which nothing is growing. Now, if there is a tithe of some £10 or so due to the tithe owner, I do not think that he should be allowed to enter and spoil the tillages.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I would point out that the tithe owner's desire to realise his tithe would compel him to complete the cultivation that had been begun. If the land had been ploughed he would harrow and sow and reap the crop, and after selling it keep the amount of his tithe and pay the remainder over to the owner of the land.

*MR. C. W. GRAY: Quite so, if the tithe owner, or whoever the man may be, who got possession of the farm understood as much about agriculture as the right hon. Gentleman does. But I can assure him that in dealing with the heavy clay lands of Essex it would take a very clever man to know what to do with a particular tillage. It is a perfectly reasonable supposition on the part of my hon. Friend that a great deal of injury might be done to a vast amount of preparatory work in the way of tillages by a man who might enter under this clause, and who might know no more about farming than I do about legal definitions or other lawyers' work. Under these circumstances, unless a great deal more light is thrown on this proposal of the Government. I am afraid I shall be compelled to oppose it. I should be very sorry indeed if the tithe owner for the sake of recovering a small amount of tithe, should be able to spoil a great deal of labour that had been done in the way of tillages.

*(6.54.) MR. WROUGHTON (Berks, Abingdon): I have viewed this Bill with great suspicion, because I believe it to be drawn solely in the interest of the tithe owner, and with no regard to the interest of the tithepayer. I have a suspicion of this Amendment, which, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman may be able to remove. It says—

"If the officer satisfies the Court that there is no sufficient distress on the lands liable to the payment."

That seems plausible enough. But it does not assure us that what is found on the farm in the shape of chairs and tables will not be touched. I do not find those words in the old Act. In the Act of 1836 the word "premises" is used instead of "lands," thus rendering personal property liable to distraint.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am willing to take the words of the old Act. Nothing will be liable to distraint except that which is liable now.

*MR. WROUGHTON: I do not think that is satisfactory. The whole nature of tithe is that it is a charge on the land or the produce of the land. At present, as is well known, land-owners and yeomen farmers have found it impossible to farm their land at a profit. They have been farming for years and finding all the capital—giving themselves all the trouble and incurring all the risk—and they have found that after paying the heavy tithes, commuted in the time of the Corn Laws, they have nothing for themselves. Unless we are careful in framing the clause we shall find that everything may be taken from them, personal property, as well as the produce of the land.

(6.56.) MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): As one who has been for years engaged in practical agriculture, I must say I think the hon. Member for Dorsetshire has made out a very good case for this Amendment. I do not think the President of the Board of Trade was justified in assuming that no acts of husbandry would be performed by anyone coming in under this order. It seems to me that cultivation and tillage of some kind is always going on, and that whilst the tithe owner was waiting for £10 worth of produce to pay his tithe-damage to the extent of £20 or £30 might be done. I do think that under the circumstances, it is reasonable that the owner of the land should be protected, and if my hon. Friend goes to a Division, I shall go into the Lobby with him.

*(6.57.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): There has been considerable misapprehension on this matter. The subject has, no doubt, been brought under consideration, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby stated, by the raising of the question of County Court dealings with derelict farms. But hon. Members have exaggerated the extent to which the Amendment will have application. If there is an owner or occupier in the place it is scarcely possible to conceive that there will not be sufficient distress, therefore, it is only in cases of derelict farms where any necessity for entry will really arise. In these cases, the assumption is that the land has, to a great extent, gone out of cultivation, and that cultivation has to be taken up on behalf of the tithe owner, who desires to make what he can out of the land. It is at this point that we have stepped in. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has said, over and over again, that he does not wish to improve the position of the tithe owner. Well, this Amendment does not improve his position one whit, but simply enables him to take up the powers conferred by the Act of 1836, and exercise them in the case of derelict farms. It is not the case that any fresh powers are given of touching tables or chairs or anything of that kind, but the tithe owner will be able to go in and cultivate the land. An hon. Member said it is a question of the ipse dixit of the officer of the Court, but it is nothing of the kind. The object is to put the tithe owner in exactly the position he would have been in under Section 82. of the Act of 1836. I think if hon. Members who know anything of the law will look into the matter they will see that if the tithe owner is allowed to go on to a farm he should be under the same liabilities as occur at present where compensation can be claimed if he wantonly or wilfully mismanages the land. Hon. Members below the Gangway do not seem to understand the circumstances in which this proviso is applicable. It is applicable to the case of derelict land, because if there is sufficient on the premises to satisfy a distress the question as to power of entry never arises. The argument about ploughing up the corn lands, and so forth, would not, of course, apply where the owner is in occupation. Let me instance a case where the owner has been in occupation. He will either go on cultivating the farm or not. If not, the time will come when there will be no crops on which a distress can be levied, and the power of entry will arise. This power has not been taken advantage of by the tithe owners to any extent, because they find it better to wait till the crops are ripe or have been raised by the occupier or owner, so that they may then avail themselves of the power of distraint. It is only where the landowner is unable to cultivate the crops, and treats the land as derelict, that the power of entry would be exercised by the tithe owner instead of by the County Court bailiff.

*(7.5.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I would put it to the Government: Why cannot they avail themselves of the exceedingly useful suggestions which have been offered from both sides of the House on this matter? The hon. Member who spoke before the Attorney General has suggested certain limitations whereby the distress shall be only on the produce of the land, and there was the suggestion of the hon. Member for West Dorsetshire (Mr. H. Farquharson), whose object was that if any harm ensued from the undue proceedings of the tithe owner in entering upon the land the owner might obtain compensation for wasteful or improper cultivation. As the matter stands, however, we have not even the ghost of a guarantee that the operation of the Government Amendment may not extend to other cases besides those of derelict farms. I can conceive a case in which a man, having got in his crop, finds that he has not sufficient money to pay the tithe, and the land may be of such a nature that it may be thought desirable to let it lie fallow for a certain number of months. What, I ask, will be the position of the tithe owner with that land, say between autumn and the end of March? During that period the land may be much in the position of derelict land, and yet it would be unjust to permit the tithe owner to step in and take possession of the farm. The tithe owner might not be sufficiently acquainted with the proper rotation of crops or with the character of the soil, and the farm might thereby suffer deterioration. In a case of that kind, I fail to see what the operation of the Amendment moved by the President of the Board of Trade would be, and therefore I feel that some sort of limitation or safeguard ought to be interposed.

(7.10.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I would remind the House that this power of entry has always been in force under the old Act, by which the tithe owner was enabled to put the writ of habere facias possessionem in force if he could not get what was due in any other way. I am somewhat surprised that the hon. Member for Berkshire when he addressed us did not give us a case in point with which he is intimately connected. The hon. Member owns a farm which was unable to pay rent or tithes, and he handed it over bodily to the tithe owners, who, I believe, are still farming the land. I think it would have been very interesting if the hon. Member had told the House what results had been obtained by the tithe owners. I am afraid they do not get much. As a rule, however, the tithe owners are afraid to take the land, and would rather forego a large portion of tithe than have the land upon their hands. Still the question that has been raised as to tillages is a very important one, and I think it obvious that there ought to be some safeguard against the land being injured or deteriorated. It would be a simple matter to add a few words that would effect this object, and I hope the Government will see its way clear to the adoption of that course.

*(7.15.) MR. S. T. EVANS: We are told that if the tithe owner, in entering upon a farm, breaks up pasture land or commits waste, he is liable to pay compensation; but I do not know under what provisions that liability is incurred. However, assuming he is liable for actual waste, is there any security that he is liable for permissive waste. I do not know that he would be liable if he merely allows the land to go out of cultivation or does not cultivate it properly. It is said that the officer of the Court would not have the power suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), namely, of management, but only the power of distraint; and that appears to be so, as far as I can gather from the construction of the section; but let me point out what a circuitous procedure this would require. After the passing of the Act you cannot enforce the payment of tithe except by the intervention of the County Court, and in certain cases the order of the Court is to be executed in one way, while in other cases it must be executed in another way. The Amendment says—

“If the officer satisfies the Court that there is no sufficient distress on the lands liable to the payment of the tithe rent-charge, the Court may authorise the owner of the rent-charge to sue out a writ of habere facias possessionem, in accordance with Section 82 of The Tithe Act, 1836.”

And you must go to a Superior Court to get that writ, and again to supersede it. In fact, proceedings may go on for ever. Moreover, the Government do not adopt the words of the Act of 1836—“If there should be no sufficient distress on the premises.” If the Amendment of the Government should be adopted, I shall feel it my duty to move the omission of some of the words and the insertion of those used in the Act of 1836.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I cannot but think that the Government would have done well not to have put this Amendment on the Paper, as it seems to me only to complicate the difficulty. I cannot see why, when they have got nearly all they want they should go out of their way to introduce into the mode of procedure under the Bill this old-fashioned, arbitrary and inconvenient mode of trying to get at the tithe. I would suggest that they had better withdraw the Amendment altogether; if they do not I think they will find they are placing their friends the tithe owners in a very different position. I think hon. Members are right in insisting that if the tithe owner takes it into his head to enter into possession when he finds a farm will not pay tithe, the occupying owner shall be placed in a fair position, and afforded an opportunity of obtaining from the amateur farmer, or tithe owner, a fair compensation for whatever injury may be done. I hope the Government will see the wisdom of not persisting with this very foolish Amendment.

*(7.20.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: With the permission of the House, I think I may state that I shall be able to some extent to meet the wishes of my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon. This does not seem to me to be a question to be dealt with as a matter of compensation between landlord and tenant. The positions of the parties are different, and, therefore, the law as to compensation, as it appears to me, would not properly apply. But I think there is a great deal in what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and by hon. Members on this side of the House as to the possibility of the landowner being injured by waste or improper cultivation, and I will undertake that we will have the point carefully looked into with a view to having words drawn up and inserted so as to make it perfectly clear that the land owner shall be properly safeguarded by rendering the tithe owner liable to him for any injury by waste.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): Will those words be inserted to-night?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I cannot undertake to frame the words off-hand. The Amendment would have to be made elsewhere.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not think that this is at all a convenient way of dealing with the Amendment, and surely, when our conduct on this side of the House has been so freely criticised in relation to this Bill, it is a singular thing that the Government cannot manage, on account of the extreme haste with which they are pressing forward this Measure, to introduce a few words qualifying their proposal before the Bill leaves this House. This is the second Amendment they cannot find time to introduce into the House of Commons, and what is the consequence of all the helter-skelter with which the Bill is being forced upon us? These are Amendments which, from time to time, the Government have resisted, hour after hour, until, when an Amendment has been proposed from their own side they allow themselves and the House to be driven into a corner, and then say, "For heaven's sake allow us to propose an Amendment in the House of Lords, and take your chance whether it will be adopted there or not."

*(7.25.) MR. HAMBRO (Dorset, S.): I have not heard a single remark from the Government showing what objection they have to the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Dorset, and I hope to hear from them some assurance that they will meet the object he has in view.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I would ask whether the Government cannot meet the object by re-committing the Bill in order to introduce the Amendments they propose. We have no business to be met by the statement that Amendments will be introduced in the House of Lords. If I am in order in doing so, I will give notice that we will call on the Government to re-commit the Bill for the purpose of introducing their Amendments before the Third Reading.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is quite competent to the House to re-commit the Bill before the Third Reading.

MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to accept words carrying out the object of my Amendment?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: What are the words?

MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: I have no form of words to propose; I leave it to the Government to frame the words they may think necessary for the purpose.

*MR. C. W. GRAY: May I ask whether we are still expected to agree to the Amendment the right hon. Gentleman has upon the Paper? Would it not be better to allow it to remain in abeyance?

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: As there seems to be a good deal of division of opinion on the legal aspect of the matter, the Attorney General saying one thing and hon. Members belonging to the legal profession on this side saying another, I think it would greatly facilitate the passing of the Bill if it were re-committed for the purpose of having an Amendment inserted that would meet general acceptance.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon I may state that I will not press my Amendment now.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.30.) Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 21, after the word "Receivers," to insert the words, "as in any other case."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. S. T. EVANS: These words were struck out in Committee. I raised an objection in Committee which was supported by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. These seems to me the very same words which were struck out in Committee.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: There was a misapprehension when the words were struck out in Committee, and these words are necessary to make line 21 read in accordance with subsequent provisions. They do not enable the County Court to confer more powers upon the Receiver, but simply to give the Court control over the Receiver.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The words are in accordance with the alteration which the hon. Member himself effected in Clause 2, and they are to enable the Court to have full control over the Receiver, and not to enable the Court to confer further powers on the Receiver.

Question put, and agreed to.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: Would it not be better to insert the word "over" instead of "in respect of?"

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have no objection at all.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 21, to strike out the words "in respect of," and insert the word "over."

Amendment agreed to.

*(7.37.) MR. S. T. EVANS: We come now to the case which the Government promised to consider in Committee. I beg to move to insert at the end of Sub-section 3 the following words:—

"Except in cases where the Receiver satisfies the Court that such rents and profits are not sufficient to comply with and satisfy such order."

I think it is very clear to the House that in cases where the rent and profit of the land are not such as to satisfy the tithe rent-charge, there is no provision at all for the recovery of the tithe charge. Take the case which I used before, of a lease of 14 years between an occupier and a landlord. It might be that the landlord had a spite to the tithe owner, and would say to the occupier—"Give me a big fine, and let me have it at once; or, pay me the rent in advance and I will give you the farm at a lower rent for the subsequent period of the lease." In that case the lowered rents may not be sufficient to satisfy the tithe, and it will not be paid at all. Or take the case of a landlord letting the farm for 14 years on these terms: The buildings are wrecked, and he says—"I am a poor landlord; I cannot spend money to erect buildings; but if you (the tenant) will erect the buildings, I will for the first seven years let you have the farm rent free, or for a peppercorn rent." That is very often the case, I am told. Under such circumstances, it would be impossible for the tithe owner to get his tithe at all. This is one of the cases which the Government promised to consider. I should like to hear what the Government have to say about it, for it is clearly a case which ought to be governed by the Act.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 24, after the word "lands," to insert the words—

"Except in cases where the receiver satisfies the court that such rents and profits are not sufficient to comply with and satisfy such order."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(7.43.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The words proposed by the hon. Member inflict upon the owner a disability from which under the Bill he is especially guarded, and it is contrary to the existing law that any land should be sold for arrear of tithe. I hope the House will not agree to the Amendment.

(7.44.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: It is quite obvious that if the owner of the land objects to the tithe, he may arrange with the occupier for a fine or some other consideration, and the consequence may be that the tithe owner does not get his tithe. Or it may be that no actual rent is paid for a term of years, and that the sum due by the ordinary tenant to the ordinary landlord is considerable. My hon. Friend might adopt a form of words which require the Receiver to satisfy the Court of the value of the land.

(7.45.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to take the case of a farm which is let at a peppercorn rental in consideration of some outlay by the tenant or some capital outlay. Under this section the tithe owner is only entitled to enter into receipt of the actual rent of the land. If the tithe is in excess of that actual rent, then the tithe owner is barred of his remedy. Again, suppose the landlord lets his farm to his son or to some relative at no rent whatever, or merely a nominal rent, in that case under this section the tithe owner would not receive a farthing out of the landowner. He is only entitled to receive rents which the tenant is liable to pay to the landlord. He cannot go beyond the actual extent of the rent of the property at the time, because this section is only applicable to cases in which the owner is in occupation. It cannot be said the owner is in occupation when he has let his land at a nominal rental. I think in the interest of the tithe owner this Amendment should be made to apply. Unless this Amendment is adopted it will be open to anyone by a simple contract of the character I have indicated to get out of the payment of any tithe whatever. Therefore the tithe owner would be deprived of any remedy whatever. If I were asked how to get rid of this Act, I would reply that the simplest way was this. Let the owner of the land, instead of letting at an annual rental of £100, ask the tenant to pay a premium of £1,000, letting the tenant have the land rent free in consideration of the premium for ten years. If there were an agreement of that character, the tithe owner would be absolutely without any remedy whatever. Now if the landowner refuses to pay tithe, the tithe owner makes application to the Court, which appoints a receiver, who simply steps into the shoes of the landowner himself. The Receiver can only do what the agent of the landowner might do; he can simply receive the rents and profits and compel the occupier to pay such rents and profits as he would be liable otherwise to pay to the landowner. Therefore, the tithe owner would have no remedy whatever. I certainly venture to think that my hon. Friend's proposal is a very good way of getting out of the difficulty.

*(7.57.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I beg to move the omission from Sub-section 6 of all the words after the words "rent-charge." My reason for doing so is that the last portion of the clause appears to be taken, in substance at all events, from the Irish Coercion Act, and I believe that it is unknown to the English law. I believe the practice is unknown to the English law, that we should proceed against unknown persons. The clause at present reads that proceedings may be taken against the owner of land without the name of the person being known. I think that is entirely unconstitutional, and against the practices and wishes of the law-givers, at least in England. I have no doubt we shall hear from the Law Officers of the Crown what is their opinion of it. We may find that a statute of Edward III. may be brought to bear on this. The practice laid down under the Irish Coercion Act of proceeding against unknown persons does not commend itself to the British public. I hope that the Government will agree to these words being struck out of the clause.

SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Baronet has assumed a most lively interest in these unknown persons. What we say is that when the tithe owner is not known proceedings may be taken to force him to disclose. It seems to me a proper thing that there should be procedure by substituted service. An owner may be lying dark, and the object is to force him to a disclosure. It is a mistake to suppose that this machinery has never been provided in any Act except the Crimes Act. It has been put into Bills during the last five or six Sessions, and before that—into the Bankruptcy Act, the Merchant Shipping Act, and other measures, of which I could give the hon. Member a catalogue. I am sure there can be no objection to the clause.

(8.0.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Before the question is put I should like to know whether is it incumbent on the tithe owner to make any inquiries as to who the owner of the land is. Is it sufficient for him to say, "I do not know who the owner of the land is?" Is there no protection against the landowner saying, "I am not going to take any trouble to ascertain who the owner is?"

*(8.14.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: Now that my Amendment has been rejected I beg to add at the end of Sub-section 6 "and the occupier has refused to give the name of the owner."

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 3, at the end of Sub-section (6) of Clause 2, to insert the words "and the occupier has refused to give the name of the owner."—(Sir John Swinburne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope the hon. Member will not press the Amendment. As he was told twice before the last Division, this is a matter which will be settled by rules.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: Perhaps I may explain.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I rise to order. The hon. Member has already spoken.

SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I think the Government might well accept this Amendment. If the question has to be settled by rules, why should it not be settled here?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: May I point out to hon. Gentlemen that you might just as well insert in the Statute every condition that will enter into the minds of those who will frame the rules. To insert such a condition as the hon. Baronet proposes would be stultifying the Act.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: I rise to a point of order. Mr. Speaker, as I have not spoken upon this Amendment, I wish to ask you whether I have not the right to speak?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has proposed the Amendment, and has actually spoken to it. He cannot speak again.

(8.16.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Could not the Government accede to the insertion of some such words as the Attorney General suggested, so as to make it necessary for the tithe owner to make all reasonable inquiries as to who the owner is? What I am desirous of providing against is the possibility of the clerical tithe owner saying "I am not going to bother myself as to who the owner is." Only a few weeks ago, the case came under my notice where the tithe owner served a notice upon a wrong person. I can quite understand that the Amendment will not cover every circumstance and contingency, but it is a proper Amendment as far as it goes. The rules will simply set forth the method whereby service shall be effected. I should like to see some indication, direction, or instruction to the framers of the rules, as to the character the rules should assume. Unless some Amendment, such as this is adopted I trust my hon. Friend will go to a division.

(8.20.) The House divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 114.—(Div. List, No. 50.)

(8.30) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Before the right hon. Gentleman proposes his Amendment I have an Amendment to propose in words suggested by the Attorney General at the end of Sub-section 6 of Section 2, as follows—"Every reasonable inquiry having first been made as to who the owner of the land is." This will provide a sort of direction to the framers of the rules as to what line they should take with regard to tithe owners serving notices under this Bill without having made any investigation into the circumstances of ownership.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 3, at the end of Sub-section (6) of Clause 2, to insert the words "every reasonable inquiry having been made as to who the owner of the land is."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I really must protest against the hon. Member taking this course, casually taking out one of the many provisions which will have to be made a matter of consideration, and making it the subject of special reference in this way. It is impossible that we can accept this Amendment.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: But I hope the Attorney General will give some consideration to this suggestion. Cases have happened in which tithe owners have served these notices upon the wrong men altogether; and these men were put to considerable expense to get relief from the consequences of notices being served. The hon. Member has knowledge of the law, and practical experience of what has actually happened in Wales, and certainly I do not think it is asking too much to say that some small trouble should be taken to ascertain the real owners. The words are those actually used by the Attorney General himself.

*(8.35.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I am sure my hon. Friend does not wish to put the House to unnecessary inconvenience. His intention was by introducing some words of this kind to prevent a tithe owner from capriciously serving notices upon the land when he had no real difficulty in finding out the actual owner of the land.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope the hon. Member will not think it necessary to press this; it is a matter that must be dealt with by the rules, and I will undertake to mention the matter to the Lord Chancellor.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Since the right hon. Gentleman has undertaken to see that proper protection shall be given to owners in this matter I will not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 3, at the end, to insert the words—

"The fees payable on the proceedings under this section shall not exceed those set forth in the Schedule to this Act, and the fees, charges, and expenses in or incidental to any distress under this Act shall be the same as are for the time being payable under 'The Law and Distress Amendment Act, 1888.'—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(838.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I was in hopes the right hon. Gentleman would have tendered us some explanation of the proviso and the Schedule to which it refers. When this question was discussed in Committee it excited the greatest interest in all parts of the House, the suggestion for a Schedule being thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury in discussion upon my Amendment which was defeated. It is because of the evident interest that in several quarters of the House was taken in the subject that we have to thank the Government for a Schedule. But this Schedule is very defective inasmuch as it deals simply with the question of "fees," and not of costs. There seems to be a universal agreement in the House that costs ought not to exceed the amount of present distress proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman said last night that the Schedule which I in Committee proposed dealt with fees only, and at the time I could not refer to a copy of the Schedule or a report of the proceedings, but I can assure the right hon. Gentleman he is mistaken.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have a copy of the Schedule here.

MR. S. T. EVANS: With the proviso referring to the Schedule?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes; referring to the Schedule where nothing but fees are set out.

MR. S. T. EVANS: The right hon. Gentleman is not so conversant with the practice of the Courts as the Attorney General. The Schedule does deal with other matters. "In all proceedings for the appointment of an officer under Subsection 1 of Clause 2, if the sum does not exceed £5; 2s. 6d.; if the sum exceeds £5; 5s." There is not a word there about fees at all.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: But those are fees.

MR. S. T. EVANS: Yes, but it does not say Court fees. Further, "For every day's possession, 2s. 6d." This is not a Court fee. You might as well say that a witnesses allowance is a fee. Then the Schedule must be considered in connection with the proviso, which governs its application; and my proviso ran—

"Provided always that the total costs to be allowed to the tithe owner, in any case under Section 2, shall not exceed the costs specified in the Schedule of the Act."

I might also refer to the words used by the right hon. Gentleman himself in his speech in replying to me, in which he made use of the following terms: He had endeavoured to point out the objections to framing a Schedule of costs. "And again, there was a prospect of a long discussion upon questions of shillings and sixpences in a Schedule of costs;" and, in fact, throughout it must be in the recollection of Members that the discussion turned upon the question of costs, not of Court fees only.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It is quite possible that I may have inadvertently used the word "costs."

MR. S. T. EVANS: Well, the point is not worth elaborating. The proviso referred to the total costs, and it will be in the recollection of hon. Members that the discussion ranged over cost of various proceedings, notices, interrogatories, witnesses, solicitors, &c., and I would point out that if we are simply to have a Schedule of fees we are very little better off, for these fees in the proposed Schedule are not appreciably lower than the fees now are. It will be remembered, too, that in illustration I cited a case in which the amount in dispute being only 30s. the cost of witnesses was £11. I said witnesses in that case came from Brighton, and the Attorney General seemed to question whether witnesses would be required; and then it was shown there must be proof of title of the tithe owner, and proof of assessment, and that costs would be incurred by this means. Now, starting from the principle accepted, that so far as we can, costs shall not be heavier under the new procedure than under the old, let me point out that now you can only have the costs of distress, but under the new procedure you must incur greater costs to some extent, because there will be County Court proceedings before the distress takes place. That, however, is the framework of the Bill, and we cannot alter it. But I think it would be entirely against the spirit and intention of the House when this question of costs was left over to the "Report" stage that we should allow a set of rules to be framed and the costs of barristers, solicitors, witnesses to be left uncontrolled—

*MR. SPEAKER: It is my duty to point out to the hon. Member that on a previous occasion, when an Amendment proposed by the President of the Board of Trade was under consideration—an Amendment to provide for the recovery of costs as well as the tithe in the County Court, an Amendment to this Amendment was proposed by the hon. Member for Camborne to the effect that the costs should be "according to the Schedule." The House negatived that proposal, negatived, therefore, the inclusion of costs in the Schedule; and I cannot, therefore, reconcile that negative with the proposal in the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman to include "total costs, charges, and expenses" in the Schedule.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: With every respect for your ruling, Sir, may I point out that the word "costs," as they appear in that part of the Bill, refer to costs allowed by the Bill, and we are now discussing what those costs should be. In that case, the reference was general to costs allowed under the Act, and the costs were not specified.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: On the point of Order, may I remind the House that on the occasion to which you have referred the hon. Member for Camborne argued that the costs should be set out in the Schedule, and it was for the purpose of so including them that he moved his Amendment.

*MR. SPEAKER: That was so. The question was whether there should be a Schedule of costs and fees, and upon that the House decided in the negative.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: Then, Sir, I will say no more on the Amendment, but defer my remarks until we reach my Amendment of which I have given notice, if I shall then be in order in bringing it forward.

*MR. SPEAKER: My ruling will apply to that Amendment, inasmuch as the hon. and learned Member proposes to leave out "fees" and insert "total costs, charges and expenses," or, in other words, to include in the Schedule that which the House has already negatived. The Amendment would be out of order.

*MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): If I may say a word on your ruling, Sir, I would observe that nobody supposed we were so arguing the question at any time as to exclude this point of costs from consideration when reached.

*MR. SPEAKER: Of course, I have nothing to do with what may have been in the minds of hon. Members; I can only take the facts as I find them. It was the question that costs should be according to the Schedule that the House negatived, and I am bound by that decision.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: May I be allowed to observe, Sir, that I pointed out that this Amendment was one upon which the question might be raised.

MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): But are we excluded from debating the question of costs? We are now dealing with Court fees, letting costs stand quite apart. Are we excluded from debating costs? With all submission to your ruling, Sir, I would say I believe the House fully understood this question would arise on the Amendment of the President of the Board of Trade, and I feel sure the House will consider the Government have broken faith with the House if—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is apart from the point of Order. It would be out of Order to discuss the question whether costs should form part of the Schedule. (8.45.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present, (9.16.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I understand from your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that it would be out of order to include a scale of costs in the Schedule.

I do not know whether I should be in order in discussing, without going into figures and detail, the question whether that Schedule should cover costs as well as fees.

*MR. SPEAKER: That is the point of Order I decided.

(9.17.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I understand, Sir, that the question of costs being part of the Schedule was disposed of on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Camborne. I venture to submit that if the Amendment now before the House is adopted, there is nothing that would preclude me from moving a proviso to follow it, which would deal with the total amount of costs to be recovered. The Attorney General shakes his head, but it is to you, Sir, I appeal, to decide the point of Order.

(9.18.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade whether in the event of our agreeing to this clause without discussion, he would consent to re-commit the Bill with the view of discussing the Amendment of the Schedule so as to include the question of costs.

*(9.19.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I cannot agree to re-commit the Bill. The situation is this: I have moved the words on the Paper with regard to fees. The Schedule has been on the Paper several days, and hon. Members were well aware it relates to fees and not to costs. I understand the ruling of the Speaker to be that costs cannot be dealt with in the Schedule; but I should imagine it is possible for hon. Members to move Amendments expressing their views as to costs. It is not for me to express an opinion as to whether that would be in order or not.

*(9.20.) MR. SPEAKER: My ruling was that the Schedule is exclusively a Schedule of fees, and the Schedule cannot be amended so as to include costs associated with fees. When the hon. Member for South Glamorgan asks me if he can bring forward the question of costs, I reply that he can bring forward an independent Amendment to the effect that the costs shall not exceed a certain amount. That will be in Order, but it cannot be included in the Schedule.

*(9.21.) MR. S. T. EVANS: Would it be within our competence to add a second Schedule dealing with solicitors' and barristers' costs?

*MR. SPEAKER: I should like to see the Schedule before expressing an opinion upon it.

Question put, and agreed to.

(9.22.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I beg to move the following proviso at the end of the last Amendment:—

“Provided always that the total cost, including fees, chargeable against the tithepayer shall not exceed 5s. in the pound on the total amount recovered, and in no case shall exceed £5.”

I was afraid, Sir, when I heard your ruling with reference to the Schedule on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that we were by a misapprehension of the gravest kind, I would call it, precluded from discussing that which, from the point of view of the people of Wales, is the most important matter in this Bill. I apologise for intervening with this Amendment, and hope it will not preclude other hon. Members from dealing with the question of costs at a later stage of the Bill. I think, however, that this Amendment will meet the views of my Welsh colleagues. It will be in the recollection of the House that when the question of costs was raised in Committee it was discussed in considerable detail. As I understood, in response to objections and to suggestions from this side of the House, and after a very emphatic statement on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James), an undertaking was given by the Government that they would deal with the question of costs in the Schedule. I may have been wrong—it may have been owing to my denseness and stupidity. I am not imputing bad faith to the Government. The question is a highly technical one, and the word “fees” and the word “costs” are very often interchangeable. My hon. Friend below the Gangway clearly has used the word “costs” in that double sense, though no doubt, technically, there is a broad distinction between the fees charged on entering upon a stage of County Court procedure and the costs as between attorney and client or party and party.

The Welsh Members quite understood that the whole question of penalty and costs to be imposed upon the unhappy tithepayer was to be considered by the Government, and that the result was to be put before the House in some way. I was never more amazed than when I found the Schedule on the Notice Paper. What does the Schedule come to? The Government might have saved themselves the trouble of putting it there, for it is simply a statement of the Court fees. Of what use is that to us? What are we gainers by it, except that we have a slight reduction of the Court fees? If you are going to use this Act in reference to the freeholders in the whole of Wales, let us realise what it comes to. I confess I am not familiar with the procedure which puts the receiver into the possession of the rents and profits of land, and, so far as I can make out, it is a process that is not very convenient under ordinary conditions. It has been imported into this Bill; but when I turn to the County Court Consolidation Act, I find that the method of procedure is a very unusual one, and that it involves a number of steps. First of all, we may assume that the occupying land owner is disinclined or unable to pay his tithe. Well, under the procedure we are about to introduce it will be necessary to go to the County Court. If the application be to the Court, you must have as many copies as there are parties, and one for the Judge, and these must be furnished to the Registrar. The application having been made, notices are served on all those who are concerned. This involves a certain number of fees. The cost of service of the summons or notice where the claim exceeds £10, I find, is 5s., and there may be three, four, or five persons on whom they have to be served. Is that charge included in the Schedule? No. Then come the solicitor's charges, and from the first to the last stage of this complicated and expensive process the costs may be heaped up to any extent without any safeguard on the part of the tithepayer. Looking at the scale of costs that may be dealt with, I have no hesitation in saying that, in order to obtain the appointment of a receiver where the sum of £10 is being sued for against a recalcitrant occupying owner, it would be possible to spend £10, £15, or even as much as £20 in costs. In fact, there seems to be no limit to these charges. The receiver becomes an officer of the Court and has to render all the accounts, and is thereby entitled to poundage and costs generally. It is, indeed, almost impossible to define the numerous ways in which costs may be piled up. We have it on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) that the costs of the County Court are exceedingly high, and after that statement was made the Government told us they would not only look into the matter, but would arrange a Schedule that would give a fair scale. But how are they doing this? They have drawn up a scale which I unhesitatingly say will press very harshly on the poor tithepayer. This ought not to be, especially when we remember that the effect of this Bill will be to increase the value of the tithe at least 25 per cent. The present Prime Minister recommended in introducing a former Tithe Bill that, considering the increased security it would give to the tithe, at least one-fifth should be allowed in return to the tithepayer; but the tithe owners refused this, and that Bill was not proceeded with. By this Bill you not only give the tithe owner an easy debt-collecting machinery, whereby the payment of the tithe may be enforced, but you actually increase the value of the tithe at least 25 per cent., and to a large extent render it a saleable security, and yet at the same time, you propose to inflict a system of costs that will press with extreme harshness on the tithepayers as a body I think that when a machinery such as is provided by this Bill is put at the service of the tithe owner it ought to be put in motion at his own expense. The costs of County Court processes are admitted to be absurdly high, thereby inflicting an unjust tax on those who have to pay them, and the sooner these heavy charges are swept away, and the doors of our Courts of Justice are opened in such a way as to get rid of this shameful tax on the public, the better will it be for the country generally. But whatever the costs are I say this: that they should be borne by those who are acquiring by means of this Bill an enormous increase of property, and ought not to be imposed on the poor tithepayer.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words—

“Provided always that the total cost, including fees, chargeable against the tithepayer, shall not exceed five shillings in the pound on the total value recovered, and in no case shall exceed five pounds.”—(Mr. Arthur Williams.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*(9.33.) MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS: It is contended on this side of the House that in imposing a new process for the collection of tithe the Government should take care that those who have to pay the tithe will not be put to greater cost than is incurred under the present system. This question was discussed in a tolerably full House when the Bill was in Committee, and, as has been stated, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury agreed with us in saying that the Schedule of costs in the County Court at the present time was excessive. What, I ask, would have been the meaning of the arguments then employed if we were only considering the mere question of fees? And here let it be understood that I am not charging right hon. Gentlemen opposite with having consciously violated any engagements, although certainly from what occurred I should have thought they would have been disposed to have taken a more favourable view of the question, and to have adopted the moderate proposal now made by my hon. Friend. Under the old system of distraint nothing but the ordinary fees were chargeable against the person whose goods were seized, and it was in view of this fact, and of all the other considerations that have been brought forward, that the Government gave a pledge that the whole question should be dealt with in a Schedule. I cannot imagine how they can have supposed that we understood their promise in any other sense than that in which we have been discussing the matter this evening. Surely there can be no objection to their re-considering the question, and dealing with the entire matter of costs and fees in an amended Schedule. It is obvious, and has been fully admitted, that under the new and substituted process for the recovery of tithe the costs should not be more onerous than they have hitherto been; and I would appeal to the Attorney General to say whether it was not intended that the penal consequences to the tithepayer should not be increased by this Bill? Even assuming it to be right that the tithepayer should pay the solicitor's costs, he ought, at any rate, to know what those costs will be. I cannot understand what objection there can be to the framing of a Schedule from which a man may learn the extent of the costs to which he may be put in resisting a claim for tithe. I hope, therefore, the Government will see their way to the production of such a Schedule as will show the ultimate limit to which the costs in these cases may hereafter be carried.

(9.40.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I think I am right in saying that hon. Members on this side of the House do not wish to deprive the titheowner of the legitimate costs he may incur in suing for his tithe, and, therefore, we would not oppose any rational Schedule of costs. What we say is that the present Schedule of County Court costs is utterly irrational and highly oppressive. The vast majority of cases under the Bill will be undefended cases; but wherever a case is defended all sorts of intricate points relating to questions of boundary and law will be sure to crop up, and in such cases it is only fair that the tithe owner should have a proportion of the costs he may be put to; but it would be only right to adopt some such Amendment as that suggested by the hon. Member for the Gower Division, that in such cases we should not allow costs beyond the Schedule of the Bill. The House negatived that proposal, so that the present position is this: that whenever there is any legal point involved the Judge may certify that the point was in the public interest, and that the tithe owner should have his proper costs. But the cases to which the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Glamorgan is applicable are those in which there is no trial. In Wales there will be shoals of cases in which the tithepayer will protest against the payment of the tithe. These cases, when brought before the Court, will not be defended; there will be no intention of raising points of law. Why should a solicitor be employed in those cases? There is absolutely no necessity for one. Or, why should witnesses be called? Under the Schedule, if applied to undefended cases, a solicitor would be allowed to charge 6s. 8d. for preparing the proof of each witness; 5s. for every copy; and a fee for every brief, where, in fact, no brief is required at all, because there is no defence. I think it is a most offensive exercise to be made of the Act. In hundreds of cases in England the tithepayer cannot pay his tithe except only by instalment, and when summoned before the Court he states his willingness to pay by instalments of £1 a month. If this Schedule is allowed to stand in these cases all the costs to which I have referred would be incurred, though not in the slightest degree necessary. The other day I looked into the costs of an undefended case in the County Court. It was very well known that the case would not be defended. In fact, the only reason the defendant was in Court was that he could not pay, and he was asking for time. In this case the solicitor was allowed 13s. 4d., or 6s. 8d. for entering the case, so much for serving the summons, and so much for preparing the brief; and in this case, as in every case, it was within the power of the solicitor to give notice to defend. So that you may have undefended cases—I am not speaking of defended cases—in which the costs can be run up to £6, though the sum owing is only £20. I think this a most monstrous thing. Another strong argument is, that the costs in these cases should be circumscribed in a greater degree than in ordinary cases. As a rule, in Wales, these cases will be presented in batches of 40. To enter one involves little more expense and trouble than to enter the whole 40. Really the whole work could be done by the solicitor's clerk in a couple of hours. Yet the solicitor is entitled by the Schedule to run up a bill in these 40 cases of from £100 to £200. I venture to think that a separate Schedule should be given limiting the costs in undefended cases, unless, indeed, it is intended that the costs should be used as a means of crushing agitation. But in endeavouring to crush the agitation, it seems to me that you will also be oppressing the yeoman farmers of England, by the introduction of these costs and fees.

(9.48.) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: I have not enjoyed a legal education, but I distinctly understood the Government to say during the course of this discussion that they would take care that the tithepayer was not in a worse position after the passing of this Act, especially with regard to this matter of costs. But now the Government are endeavouring to ride away on some ridiculous difference between fees and costs. To my mind, either one or the other is very much the same against the tithepayer, who is compelled to pay them. I venture to suggest to the Government that it would be wise to re-commit the Bill altogether, so that we might clearly understand what the Government does mean.

*(9.50.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I do hope the suggestion coming from the hon. Member will be taken into consideration by the Government. We laymen, not learned in the law, look not upon legal complications, but upon the broad principle, that the tithepayer should be put in no worse position with regard to costs than he was before. Though I do not go so far as some of my hon. Friends below the Gangway, yet I know that those who look upon tithe as national property are prepared to accept a reasonable solution of this question of costs, and surely the proposition that they should not exceed 25 per cent. of the sum claimed is a reasonable one.

*(9.58.) SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN (Swansea, District): Sir, I have refrained hitherto from joining in discussions which appeared to be to me of a purely legal character. We have a strong bench of Welsh lawyers, which has enabled Welsh Members to take up a leading position in discussions on this Bill. I have always thought it undesirable for Members to speak in this House on questions which others know better than themselves. But here is a question which the lay mind is perfectly well able to grasp. I think it would be unreasonable to refuse the request contained in the Amendment. How can it be justified that the costs may be 50, or perhaps 100, per cent. of the amount paid? Is that reasonable, is that just to the Welsh people? Surely it is desirable to pass an Act which will be regarded as just. If the Government refuse this limitation to 25 per cent. the Welsh people will consider that justice has been denied them. The learned Attorney General smiles. A lawyer may look at the matter from his point and a litigant from his; but I venture to suggest to the Government that, in the interests of justice, it would be well to allow this Motion to be carried.

*(10.1.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I should think the Government would be glad to seize an opportunity of fulfilling their pledge to give a Schedule of costs. The noble Lord the Member for Darwen dissents from that statement, but he is not the Government. This point has so far been argued from the Welsh point of view; but I would point out to hon. Members who are interested in the Eastern Counties that it equally affects the farmers in that district. There, as I understand, the farmers suffer severely from the agricultural depression; and I would ask, are they not the men most likely to go to the County Court in order to secure the advantage of paying the tithe by instalments? And yet it is the fact that, whether the case be defended or not, a solicitor will incur all the costs. At present no costs are allowed, either of solicitor or barrister, in recovering tithe by distraint. The necessary preliminary proceedings in the County Court will cost something, and that cost will be additional; but you are heaping upon them the costs of solicitor and counsel, which are not at present allowed. I maintain that it was clearly understood that the total burden in the way of costs imposed by the new procedure should be comprised in a Schedule, and yet the Government are now under cover of a strict technical difference between fees and costs, refusing to do so. I hope that the Government will re-consider the question, if they wish the Debate to be carried on in the same spirit in which it has been conducted hitherto.

(10.5.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I hope that nothing which falls from me will prevent the Debate being carried on in the same spirit; but I confess I think that the kind of spirit shown by the hon. Member for South Glamorgan, who said that the tithe owner should get nothing of these expenses, but use this improved machinery at his own expense, is hardly likely to promote a fair settlement of the question. I wish to appeal to the recollection of the House to say that there has never been one word said to justify the assertion as to the inclusion of costs in a Schedule. There was a suggestion that a maximum should be imposed; but I wish to call the attention of hon. Members opposite to the speech in Committee of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, who followed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury, and supported his demand, on the ground that it was not a question between plaintiff and defendant but between the plaintiff and the Treasury. He stated that the Treasury were exacting in fees more than was necessary. That was, in the main, the argument which induced the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to agree to insert a Schedule. In language which was, perhaps, not so careful as it should have been, I expressed my own opinion that in an undefended case the costs would not exceed a few shillings, and in reply to me either the hon. Member for Gower or the hon. Member for Carnarvon quoted fees, and fees only. I took it down at the time, and the words may be found in Hansard. The hon. Member referred to the plaintiff fee of 1s. in the £1, and the hearing fee of 2s. in the £1, and he showed that in a case in which the claim was for £5 19s. 6d. the costs would be 18s. But I venture to submit that these fees have nothing whatever to do with the costs of solicitors or witnesses. It has been suggested not only that there should be a maximum, as proposed in another Amendment, but that individual costs in the County Court should be reduced. Costs, however, necessarily depend upon the number of witnesses, on the distances they have to travel, and on other circumstances. Hon. Members opposite, therefore, are under a misapprehension, and it is most remarkable that this notice having been down on the Paper for four or five days nobody has put down any Schedule purporting to deal with costs. The only Amendment on the Paper, that in the name of the hon. Member for the Eifion Division, proposes that there shall be a total percentage limit; but no one has framed a Schedule enumerating item by item the particular costs to be incurred. Taking a defended case, prior to this Bill the costs in an action of replevin, whether in the County Court or in the Superior Courts, would be five or six times as much as in the procedure under this Bill. In an undefended case, I admit the order of procedure would be that there would be small costs before distress, and then distress. As to distress, it is provided that the costs shall be the same as were payable under the Distress Act, 1888. There is no doubt as to the way in which costs in undefended cases ought to be dealt with, and the Government will take care that they shall be dealt with by rules of the Rule Committee. Under these rules the costs of employing a solicitor will not be allowed where no notice of defence has been given. If the tithepayer admits that he owes the money, a rule that no costs shall be allowed beyond the fees will meet the objections that have been made. I say this with the authority of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. If the tithepayer admits owing the money no witnesses will be necessary, and the fees wholly or in part will be remitted. If witnesses are called in such cases, the tithe owner will have to pay for them himself. The only case which will not be met by these rules will be cases of strenuous defences, where the tithepayer goes into Court meaning to put the tithe owner to the expense of proving his case, although he knows that he owes the money. In all fairness and justice the moderate costs allowed under the Bill ought in such a case to be borne by the tithepayer. What is the proposal before the House? Is there anything more ridiculous than to say that the maximum costs, including fees, shall not be more than 5s. in the £1, when any one of the fees may in small cases of a few shillings exceed the proposed maximum? Such a proposal is not businesslike. It is the kind of suggestion which does very well for those who endeavour to pose as the friends of the poor tithepayer, but which really suggests a false standard, which would allow an absurdly excessive amount of costs in large cases and a ridiculously inadequate amount in the small cases. I hope that I have satisfied hon. Members that they are under a misapprehension, and that in undefended cases the costs will be strictly limited by the rules which the Government will have framed.

(10.22.) MR. S. T. EVANS:* It is not contended that in undefended cases solicitors' and barristers' costs are not now incurred; but will the hon. and learned Gentleman undertake that in such cases there shall be no legal professional costs under this Act?

SIR R. WEBSTER:* I am perfectly willing to undertake that the rules shall, in cases in which there is an admission of liability, prevent such costs being charged against the tithepayer.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 7, before the word "have," to insert the words "or of the County Courts Act, 1888."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Amendment agreed to.

(10.36.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH:* I beg to move the next Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 9, at the end, to insert the words—

"And shall in any other case have no other or greater powers of fine or imprisonment than are conferred by the County Courts Act, 1888."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. S. T. EVANS:* This is the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade undertook to put on the Paper the other evening in place of one which I withdrew. I will explain why I put my Amendment on the Paper to restrict powers of imprisonment to Section 48 of the County Courts Act. On the 2nd of February I put this question to the Attorney General—

"Is the Attorney General willing to confine cases of imprisonment to this one Section 48?" The right hon. Gentleman replied as follows:—

"I am not aware that I ever said I desired to avail myself of any other section. I have never suggested by one word that there should be any liability except under this section."

SIR R. WEBSTER: I beg pardon, but if the hon. Member will look back he will see that that answer was given in reference to a discussion concerning interference with the bailiff.

MR. S. T. EVANS: It was a discussion on an Amendment moved by an hon. Friend of mine, dealing with imprisonment in general under the powers of this Bill. But there is one point on which I should like to have some explanation from the Law Officers. Everyone would desire that the power of the County Court to protect itself and its own dignity should remain intact. There are, however, in the 162nd section of the County Courts Act words relating to officers either going away from or coming to the Court. I should like to know whether, in the opinion of the Attorney General, those words have reference to the time the Court is actually sitting, or whether they would include the case of a bailiff going from his office armed with the warrant of the County Court to execute a process? If the hon. and learned Gentleman's answer to that question is not satisfactory, I shall ask the Government to insert the express sections in the Act, and I am not sure that in any event I shall not do so. The County Court is a Court of Record. [MR. ADDISON: Hear, hear.] I am glad that an hon. Queen's Counsel has found that out at last. It seems to have dawned quite freshly upon him. Is it not the case that a Court of Record has the power inherent in itself of imprisoning for contempt? We want to make it perfectly clear that no power to imprison outside the specific cases mentioned in the County Courts Act, 1888, is given to the County Court Judge.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I have no doubt that "going to and returning from the Court" means going to and returning from the Court in which the Judge sits—not going to the place armed with a warrant. Again, power to commit for contempt in face of the Court is now controlled by Section 162. The other powers as to imprisonment are in Sections 48 and 50 and following sections, and they refer to jurors, bailiffs, and so forth. There was a case where a County Court Judge attempted to exercise some other power, and he was restrained. There is no power of the Court to exercise the power of imprisonment, except in the cases mentioned in the section of the Act.

Question put, and agreed to.

The following Amendment stood in the name of MR. A. WILLIAMS:—

In page 3, line 9, at end, to insert—"Provided that in no case shall a person charged with having committed any offence under the forty-eighth or one hundred and sixty-second sections of 'The County Courts Act, 1888,' be taken into custody by an officer or bailiff of the county court, or be brought before a county court judge, but the charge shall be inquired into by a court of summary jurisdiction. On such inquiry, the person charged shall be asked whether he will have his case summarily decided or tried by a jury. If he elects to be tried by a jury, and the Magistrates consider that a case for committal has been made out, he shall be committed for trial at the next quarter sessions."

MR. SPEAKER: This Amendment is not in Order. The hon. and learned Member proposes an alteration of the County Courts Act in respect of Clauses 48 and 162. He proposes that anybody charged with contempt of Court shall not be tried by the County Court Judge, but shall go before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and, on appeal, shall have the right to a jury. The House has passed an Amendment to the effect that in the case of any second action or matter under this Act it shall be lawful for the plaintiff or defendant to require a jury to try the said action or matter.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: Am I to understand, Sir, that when these sections of the County Courts Act have been incorporated in this Act it is not competent for the House to modify the general law?

MR. SPEAKER: Certainly not; because it is not applicable to this Act. The hon. and learned Gentleman refers to any officer of the County Court.

*(10.46.) MR. C. W. GRAY: The Bill contains three principal provisions: Firstly, the tithe rent-charge has in future to be recovered from the landlord only; secondly, tithe has to be recovered through the County Court; and, thirdly, there is the clause which by a misnomer is called a Relief Clause. I have always contended that if we deal with cases where the tithe is out of all proportion to the value the landlord derives from the land from which the tithe issues, we ought to deal with them in a spirit of justice and fair-play. In my opinion, this House owes a long-standing debt to the tithepayers on this description of land. The debt was set up when the Corn Laws were repealed. That was the time when the tithe question ought to have been taken up by Parliament. Again, there has been a great change in local rating, and that charge has a great bearing on the point. At the time of the apportionment of tithe in 1836 it was found that during the seven previous years rates had been so high—in some cases 10s. and 15s. in the £1. In consequence, a large sum was added to the tithe apportionment to enable the tithe owner, after the passing of the Commutation Act, to pay the rates. My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset (Mr. Farquharson) in the very interesting pamphlet he has written on the tithe question, shows that in one case in which the tithe apportionment was £800 per annum, between £400 and £500 was added in respect of the payment of the rates. My hon. Friend shows, and no one has ventured to question his assertion, that since the passing of the Commutation Act a very much less sum than £400 or £500 in the case mentioned would have been sufficient to enable the tithe owner to pay the rates. In reality, the tithe owner has been saving, out of the sum which was added to the tithe apportionment to enable him to pay the rates, a very large sum, if not every year, at any rate during most of the years which have passed since the enactment of 1836. Under these circumstances, I have a right to claim that if relief is to be given by this Bill at all, it should be real and not illusory. The hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Talbot), who, I think it will be admitted, notwithstanding the presence of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge) is the leader in this House upon all matters connected with tithe and the Church, said on the 26th of January—

“This Bill is essentially a Bill of compromise and conciliation. It is a Bill for the settlement of a long vexed question, and we can never settle any vexed question unless there is a certain amount of give and take.”

I ask the hon. Gentleman if he can place his finger upon one part of this Bill which can be said to contain the principle of give and take, or to exhibit any spirit of compromise in the interest of the tithepayers. The hon. Member and his friends will not suggest for a moment that the give and take principle is to be found in the first part of the Bill, which transfers the payment of the tithe from the tenant to the landlord. Anyone who knows anything about the tithe question must admit that in that clause there is an invaluable concession to the tithe owners. Can the hon. Member show me one word in the next part of the Bill—in that part which deals with the recovery of tithe through the County Court—which breathes of compromise in the interest of the tithepayers? If there is any give and take, it must be in this 3rd Clause to which my Amendment applies, and I ask the House to bear with me if I repeat one or two arguments I have used before. This clause puts the tithe question for the future in this position: Parliament in 1891, decides that the tithe owners' property from the land may be double that of the property of the landlord or the yeoman farmer. If I am asked whether I will accept this 3rd clause as a relief clause, I shall say no. Although, we have waited for years to get this question settled, I would ten times rather the question remained as it is than have it settled as now proposed. During the last few years, several Bills dealing with the tithe question have been introduced, and I think every Member of the House will agree with me, when I say that each Bill has been better than its predecessor. When we have concluded the consideration of this Bill, I think all fair minded men will, on examination, find that every Amendment accepted by the House has improved this Bill. That leads me to believe that as we go on, as Parliament becomes more and more acquainted with the technical questions relating to tithe-paying in the Eastern Counties, and those parts of England where tithe-paying has become such a grievance, we shall get a fair recognition of our just claims. If this so-called relief clause is passed, we shall be twitted on every platform, from Land's End to John O'Groats, with having dealt with the question in this way. A certain amount of relief will be given to a very limited number of large farms, but we shall be challenged to name one small farm of from 10 to 15 acres upon which there are buildings of any value which will come within the point of relief. I am very sorry that I have to take up this position to-night. I acknowledge most freely the courtesy with which we have been met by the President of the Board of Trade, but I feel I should be false to the promises which I gave to my yeoman farming friends in the Eastern Counties before I entered the House if I did not say on their behalf that we much rather the whole question of relief remained in abeyance than be settled on the suggested terms. We are to have a Commission to inquire into the question of Tithe Redemption. Why should not this question remain in abeyance until that Commission has reported? I am satisfied that when that Commission present their Report we shall be able to make out such a strong case for the small farms that Parliament will not dare to turn a deaf ear to our appeal. I have another very strong point in connection with my proposal. I may say with almost literal accuracy that there are not twenty Members in the House who really approve of this clause, or at least they have not expressed themselves in favour of it. We have had a number of speeches condemning the clause from all points of view. It has been condemned because it does not go far enough, and again, because it goes too far; but who are the Members who approve the clause I have failed to discover. I am sometimes accused of being a confiscator and I was twitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby with being a greater robber than the Government, and thereupon he held out to me the right hand of fellowship. But now I ask the attention of the House to the wishes and recommendations of a most important meeting of tithe owners held in the county of Essex with the Rev. H. F. Johnson, Archdeacon of Essex, in the chair. A number of the clergy were assembled, and I am bound to say, judging from the report of the proceedings, they do not seem to have been a very happy family; but at any rate we are right in paying every respect to the resolutions passed at this important assembly of clergy, and one of the resolutions arrived at was that the whole of this third clause should be expunged. Now what will the Government do? Will that stalwart champion of the Church, the hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. Talbot), assist in giving effect to the wishes of this assembly of clergy? They sent me this circular and, at last, I am happy to say that I am not only acting in accordance with the wishes of my own particular friends, the yeomen farmers of the Eastern Counties, but with the wishes of the clerical gentlemen who met at Chelmsford, and also with the wishes and request of a gentleman who has taken an active part in connection with the payment of tithe and this Bill, Mr. Lloyd of the Tithe-payers' Association. I regret to have to ask the House to eliminate an important part of the Bill, but still, the other two parts of the Bill will be just as valuable and just as workable.

Question proposed, "That the words from the word 'where,' in line 22, to the word 'payable,' in line 26, both inclusive, stand part of the Bill."

*(11.5.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The first and second clauses of this Bill, as the House is aware, alter the present law with regard to tithe by transferring the direct liability for tithe rent-charge from the occupier to the owner. That has been felt almost universally by tithe owners to be a great benefit and advantage to them. I do not think that that is denied by my hon. Friend who has just spoken. There has been a general admission, I do not say a universal admission, for there have been a few exceptions, such as the resolution passed at the meeting to which my hon. Friend has referred, but I think there is a general admission from the tithe owners that in return for this benefit and advantage something should be given to the tithepayers. That something has been embodied by the Government in the clause now under discussion. That has been loyally accepted by Members who represent more especially the interest of the tithe owners in this House, who though feeling—I know they feel—that perhaps it will be giving the tithepayers more than tithepayers are fairly entitled to, bearing in mind the settlement of 1836, are yet willing to support the proposal as a quid pro quo in return for the advantage to tithe owners gained under Clauses 1 and 2. That being so, this 3rd clause which does certainly give an advantage to tithepayers over the present law—I do not think my hon. Friend will deny that—is attacked because it does not give enough. That is my hon. Friend's position. My hon. Friend would have been content if the maximum amount of tithe had been fixed at half the value of the land instead of two-thirds.

*MR. C. W. GRAY: A compromise.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Certainly, if his Amendment had been carried he would not have moved the omission of the clause. But what is his action now? I recalled to his mind the old proverb, "half a loaf is better than no bread." I think my hon. Friend must have taken note how, during the course of his speech, he was cheered by hon. Members below the Gangway opposite. What is the position they have taken up in reference to this matter? I must say a rather inconsistent position, because in contesting the 2nd clause they have done their utmost to throw impediments in the way of recovery by the tithe owners of tithes justly due, and now when we come to deal with this 3rd clause they stand up as defenders of the tithe owners, and object to tithepayers receiving any relief. Therefore, if my hon. Friend succeeds in defeating the clause he will do it, not by the aid of those who agree with him, but by the aid of those who absolutely differ from him, and who, if they had their way through his aid, would take very good care his friends should get nothing from the tithe owners. That would be the result of the success of my hon. Friend. I do not for a moment deny that if this 3rd clause is struck out it will to my mind amount to a very serious alteration of the Bill. But my hon. Friend must face the possibility of this Bill going on without the 3rd clause, and what then will he say to his friends and farmer constituents in Essex? Will he say, "The Government proposed that the tithe should in no case exceed two-thirds the annual value of the land, and that would have relieved some tithepayers; but I got that clause struck out, and now there will be no relief at all." I trust that hon. Members who desire to give some relief to tithepayers will not take what, with all respect to my hon. Friend, I must characterise as the ostrich-like view he takes; but although they may think the clause does not give tithepayers as much as they would desire, yet they will see that it is better than that there should be no relief at all.

(11.10.) SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I take it that the hon. Member for Maldon knows very well what he means by his Amendment, and those who support that Amendment know very well why they do so. The argument of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division amounts to this—that there is no concession whatever in this Bill of the slightest value to the tithepayer. Last year a concession was proposed that would have been of real value, and not at all an excessive concession, of 5 per cent. all round.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: There certainly was a proposition that there should be a concession of 5 per cent. all round.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That was not proposed by anybody last year.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The year before, or previously, it does not seriously affect the argument. The concession of 5 per cent. in the original scheme would have been a very genuine alleviation to the tithepaying classes as against the very great benefit which the Bill confers on the tithe owner. All who are engaged in agriculture in this country, whether landlords or tenants, and still more so the yeomen farmers, are aware that some thing ought to be done to correct those serious cases in which the excessive payment of tithe is a hindrance to the due cultivation of the land; and no one who knows agriculture well can believe that the proposed relief in the Bill will affect more than one or two farms in many counties. What is the proposed relief? It is where under Schedule B the valuation of the tithe exceeds two-thirds of the valuation of the farm there is to be a reduction. But what is the expense of carrying on the work of an estate in this country? In old days the working expenses in agriculture used to be, on a large estate, something like 25 per cent. of the rent; but now-a-days, with the fall of rents, these working expenses have risen to 33 per cent. I speak generally, but from knowledge of a good many estates. Thirty-three per cent. is equal to a third of the rent, and the Government propose that when the tithe turns two-thirds of the valuation under Schedule B then the tithe shall be reduced; that is to say, the proposal of the Government is that no relief whatever shall be given until the tithe has eaten up the whole of the available rent of the land. To that no answer is given. That will be the case on large farms and large estates, but it will be very much worse on small farms, where buildings make a very excessive part of the valuation. On those farms where relief is most wanted the proposal of the Government will give no relief whatever. Hon. Gentlemen opposite who are concerned with the cultivation of land know perfectly well that in those serious cases where the tithe makes such inroads on the rent or profits from the land, cultivation cannot be carried on at all, or only on sufferance. This proposal gives no relief whatever, therefore it is, I conclude, that the hon. Member proposes to strike out this clause, feeling certain that it will relieve nobody. It is a sort of pretence of relief which the right hon. Gentleman says the tithe owners have accepted loyally, and well they may accept it loyally. On that account the hon. Member makes the most emphatic protest in his power against this sham, this illusory relief to the tithepayer, in a Bill which gives such relief to the tithe owner, by proposing to strike out the clause; and in the interest of sound and sincere legislation I shall certainly vote with him, and I trust every hon. Member who has the true interests of agriculture at heart will do the same.

(11.15.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE. (Stockport): The simple answer to the right hon. Gentleman's opening remark in reference to the 5 per cent. reduction is this, that it was a proposal made when it was suggested that tithe-rent-charge should be a personal debt recoverable upon the whole estate of the landowners. There is nothing of the kind in this Bill, and, therefore, no reason for the reduction. As the clause was brought in I very readily voted for it, because it seemed to me to give temporary relief to both parties, a temporary reduction from the tithe owner, and a temporary relief to the tithepayer, which might bring into cultivation land which otherwise would fall out of cultivation. The clause is wisely framed in the interests of both parties. The clause then contained a sub-section which has since been struck out on the Motion of the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton), a sub-section, having special reference to the 58th Section of the Act of 1836. Under the section a landowner in possession of different lands, upon the whole of which there was a tithe rent-charge of, say £200 a year, was permitted to put the whole of the tithe rent-charge upon a portion of such lands, providing such lands were worth three times the value of the tithe, or £600 a year, leaving the remainder of the land free. But even without that sub-section I think the clause ought to remain in the Bill on the general ground that the temporary giving up of a portion of the tithe due to the owner will assist in bringing land back to cultivation, and then in the future the tithe owner will be enabled to receive his full amount of tithe due to him.

*(11.18) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: It appears to me that the attitude of the

hon. Member for the Maldon division is one that does him a good deal of credit. The position in which he stands is this. Under the first clause it is admitted there is considerable advantage to the tithe owner, because henceforward he will recover his tithe in a single cheque instead of in a number of small cheques with all the inherent difficulties of collection. It is also admitted that under the second clause a great advantage is given to the tithe owner on account of the more stringent means of recovery placed at his command. Under these circumstances, with these two points admitted, the only question remaining is whether in compensation for these advantages to be conferred on the tithe owner there is to be any benefit to the tithepayer. Now the contention of the hon. Member for Maldon appears to be that under Section 3 of the present measure you are conferring on the tithepayer a visionary and theoretical advantage which will be of no real benefit. Under the circumstances I hope the hon. Member will not be content with an academic protest, but will go to a Division on the point. It is a question which excites the deepest interest among all concerned in the cultivation of the soil, and more especially among yeomen farmers, to whom the clause can only give relief in an infinitesimally small number of instances. I question whether throughout the whole of Suffolk the clause would give relief to two small farmers. The same might be said of the counties of Berkshire and Essex, where in typical cases brought forward this clause will effect no reduction, though some benefit might be effected by the alternative proposal of the hon. Member for Maldon. Even that Amendment if carried would have effected in a very small degree any alleviation of those grievances for which a remedy is only to be found in a revision of tithe. Under the circumstances, I think that every hon. Member who is concerned with agricultural interests should go into the Lobby with the hon. Member for Maldon as a protest against this pretence of reduction, which is really no reduction at all. If this clause is struck out I hope it will leave the way clear next year, or the year after, for more definite and complete proposals based to some extent on evidence brought before the Royal Commission, over which it may be assumed Lord Basing will preside.

*(11.23.) MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I must draw attention to the curious anomaly which presents itself on this almost the final stage of the Bill. This clause we are now discussing and which my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon wishes to excise, is the only relief to the tithepayer in the Bill. The other two clauses are in the interest of the tithe owner, the hon. Member says and I do not deny that. This clause is by the admission of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Maldon the only relief clause in the Bill, but he now says it is illusory. Having allowed the 1st and 2nd clauses to pass without protest, the hon. Gentleman now asks the House to excise the only clause which conveys any relief to the tithepayer. I should have thought it impossible that any friend of the farmers could make such a proposal. If any intelligent farmers have listened to the hon. Gentleman they will find it difficult to support the hon. Member's peculiar position. From my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade we have heard the position clearly put, and I should not have risen but for the hon. Member's allusion to myself. My hon. Friend said that I, in a previous stage of the Bill, spoke of the Bill as a compromise—a Bill of conciliation—a Bill of give and take. I repeat that now, and I say that as the first two clauses place the property of the tithe owner on a more satisfactory basis than before, so this clause, I believe, is a concession to the tithepayer. My hon. Friend says it is a concession hardly worth having, but at any rate, it is better than no concession at all, and if it is worth anything, my hon. Friend had much better accept it. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stevenson) suggests that if the clause is refused now something better may be secured a year or two hence, but when the hon. Gentleman has had such a length of Parliamentary experience as I have had, he will not expect that a subject which has been five times before Parliament in recent years, and has occupied so much time, will be likely soon to be taken up again. If my hon. Friend thinks the concession to the tithepayer is worth anything at all, he will do well to accept it; however small the concession it is better than none at all.

(11.26.) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: I have no hesitation in saying that I shall vote for the omission of the clause, and for the reason that I believe it absolutely contains no concession to the tithepayer. The right hon. Gentleman says that a half a loaf is better than no bread, and I accept all the wisdom of the proverb, only here I do not see the half-loaf. It is said that the object of this so-called concession is to induce the landowner to keep his land in cultivation for the benefit of the tithe owner. How can that be called a concession to the tithepayer? The noble Lord (Lord Cranborne) says, the only good reason for revision of tithe is to keep the land in cultivation, for it is directly to the disadvantage of the tithe owner that the land should go out of cultivation. Again the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge) says this proposal will no doubt for a time reduce the amount of the tithe on certain lands, but the reduction would in many cases lead to the full tithe being paid in future years. In other words hon. Members who have spoken on behalf of the tithe owner have made no secret of their real opinion, that this clause contains no concession to the tithepayer.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): The hon. Member is not quite right as regards what I said. I stated that I thought the Government had gone too far, and that the only defensible ground for action of this kind was to prevent land going out of cultivation.

MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: At all events, the noble Lord is of opinion that it is directly to the disadvantage of the tithe owner that the land should go out of cultivation, and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has told us that the object of this so-called concession is to keep the land in cultivation for the benefit of the tithe owners. That bears out my statement that there is no real concession in this clause. The tithepayers have claims upon the tithe owners for some concession. One of those claims is based upon the question of the corn averages. The amount of tithe payable is based upon the average price of British grown corn in the English market. It does not, however, pay the farmer to send in inferior samples of his corn. Only the best samples are sent in, and the result is that the corn average, and consequently the tithe average, is based upon the picked samples of the year's crop. In this way you get a fictitiously high tithe average. Reference has already been made to the question of rates. At the time of the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act the Tithe Commissioners were instructed to award to the tithe owners such a sum for the future as would equal the nett value of their receipts on the average of the previous seven years. In some cases the Commissioners added to the tithe a sufficient amount to enable the tithe owner to pay the rates, but as the rates were very high at that time the average amount added to the tithe in this respect was 10s. in the £1. Immediately upon the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act the new Poor Law came into operation; down went the rates, and ever since then the tithe owner has had the advantage of having a sum awarded to him equal to 10s. in the £1, although the amount of rates he is called upon to pay does not exceed 2s. in the £1. These constitute distinct claims which the tithepayer has upon the tithe owner. The only bargaining power the former has had in his hands is now being taken away by the Government without compensation. And not only do the Government take away the tithepayer's bargaining power, but they impose a very heavy fine of extra costs upon him, and compel the landlord to become the collector for the tithe owner. The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell) told us a few nights ago that in Yorkshire the tithe was so small in hundreds of cases that it was not worth while to collect it. Therefore you are imposing upon landowners the duty of collecting sums which the tithe owners in some cases have not thought it worth while to collect.

Then we have this instance—I do not like to say of bad faith—with regard to the buildings: When the Tithe Commutation Act was passed it was argued that the landlords would lay out their money more freely if the tithe owner had no claim upon the extra value imparted to property in consequence of increased expenditure on buildings. On the faith of the understanding then come to, money has been spent on buildings all over the country. Now you are providing that the tithe owner may take into the valuation buildings which have been put up by the landlord. This clause contains no concession whatever to the tithepayers. I would remind the House that the President of the Board of Agriculture (Mr. Chaplin) has made no remarks whatever upon the Bill, nor has the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. W. Long), a gentleman whose opinions on agricultural matters are much valued. I can only say that their silence on this matter is much more eloquent than any speech they could possibly make. For my part, as the representative of a constituency largely composed of tithepayers, I must decline to accept this so-called concession, which is no concession at all, and I shall vote for the omission of the clause.

(11.36.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The hon. Member who has just sat down, and some others, have so often alluded to me in the course of this Debate that I wish in one sentence to say why I support this clause. Whether the concession made by the clause be great or small, the Bill is undoubtedly more favourable to the tithepayer than it would be without the clause. After what has been said with such admirable clearness by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach) on the point, I do not think it is possible to dispute it. It is a matter of great surprise to me that representatives of the agricultural interest are about to oppose the clause. If I were still sitting in the place which I formerly occupied below the Gangway, and had to choose between the retention or omission of this clause, I should most unquestionably vote for its retention.

(11.38.) The House divided:—Ayes 170; Noes 109.—(Div. List, No. 52.)

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 26, after the word “payable,” to insert the words “exclusive of any costs incurred in the recovery thereof.”—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(11.52.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I beg to move, in page 3, lines 26 and 27, after the word “exceed,” to leave out the words “two-thirds of.” By this Motion I propose to restore the clause to the shape in which it stood in the two or three original Tithe Bills of the Government. Under those Bills power was given to the County Court to inquire whether the tithe exceeded the annual value of the land, and, if it did, a remission was given to that extent. Why the Government have backed out of that position I cannot understand. The position of the Prime Minister in the House of Lords was that he was anxious that the land should not be driven out of cultivation, and that would be the case if the tithe was in excess of the annual value. The moment the tithe is reduced so as to be on a level with the actual value of the land, there is no fear of the land being driven out of cultivation, and why the Government propose to go beyond that I cannot understand, unless it be for the purpose of bribing the landlords of the country to accept this measure. Something has been said about a quid pro quo, but there is nothing of the kind—there is no consideration given to the tithepayer. In the first clause of the Bill it is provided that the burden of paying the whole tithe shall be thrown on the landowner, even though there be a contract to the contrary. That means that 25 per cent of the value of the tithe is taken out of the pockets of the landowners, and transferred to the pockets of the tithe owners. It is stated that under this section one-third of the value of the tithe is taken out of the tithe and put into the pockets of the landowners as a sort of consideration for what they have been deprived of in the first section; but, as the hon. Member for Maldon has amply shown, this section will only apply to a very few instances, and in 99 cases out of 100 the landowner will be deprived of £2 per cent. of the tithe by having the burden of collecting it thrown on him, and will only get 15 per cent. in return. Why should one-third be taken from the tithe and put into the pocket of the landlord under this clause? Land in Wales is much inferior to land in the Eastern Counties; the tenants have to pay 15s. or £1 an acre for it, and they have to pay heavy railway rates to get the produce to market, and are then supposed to compete with the farmers in the Eastern Counties. If land is driven out of cultivation in the Eastern Counties it is often the fault of the landlords themselves. Why is land in the Eastern counties at present uncultivated? It is because the policy of large farms has been adopted. Small holdings, on the other hand, can be cultivated at a profit. I know a farm of 200 acres which could not be cultivated so as to make even the tithe; but the owner let it to labourers in small holdings at £2 an acre, and they are making an excellent thing of it. I do not see why bad landlords who have mismanaged their land and starved the tenants out of their holdings should receive one-third of the annual value in order to induce them to accept the Bill, whilst good landlords who manage to keep their tenants on the farm, and keep them in a tolerably good condition, get nothing but the burden of 25 per cent. cast on them by the Bill. The Government have introduced so many and so contradictory Bills, that I cannot understand why they should be in such a difficulty with regard to this. The arguments which have been used in support of one Bill can always be effectually quoted in favour of its successor. The noble Lord the Member for Darwen who represents the clerical party in this House, and who acted as a sort of adviser to the Government in this House, pledged himself against diminishing the interests of the clergy, yet now he is found marching through the Lobby in favour of reducing that very interest by one-third. I should like to know the reason why hon. Gentlemen opposite change their minds, and why they should treat as dishonest in 1890 that which they accept as honest in 1889. Is it that they are ready to sacrifice to political and party expediency that which they will not sacrifice in the interests of the community at large? Another Member who has always supported the interests of the clerical party is the hon. Member for East Bradford (Mr. H. Byron Reed). That hon. Member has not been so constant in his attendance since the reduction by one-third. When speaking in support of the Bill of 1889, the hon. Member for East Bradford, after expressing a sort of sentimental sympathy for the tenant farmers, said—

“That a contract is a contract, an agreement is an agreement, and that the bargain between the land owners and the tithepayers in 1836 must be adhered to, and the tithepayer must be prepared to take the rough with the smooth.”

In 1891 the hon. Member opposes that view by voting for the reduction of the tithe property by one-third. I submit that that is grossly inconsistent. What becomes of the charges of confiscation? We are continually reminded about the Ten Commandments, and about the necessity of inculcating the decalogue among Radical Members of this House. But to apply the Ten Commandments to the tenant farmers of Wales is to be told that we intend to rob the Church. It is a very different thing when the landlord takes his one-third. Then the Ten Commandments are entirely forgotten. They are not a question of ethics, but a question of objects altogether. They have rolled the Ten Commandments into one: “Thou shalt keep thy contracts,” and there the “thou” is to apply to the occupier, and is not to tend to the landowner by any means whatever. From whatever point of view we regard this, whether from that of the clerical tithe owners as one class of the community, or of a class which does nothing, or of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester and others, who regard this as national property, I submit that there is no reason at all why we should rob the whole country for the sake of a few landlords.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 26, to leave out the words "two-thirds of."—(Mr. Lloyd-George).

Question proposed, "That the words 'two-thirds of' stand part of the Bill."

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: As this question has been discussed at length more than once, I hope hon. Members will not think it necessary to discuss the decalogue, political morality, and the respective merits of large farming in Essex and small farming in Wales. The object of the clause is to secure to the owner of the land something which will give him sufficient interest in the land to keep it in cultivation. That cannot be fairly called robbing the owner of the tithe, because it is his interest as well as the landlord's that the land shall be kept in cultivation.

*(12.12.) MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I should not have intervened in this Debate, but for the observations which have been made with regard to myself personally. There was not a grain of argument in the mass of rhetorical chaff which the hon. Gentleman addressed to the House. As far as the rhetoric went, it was to the effect that there was a discrepancy between this Bill and previous Bills introduced by the Government—a discrepancy against the tithe owner and in favour of the tithepayer. That is to say, the hon. Member complains of the Government having, under great pressure, made concessions to the party which he represents. For those concessions hon. Members opposite now prove themselves ungrateful, and I venture to think that the Front Bench on this side of the House should take note of the way in which their efforts at conciliation are received by hon. Members on the other side.

*(12.14.) MR. S. T. EVANS: Sir, I had not intended to speak until the hon. Member addressed the House. I am rather sorry that he has not been able to grasp the argument of my hon. Friend which was clearly stated. His argument was not that the Government was inconsistent, but that the hon. Member had swallowed the principles he previously professed. Two years ago the hon. Member for East Bradford proclaimed the sacredness of contract, that a bargain once made ought never to be changed. Now the hon. Member is a supporter of the Church, while we on this side regard tithe as national property which we object to see whittled down. The hon. Member, however, though champion of the Church, is really, for party purposes, making ethics dependant upon objects, and he is going to rob the present holders of tithe of one-third of their property to put it into the pockets of the landlords.

(12.24.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I now beg to move in page 4, line 7, after Sub-section (2) insert—

"For the purposes of this section the owner of tithe rent-charge shall have the same right of appeal as the owner of lands, whether under the enactments relating to the said assessment or under this section."

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: There is no objection to that.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 14, after Sub-section 3, to insert the following sub-section—

"If either the tithe owner or the owner or occupier of the said lands is dissatisfied with the said assessment, he may appeal to the county court for the district in which the said lands are situate, and the county court may, after such service upon the owner and occupier of the said lands and the said surveyor of taxes as may be prescribed, appoint a valuer to determine such annual value, and his valuation shall be final upon the matter."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope the hon. Member will not press that Amendment, as it is not possible that I can accept it, as it would entail a double hearing, and would afford no advantage over what is already provided for.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Then I will ask leave to withdraw this Amendment, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment which stands next upon the Paper.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I shall be able to accept it with a slight modification, which I will explain when it is moved.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 17, after Sub-section (4) to insert the following sub-section:—"Where a special apportionment has been made in pursuance of Section 58 of 'The Tithe Act, 1836,' whereby tithe rent-charge has been charged specially upon certain closes of land in different proportions, and to the exclusion of certain of them, the court shall not grant a remission under this section unless satisfied that the applicant would have been entitled to such remission if no such special apportionment had been made."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I propose to insert words which will make the sub-section more clear, and will obviate the extensive litigation that might otherwise arise. I would, therefore, amend the proposed Amendment by adding in the first line, after the word "where," the words "It appears from any award that."

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I will accept that Amendment, which I think is very reasonable.

Amendment to proposed Amendment agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not think that the Amendments already accepted by the Government give a right of appeal in any action or matter arising out of the recovery by distress of tithe rent-charge, and I certainly cannot understand why any distinction should be drawn between an action in the first instance and one arising out of distraint. I have no doubt there will be several actions involving very complicated points of law, and I think this section will become inoperative unless the words I suggest are added.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 27, after the word "Act," to insert the words "or in any action or matter arising out of any proceedings for the recovery of tithe rent-charge under this Act or the Tithe Acts."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(12.33.) SIR R. WEBSTER: It is impossible to accept the Amendment. No new jurisdiction is being created which will necessitate the Amendment, and the ordinary rules of appeal will apply in cases which do not arise under this Bill. The principle the Government act upon is this that, except in cases of new jurisdiction, matters shall be left as they are. This Amendment would alter the County Courts law in respect of actions of replevin, simply because they may arise in tithe cases. I hope the House will at once decide this point and not further discuss it.

(12.45.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg now to move the adjournment of the Debate. Seeing that to-morrow the House has to meet to discuss the marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, there is no reason why the officers should be detained here longer to-night. We know that the Government have power to put this Bill down whenever they choose. There are still some important matters relative to costs to be considered, and I think in the extra two hours they will have to-morrow for attending church, they would do well to try and agree to some reasonable arrangement.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, be now adjourned."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

*(12.46.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope the hon. Member will not press this Motion. There are only two Amendments remaining on the Paper, and for some little time past the discussion has been proceeding in a spirit which shows the desire of hon. Members to arrive at the conclusion of this stage. I am endeavouring to meet their wishes so far as I can, and may I point out that if the Report of the Bill is finished to-night there need be no further interference with the rights of private Members.

*(12.47.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I think the Government ought to gratefully accept the proposal of the hon. Member, as it will afford them time to reconsider their position, for considerable confusion appears to prevail in their minds on several points which we have had to discuss at great length. If the Bill were re-committed some Amendments might be introduced with very great advantage.

(12.48.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: There are two Amendments which I am afraid it will take some time to discuss unless the Government give us an undertaking with regard to the costs. I understood the Attorney General to pledge himself that a rule shall be made securing that in undefended cases no solicitors' costs whatsoever shall be charged. Will the hon. and learned Gentleman agree to incorporate such a rule in a clause in the Bill? Of course I do not doubt that he will adhere to his undertaking, but I want to point out that when the rules come up for discussion we cannot deal with them in detail: we shall have to accept or reject them as a whole. But if the hon. and learned Member will insert this particular rule in the Bill I think we can complete the Report stage to-night.

*(12.50.) SIR R. WEBSTER: If the hon. Member wishes to have on the face of the Bill the fact that rules, dealing with undefended cases, will be made I have no objection. But I think my undertaking ought to have been sufficient, for it is a most unusual practice to put, say, half a dozen rules on the face of an Act of Parliament. The words of the rules which I have read are clear, that the costs of employing a solicitor will not be allowed in any case in which no notice of defence is entered and in cases in which there is such notice they will only be allowed for work done subsequent to such notice. Again, witnesses' costs will not be allowed in any case where the tithepayer has not given notice of defence.

*(12.51.) MR. S. T. EVANS: As the question of costs was raised upon my Amendment, I may perhaps be allowed to point out that if such rules are put in the Bill they cannot be altered without the Bill being repealed; but if they are not so incorporated they might be changed in a few months. For this reason I shall be glad if the Attorney General will agree to the incorporation of the Rules in the Bill.

*(12.52.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It shall be done.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Move.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It can be done in another place.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Under these circumstances, I do not propose to move the remaining Amendments on the Paper.

MR. T. M. HEALY: And I, of course, withdraw the Motion to adjourn the Debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

1 Schedule brought up, and read the first and second time, and added.

Bill to be read the third time upon Thursday.

FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary Matthews, Bill to amend the Law relating to Factories and Workshops, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Ritchie, and Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

Bill presented, and read first time, [Bill 205.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 11th February, 1891.

Mr. SPEAKER took the Chair at Two of the clock, but a House was not made till 2.50.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.—(No. 9.)

SECOND READING.

(2.50.) Mr. J. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): This Bill has been before the Houses constantly, and the arguments that have been used on the one side and the other are so worn and threadbare, that I do not feel it necessary on this occasion to trouble the House at any great length with what I have to advance in its favour. I may say, however, in reference to the particular measure for which I now ask a Second Reading, that the proposal it contains has year by year more and more obtained the favour of this House, until some two or three years ago its supporters achieved a greater majority in favour of the Bill than was ever before known under a Conservative Administration. That majority rose in the following year to 50, and was still further increased in the succeeding year to 70. I think, therefore, that hon. Members who support this measure have ground for congratulation in the fact that year after year the opposition to the Bill has become more and more feeble. The mode by which it is proposed to alter the present law is that which has been put forward over and over again in the measures introduced to this House, and amounts simply to a declaration that a marriage which has long been, and is still, very common in this country shall be declared valid in the only country in the world in which it is not valid at the present moment. We acknowledge that the question is one on which there may be, and undoubtedly is, great divergency of opinion, and we do not desire in rendering these marriages valid to do violence to the feelings or prejudices of anyone. Still less do we wish compulsorily to override the scruples which we know to be entertained on this subject by the great majority of the ministers of that Church to which most of us belong. Consequently, while we urge that those of our brethren who wish to contract these marriages should be allowed to do so in their own Churches, as every son and daughter of the Church ought to be permitted to do, we nevertheless shrink from attempting in any proposal for altering the existing Marriage Law to put pressure on the ministers of the Church by insisting that they shall take part in these marriage ceremonials. The other portions of the Bill relate to matters with which the House is already familiar. For instance, we decline to alter the law in cases of misconduct with the sister of the deceased wife. Taking the Bill as a whole, it is as short and simple as any measure on this subject could well be. Having said this, I will now offer a few words in reference to the history of this question. Hon. Members are well aware that for centuries marriages of this kind were perfectly legal in this country. At any rate, from 1603 down to 1835 these marriages were constantly celebrated in all places of worship throughout this country; and there can be no doubt about the fact that this House, and even the opponents of the Bill, have recognised their validity, because, when the Act of 1835 was passed, it was enacted that all marriages up to that date should be considered valid and legal contracts of marriage. Therefore, even the opponents of the Bill can hardly contend that there is anything unnatural in the measure. I think that the law would never have been altered in 1835 had it been possible to have found any person who was interested in maintaining it. Of course, when every marriage which up to that time had been solemnised was declared to be legal, there was not a single individual who could have had any direct or indirect interest in the marriages of the future. Consequently, that Act was passed under circumstances which rendered opposition almost impossible. Nevertheless, I think that the law which existed before the passing of that Act was to some extent unsatisfactory, and that we should not at the present time be justified in going back to it; inasmuch as it was open to either of the contracting parties to terminate the contract. This gave the opportunity to a bad man who had married his deceased wife's sister to contract a third marriage with somebody else, thereby conferring the rights of legitimacy upon a stranger and her children during the lifetime of the second wife and of the children he might have had by her. But we do not ask in this Bill merely a recognition of the legality of the marriage with the deceased wife's sister; we ask for something more. We ask that the marriage shall not only be valid as between the parties but that it shall be valid also as against the whole world. This is the difference we ask the House to sanction as between the law before 1835 and the law as it now stands. I would here point out that these marriages are celebrated at the present moment, and have been celebrated for years, under the sanction of the English Law, in this sense—that the English Government, under the sanction of the Crown, has assented to the Colonial Law which has made all these marriages legal. This has been the case for more than a quarter of a century, and as it is one of those cases in which the Crown has reserved to itself every sort of right, no alteration could have been made in the Marriage Law of the colonies without the express sanction of the Crown. The opponents of the Bill know, as well as I do, that this kind of marriage is in all our colonies as good as any other. Throughout the whole of the Continent of Australia no difference is recognised or known in either colony as between these and other marriages; and, beyond this, there are other colonies in which such marriages have been legalised for more than 40 years. A law validating marriages with the deceased wife's sister in Ceylon was passed in the year 1847. A similar law has been enacted in Canada, Barbadoes, Bermuda, and other portions of our Empire, while in India, except as far as the Church of England people are concerned, the law is practically what it is in the Australian Colonies. It is an acknowledged fact that while every man in India who happens to be a Roman Catholic may validly contract this marriage, it is not valid in the case of a Protestant. This, I think, is the difference which is not very creditable to us. I have said that these marriages are valid in all our colonies; but I will go further than that, and say they are valid throughout the entire civilised world, this country being the only one which treats them as no marriages at all, and brands the children of such marriages as bastards. In the case of the Roman Catholics it is true that this kind of marriage is against the Canon Law of their Church; nevertheless, the Roman Catholic Church has long recognised the necessity of such marriages, and the heads of that Church have always been willing to grant dispensation whenever any good or sufficient reason has been advanced in favour of their so doing. Moreover, the Church has not only granted dispensations in this matter, but it has also granted them habitually where there has not been immorality, and they have been granted free of charge, under the idea that the poor have more need of these marriages than any other class of the community. Now, Sir, I venture to assume, and I think rightly, that the great majority of the people of this country are in favour of the alteration of the law which this Bill would bring about. I think I may say that our colonial brethren not only look with approval on such a change as we propose, but they demand, and have a good right to demand, it. There have been instances in this country of distinguished men who have come back from the colonies after having contracted these marriages, and who having found, to their bitter indignation, that their wives have been treated with contumely and contempt, have returned to their old homes in the colonies.

severing all ties with England, in order that those wives might hold the position which was their due, and that their children might not be branded with the frightful stigma of illegitimacy. Touching upon another point, I would remark that there is no class of people in the world in which there is more unanimity of opinion in favour of this Bill than exists among the working class, and I may add that there is no direct representative of labour in this House who ever has, or ever will, vote against this Bill. At the recent Trades Union Conference held in Liverpool some persons interested in the subject took the trouble to ascertain the views of 450 delegates, male and female, representing a million and a half of working people, on this question of the Marriage Law, and it is a singular testimony in favour of this measure that out of the whole number of delegates only one solitary individual was found who was opposed to the change we are asking the House to make. The infinitesimal number of eight expressed themselves as having no strong views upon the subject either way, and the remainder were in favour of our Bill. I think I may fairly rely upon this fact as furnishing sufficient evidence that the working classes generally look upon the measure at least with approval. Indeed, I think it would be strange were it not so, because the alteration we propose in the law is one that will prove of vital importance to the poor, in the sense of its being a step towards the removal of a legal restriction which operates in one way with the rich, and in a totally different manner with the poor. I may here say that I have myself no personal interest in this matter. I do not know a single living person who has contracted such a marriage. But I have heard of one who contracted the marriage, and who was subsequently High Sheriff of his county, and who, with his wife, was received everywhere, as if the marriage was the same marriage as that which he had contracted with his first wife. I have known cases in which at school the children of poor parents who had contracted such marriages, were pointed at by other children and called bastards. I say the law is one for the rich and one for the poor. The rich man may go—and it not unfrequently happens—abroad, or to any one of our colonies, and contract such a marriage, but when the poor man desires to celebrate the marriage the clergy absolutely refuse him. Consequently, if the poor man does marry his deceased wife's sister, it is looked upon as a mere form. We of the middle classes make no sort of distinction between the second and first wife in these cases, and there is none, I venture to think, who would dare to do it. The law is wrong in the sense that it is set at defiance with the connivance and almost the approval of society. The case of the poor is very different. The rich man has not the same temptations. He has a large household, a retinue of servants, and nurses, and governesses for his children. He is not necessarily thrown frequently into the society of his deceased wife's sister if she is looking after his children. The poor man's position is totally different. Nine-tenths of poor families live in two rooms, and in such cases it is a choice between immorality and a marriage which is not recognised. This Bill would remove the difficulties of many a virtuous girl who wishes to take care of the children of her deceased sister. It would make the position of a young and innocent girl far safer than it is now. In the case of a young and handsome woman who takes charge of her deceased sister's children, it is idle to say that the breath of scandal does not now often rest upon her. I myself have no sort of doubt about it, that if the breath of scandal is not to rest upon the girl who gives up her life and even prospects of marriage for the purpose of devoting herself to the children of her dead sister, her position would be far safer if the law were altered in accordance with the provisions of this Bill. I noticed that the Member for Oxford University laughed very much when I talked about the numbers of these marriages. I admit frankly that I have not exact data on which to go. In 1847, it was admitted by the Commission that it was almost impossible to get the number of these marriages among the poor, but from 1835 to 1847 they put the number at 500 a year. The population then was about half what it is now, and I think the assumption that the number of such marriages is now 1,000 a year is more than justified. In France they have obtained statistics with reference to marriages of that kind, and in the large towns, where I venture to think the French people are not noted for their morality, they find that these marriages, the population being of very similar extent to ours, number about 1,000 a year. I think the House, therefore, will feel that I am justified in my assumption, that there can be very little doubt the number is 1,000 a year. I should note this point, that in France two dispensations are required—one from the civil authorities and one from the Catholic Church, and these go to show that there is a very large number of these marriages year by year. Now, about the thin-end-of-the-wedge argument, for which I confess a very hearty contempt. I never knew of an instance in which a well grounded reform was advocated, but this argument was trotted forth. It is trotted out now. But is it a fact that those who urge this change in the law also desire a further change in the marriage law, and wish to see marriage with a deceased husband's brother? That was never a valid marriage in this country. And all we ask by this Bill is that marriages once common in this country shall be declared valid. We have never asked, we do not intend to ask, nor have we ever had a single word in our Bill to warrant the assertion that marriages which were never valid in this country shall now be declared valid. If there is any doubt about that, when the Division occurs on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Crewe, it will be seen whether those who support the Second Reading of this Bill have no sympathy with his proposition. I would point out that marriage with a deceased wife's sister has been legal for 20 years in South Australia, and for 17 years in some of the other Australian Colonies. And in reference to the social argument which is used against us, we have never heard that society in the Colonies has suffered by the changes which took place in their law, nor have we any right to say that such changes have been prejudicial to society. If they had we should have heard of it a long time ago. The absence of any suggestion of such a prejudicial change, in my opinion, and I believe in the opinion of the House, goes a very long way—that if we took the steps taken 30 years ago in such Colonies, we should have no reason to fear the prejudicial change which is used as an argument by our opponents. Now, with reference to the attitude of the Church. It has been always a favourite theory of those who are opposed to this Bill that those who are in favour of it cannot represent any section of the Church whatever. No doubt it is the fact that this Bill would have been passed years and years ago, but for the attitude taken by the Bishops in another place. I very much regret that action. Still, I would remind the House that there have been distinguished Prelates very much in favour of it. Among them I would cite Bishop Lonsdale, who presided over the Commission in 1847; and later, the distinguished Prelate who recently resigned the See of Worcester, who, in another place, never failed to vote or pair in favour of the Bill. The Primate of all Ireland is not only in favour of it, but has been an eloquent advocate of it. If I had time I could name between 20 and 30, some of them most eminent members of the Anglican Church, who have steadily and uniformly advocated a change of the law. I do not deny that one section of the Church, High Churchmen, are strongly against this Bill; but it is a curious thing that I have no personal knowledge of opposition in the Church, except on the part of High Churchmen. I received a letter from a distinguished Prelate of the Church of England in the City of London, who, so strong is his feeling on the subject, told me that if I did not abandon my support of the measure, he would take action against me at the next election. The day before yesterday I had another letter from a minister of the Church of England, who reminded me of our acquaintance in 1855, when I was 11 years of age, and who upon the strength of that early friendship asked me to abandon my position. On the other hand, it is a fact that there are clergymen in favour of the measure. A clergyman, exceedingly well known in connection with public movements, the Rev. Hugh G. Chapman, has told me over and over again that he is strongly in favour of an alteration of the law on this subject. There is a difference of opinion among the clergy. To those who say that the Church is practically unanimous against this Bill, I reply that there are few of the more liberal-minded of our clergy who are not in favour of it. I decline to treat this question as one affecting the Church rather than society. We do not go back to the Old Testament for our marriage laws in these days, and I think it high time we dropped discussing the meaning of a marginal note in Leviticus. It has often been said that the agitation in favour of the alteration of the law has been undertaken on behalf of a few interested wealthy people. That statement is absolutely without foundation. It is in the interests of the poor rather than of the rich, of the working classes rather than of the upper and middle classes, that I wish to see this change effected. Why should the innocent be punished bitterly for the sin of their parents—if it be a sin. I appeal to the House not to overlook the position of the children of the marriages which this Bill will make lawful. At present a stigma rests upon them, and they are made to suffer for the sin, if there is a sin, of their parents. Why should they be branded with a brand, which when they grow up almost makes them think that they had better have never been born. Upon what grounds are you to continue this stigma upon them. Is it in the cause of religion? I say that religion has not suffered in our Australian Colonies, and will not suffer in England if you make this change, which is demanded not only by those who suffer, but also in the name of Christianity, enlightenment, and civilisation. I appeal to the House to again read this Bill a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(3.25.) MR. A. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to move as an Amendment that this Bill be read a second time this day six months. Although I am aware that the arguments for and against it have already been thoroughly threshed out in former years, yet I must ask the House to bear with me a few moments while I repeat them. My hon. Friend has just said that the country is with him in favour of this Bill. I deny that altogether, and I say that the country is thoroughly apathetic on the subject, and so, too, is this House, for that is indicated pretty clearly by the fact that for three quarters of an hour to-day a House could not be made. The measure has been before the country for no less than 50 years. Surely, if the country really desired that it should become law it would have been passed long ago. There is, in fact, no strong feeling on the subject. And as to the Bill having passed this House many times, I may point out it has been introduced 19 times in this House, and only six times has it passed through the House. Four times it has been thrown out by a majority, and the remaining times it has been withdrawn in Committee. These facts should be borne in mind by those who declare that the Bill has passed through the House many times. The greatest majority ever recorded in favour of the Bill was in 1869, when it was 99, and since that year the majority has decreased. This year I hope it will be still further diminished. There is no agitation in support of the measure; we do not hear of meetings held to advocate it, and Members are seldom asked by their constituents to vote for it. The fact is, the public are apathetic on the subject. Few people have asked for it at all, and one great body, whose opinion has not been sufficiently considered—the women of England, Scotland, and Ireland—are opposed to the measure, and have held meetings to protest against it. The late Miss Lydia Becker wrote many articles in opposition to this proposed alteration of the law, and many other well-known women have written on the same side, pointing out how disastrous its adoption would be to home life, and how it would prevent girls who had no homes of their own from going to live with a brother-in-law. If the Bill is passed the sister of a man's deceased wife will either not be able to live with her brother-in-law and his children, or she would be compelled to contract what, to her, might be a most distasteful marriage. The Bill will abolish the maiden aunt and introduce the stepmother in her place. But my principal objection to the Bill is that it will unsettle the whole of our Marriage Law, which has been handed down from ages and has prevailed ever since the introduction of Christianity into this country. The hon. Gentleman has said that what he proposes was the law up to 1835. It was nothing of the sort. Occasionally these marriages were contracted, but it was possible for either party to have them annulled by going before the Ecclesiastical Court. In 1835 the Lyndhurst Act was passed to settle the matter once for all, and to say that such marriages were void instead of voidable. These marriages have always been looked upon with the greatest disgust and distrust in this country. If the hon. Member will look into his Shakespeare he will see that the marriage of Hamlet's mother is called incestuous and horrible, and such has always been the feeling with regard to such marriages. The hon. Gentleman has said that the Churches are not against the Bill. The Established Churches of England and of Scotland are opposed to the Bill, and the Roman Catholic Church is also opposed to it, although dispensations may be granted. It is perfectly evident that the Churches are totally against the Bill. I will not enter into the Biblical argument, as that is so well-known. The hon. Gentleman appeared to sneer at what he called the thin-end-of-the-wedge argument; but that is an argument which must be used. We must look to what has been done in other countries. In America and in certain parts of Australia marriage with a deceased wife's sister is allowed; then it came to pass that a man might marry his niece, and ultimately, in the United States, the law was so extended that anybody might marry anybody who was not a blood relation. In 1855 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made a most energetic and eloquent speech against a similar Bill, and he made use of the thin-end-of-the-wedge argument, for he said—

“That by assenting to this measure we should be opening a flood-gate which no earthly power could shut, and introducing principles which would not admit of limitation.”

That is exactly our point. We say you cannot stop at this. If you allow this, why not allow a widow to marry her brother-in-law? In the same Debate Lord Selborne made a great speech against the Bill, and he still carries on his opposition to it. If a man can marry anybody who is not a blood relation, it may be the case that, having married a widow with daughters, who come to live with them, the man, after the death of that widow, may actually marry one of her daughters. In the States of the American Union, as a matter of fact, it has happened that after his wife's death a man has married his step-daughter. That is repugnant to all right feeling. The effect of the relaxation of the Marriage Law is bad in many ways. In the United States divorces have increased to an enormous extent. In San Francisco the divorces, as compared with the marriages, were in one year as one to five, in Colorado as one to three, in Kansas as one to 12. Surely that is a horrible state of affairs. Only in two countries in Europe does this law prevail—Prussia and Holland. In other countries they have to get a dispensation which it is often difficult to obtain; but in some way a man can get a dispensation to marry his own niece or his aunt, and it has been done in our own day. In the year 1792 France passed a law such as the hon. Gentleman proposes; but on account of the trouble it brought in families and the increase of unhappiness and of divorces, Napoleon, 13 years after, actually repealed it. Thus it was a failure in France. No doubt this law is in force in the colonies, but that is no argument. If the colonies, as younger people, set us a bad example, we, as older people, ought not to follow it. Why do we not follow their example with regard to protective laws? Hon. Gentlemen opposite will not say that we ought to do so. A Colonial Conference was held in 1887; and representatives of Australia, Canada, and the Cape were drawn together; but although the representatives of some colonies asked that our law on this question should be made similar to theirs, the representatives of Canada, Newfoundland, and the Cape all said that, though they had for their particular interests made this law, they would not ask the Mother Country to alter her law. The representative of South Australia said that in his colony it was practically a dead letter, as such marriages scarcely ever occurred there; and Sir J. Fergusson, who had been Governor of the colony, stated that the measure was passed in opposition to the whole religious convictions of the colony, and that there was not at that moment one clergyman of the Church of England there who would celebrate such a marriage. It has been used as an argument in favour of the Bill that people domiciled in the colonies contract these marriages, and when they come home they find that the marriages are not recognised as legal. But that is not strictly accurate. Lord Cairns has said that if a man who is domiciled in a colony where such a marriage is lawful, and his sister-in-law, who is also domiciled there, have contracted marriage with one another in the colony, it will be considered a legal marriage in this country. But no doubt it is illegal for a person to go out to the colonies simply to contract such a marriage. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian that this Bill is the thin end of the wedge. The law, if passed, would break up many homes and bring jealousy and distrust into many a domestic circle. Who is a more natural guardian of the children of the dead wife than her sister, who has probably lived with her for many years? I have known cases in which the sister has taken care of the deceased wife's children without scandal or reproach under the honoured name of sister-in-law. I ask the House to pause before putting such a woman in an invidious position. Why should a sister-in-law, who may have no home but that of her brother-in-law, who is willing that she should remain in the same relation as before, be turned adrift in the world? At present, as we know, sisters-in-law do live with their brothers-in-law, and no one points the finger of scorn at them. Those men who wish to marry their deceased wife's sister must be very few, and why should harm be done to the many in order to benefit the few? If you are going to alter the law on account of a man who knowingly transgresses it, why do you not alter the law on account of a man who has committed bigamy? The hon. Member who moved the Second Reading of the Bill said that the proposed alteration in the law was desired by the poor rather than by the rich, but in my opinion this alteration is desired by the rich rather than by the poor. The late Lord Hatherley took the trouble to go into this subject thoroughly. He had examined very carefully the state of things that existed in connection with this subject in two parishes close to Westminster, and he found that out of a total population of 60,000, which included 40,000 poor, only one case of a marriage with a deceased wife's sister had occurred. The Royal Commission which sat to inquire into this question in 1848 reported that whereas in the 13 preceding years 1,608 marriages of this kind took place amongst the rich, only 40 took place amongst the poor during the same period. I trust that the House, before they take a momentous and deplorable step, before they assent to a measure of this kind becoming law, will endeavour to ascertain the feelings of the women of England, Ireland, and Scotland with regard to it. I ask the House to consider what misery and unhappiness will be carried into many domestic circles if this Bill becomes law, and to hesitate before thus injuring the domestic homes of this country. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Jeffreys.)

(3.48.) MR. HALL (Oxford): I rise to second the Amendment. I am sure the House owes a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. Gentleman who has moved the Second Reading of the Bill for the ability he has displayed in dressing up the old arguments by which measures of this kind are usually supported. The hon. Gentleman told the House that these marriages have been regarded as being valid for centuries. My own notion, on the contrary, is that the universal voice of Christendom has always condemned such marriages. The hon. Gentleman then proceeded to assume that the majority of the people of this country are in favour of this Bill; but the fact that so few out of the whole number of Members of the House take sufficient interest in the subject to enable a quorum to be made for three-quarters of an hour after the usual hour for commencing business is a sufficient answer to the assertion of the hon. Gentleman. The truth is that this is a question in which the constituencies take absolutely no interest. Of the five elections I have contested in the last 20 years no single creature has said a word to me on the subject of this Bill. There is no public opinion in favour of, nor popular demand for, this Bill, and it is put forward in the interest of a class only. There is, indeed, a persistent class demand for it. A certain minority of men take a view of the status of marriage very different from that taken by the law of England and by the universal voice of Christendom. They desire to alter the law to suit their views. I believe if there is any subject to which the old saying—quod semper, quod ubique, quod omnibus—applies, it is that of the Marriage Laws of this country. What is the root and idea of marriage to an ordinary Englishman? Surely it is the oneness of a man and his wife. If that idea be false, by all means pass this Bill. You will be logical in doing so; but if it be true, and if this measure is permitted to become law, marriage will degenerate from a status of sacred union to that of a mere civil contract. No one disputes the proposition that the deceased wife's sister is the proper person to take charge of the children of the marriage; but that is no reason that the widower should be allowed to marry his deceased wife's sister. On the contrary, by altering the law you will be preventing the majority of widowers from being able to ask their deceased wife's sisters to act as the guardians of their motherless children. It is very difficult to find anything fresh to be said upon this subject. But there is one aspect which I think has been overlooked. I believe that the passing of this Bill will jeopardise one of the most beautiful traits of English family life—the sweet confidence of sisters one towards the other. Hitherto the younger sister has clung to her elder sister, and has been as a sister to her sister's husband. If you pass this Bill you will, even if you do not destroy that trait, put it in considerable jeopardy. The experience of other countries on this subject shows that the change in the law now proposed would work most unsatisfactorily, and that it would lead to a degradation of the marriage status. In the Colony of Victoria the statutory term of a matrimonial contract is three years, and absence during that period constitutes a valid reason for putting an end to the partnership. We do not want to come to anything of that sort in this country. A mere partnership! Is that what the sacred notion of English married life is to come to? In parts of Connecticut the ratio of divorces to marriages is one to seven, and in one of the other States it is one to three. What does all this mean? I do not think it means that these people are greater sinners than others, but that their root idea of married life has come to be different from ours, and that, whilst our idea is that marriage is a sacred union, their idea is that it is a contract tending more and more to become one of a temporary character. The House ought not to pass this Bill out of pure good nature to accommodate a few, but it ought to consider the far-reaching consequences, which go deep down into English family life. Of course, you can Americanise, you can Continentalise, and you can abolish all your Marriage Laws, but think of the terrible responsibility you incur. It is true that nowadays men do not care much for the decrees of Churches; but, at all events, Parliament ought not to indulge in legislation for which there is no popular demand whatever, when confessedly such legislation involves the heavy responsibility of contravening the root idea of married life in this country. I beg to second the Amendment.

(4.5.) MR. W. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): Although I also rise to oppose the Second Reading of this Bill, I do so from a very different point of view to that of the hon. Gentleman opposite. The point of view which leads me to offer the Bill my opposition is stated in the Amendment which I placed on the Paper, but which, unfortunately, the Forms of the House will not permit me to move. That Amendment is—"That this House is unwilling to pass a measure which, while it has for its object the alteration of the law that now prohibits marriages in certain cases, does not deal equally with both the husband and the wife, but gives to the husband a privilege with regard to his wife's sisters which it denies to the wife with regard to her husband's brothers."

The hon. Members who had precedence of me preferred that the Division should take place on the direct negative. I am not greatly concerned to disagree with the speech of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Kelly) who moved the Second Reading. A great deal of what he said was true, and I confess that although I have no desire to change the law, still, if the Bill were a fair and equal Bill, I should not offer any opposition to it. Still, the hon. Member for Camberwell did very considerably over-colour his picture, and in some of his statements was guilty of very remarkable inconsistencies. He told us how colonists, who had made marriages with the deceased wife's sister, which were legal in the colonies, were affronted when they came over here, and went home embittered because they had been looked upon in English society as living in concubinage. He also told us of a High Sheriff, whose wife—his deceased wife's sister—was received into society and regarded as properly married. I think those statements were inconsistent. The hon. Gentleman declares that the working classes are overwhelmingly in favour of the Bill. The working classes cannot be strongly in favour of this Bill if they look with disfavour upon a working man who has contracted one of these marriages, and if his children are pointed at at school as being bastards. The fact that people have broken the law is not a reason why the law should be amended for their convenience. I should not oppose the Bill if it maintained the principle of equality between the husband and wife which has always existed in reference to these matters. At present the law is absolutely equal between husband and wife, and neither is allowed to marry into the family of the other. The Bill will change the existing equality, and it will give to the husband, in case of his wife's death, a privilege with regard to his sisters-in-law which it denies to the wife in the case of the husband's death with regard to her brothers-in-law. It has been said that the Bill will create jealousy as between a wife and her sisters. I think there are cases in which that jealousy will be created. The wife would dislike to have sisters in the house on free and sisterly terms, and, if the Bill made the law equal, what would the husband say with regard to his brothers? A former Member of this House said—

"If it was possible for my widow to marry one of my brothers, I would not let a brother come into the house again."

Yet you are putting all the wives of the country into a position which a Member of that House said he would not tolerate for himself. Lord J. Russell denounced a Bill which, like this, created injustice as between husband and wife. The supporters of the Bill do not say, "Let us pass this Bill, and then pass a Bill legalising marriage with a deceased husband's brother." On the contrary, the hon. Member for Camberwell is bitterly opposed to any such extension of the law. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) is equally opposed to my view. In a letter which the right hon. Gentleman wrote condemnatory of my action a couple of years ago, when I moved an Instruction to the Committee, he stated he was opposed on principle to allowing a widow to marry her deceased husband's brother. But he has never stated what that principle is, and I ask him to do so now. It is perfectly clear that this Bill is not to be regarded, in the minds of its supporters, as a stepping-stone to an equal and just state of the law. Some Members have been good enough to tell me that if I would only support this Bill what I desire would necessarily follow. That is not my view, as founded on experience. Take the analogous case of the Divorce Law. That is not equal as between husband and wife; it gives the husband power to get a divorce for reasons for which it does not give the wife power to get a divorce. There is no attempt to remedy that defect and injustice. So it will be if this Bill passes in its present form; Parliament will not be likely to remove the inequality afterwards. It is estimated, I believe, that for every 100 marriages with a deceased wife's sister there are four with a deceased husband's brother. There is not the smallest reason why, if an amendment of the law is to be made, it should not be made to cover both classes, because it is as great a hardship for the children to be bastards in the one case as in the other. Although, as I admit, there is a considerable body of public opinion in favour of the Bill, I am certain that if it were generally known that the Bill is of a one-sided character there would be considerable opposition to it. I earnestly impress upon the House that in assenting to the Second Reading hon. Members will be adopting in principle a measure which is unjust and unfair, which cannot be regarded as a settlement of the question, and which, in my opinion, every one who is desirous to see equal justice as between husband and wife should strenuously oppose.

(4.15.) LORD W. GORDON LENNOX (Sussex, Chichester): I am anxious to oppose this Bill, because I believe it will strike a blow at the very foundation of our social morality. Who really wants the Bill? The Mover of the Second Reading naturally trotted out the old argument that the Bill is intended to benefit the working classes. I maintain that the Bill will not benefit the working classes, and that it is not asked for by such classes. Young women of the working classes, generally speaking, leave their homes at an early age. They either go to service or they get married and go away altogether. In either of these cases, in the case of the death of the wife, you will very seldom find the sister will leave her present occupation to go and look after the children. In the general life of the working classes again, it will be found that a man remarries in a very short time after the loss of his wife. Moreover, the neighbours and friends of a bereaved husband are in almost every case anxious and willing to help their neighbours in their distress. I do not know what may be the opinion of the constituents of those delegates who went to the Congress at Liverpool, but I undertake to say that if any large district in the East End of London were canvassed it would be found that very few people among the working classes are in favour of the Bill. With regard to the middle classes, the Bill is entirely unnecessary on their behalf, and it is in that class of life where the number of sisters-in-law are not only most numerous, but most helpful to the family both during the lifetime of the wife and in the event of her death. And in the case of the upper classes I fail to see that the Bill will have very much effect one way or another.

It has been said in the course of the Debate that if the Bill passes, a rich man may still have his sister-in-law to look after his household. I think you would find there are extremely few people in society who would dare to live with their sisters-in-law if the Bill were passed into law, and few who would associate with any such people if they did. The real object of the Bill is a retrospective one, having for its object legalising the illegality of several people who have chosen to break the law. The question has been argued from the men's point of view, but surely it is only fair we should look at the interest of the women in this matter. We do not hear a great deal from the women of the country on the subject, for the simple reason, in my opinion, that they have a delicacy in discussing a very unpleasant question. I undertake to say, however, that if you could get the women of the country to speak their minds you would find that there is not a single woman in the country who does not hate the object of the Bill. The Bill is as unfair as it is undesirable, and I shall most decidedly give my vote in favour of the Amendment.

* (4.22.) MR. W. H. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I should like to point out the peculiar difficulty in which we on this side of the House are placed by the tactics of those in charge of the Bill. The hon. Member for Camberwell (Mr. J. Kelly), in moving the Second Reading of the Bill, dismissed with a wave of his hand all the arguments we might use by saying, "We shall have all the stale arguments trotted out." No doubt we have trotted out our old stale arguments, but the other side has not paid their old stale arguments even the poor compliment of trotting them out at all. With regard to the speech of the hon. Member for Crewe (Mr. M'Laren), we welcome his vote with more enthusiasm than we are likely to bestow upon his speech, because while he made the very best speech for the Bill, he wound up by saying that he would vote against it. The hon. Member for Camberwell described as the chief of the stale arguments that of the thin end of the wedge, and described it as a mere "bogey," but since his speech the thin end of the wedge has risen in its place in the person of the hon. Member for Crewe, whose only reason for not accepting the Bill was that it was not the thick end of the wedge. The hon. Member for Camberwell showed himself to be a man of wide social experience, but he said he did not know a single person who had contracted one of these marriages, and upon whom the present law inflicts the very slightest semblance of hardship. I congratulate my hon. Friend on his experience, and I think if he could poll the Members of this House he would find that a very much larger number than he believes are, in this respect, in the same position as himself. I do not believe that these marriages are so common as he has implied, and, even if they were, I see no reason why a Bill should be passed to relieve persons so married of responsibilities which they have knowingly incurred. I must protest against the statement that the only opposition to this Bill comes from the High Church Party of the Church of England. I believe the chief opponent of the Bill in former years was the late Earl Cairns, who surely could not be regarded as a High Churchman, and he was supported by the vast majority of the Low Church Party. The entire body of the Established Kirk of Scotland and of the Free Church are also on the same side. My hon. Friend has thought it necessary to put into the Bill a clause which preserves in its integrity the present Law of Divorce. As we know, adultery alone is not a ground on which a wife can divorce her husband, but incestuous adultery is by itself an ample ground for divorce. The reason is that incestuous adultery is so gross an offence against the moral law and so gross an offence against the wife that nothing more is needed to dissolve the bond which ties the wife to her husband. The assumption on which this Bill is founded is that the wife's sister is no more to the husband than any other woman, and yet the promoters are bound to put in a clause preserving the law of divorce, to which I have referred, and which declares that adultery with a wife's sister is incestuous adultery. It is idle to pretend that the Bill does not very grossly offend the feelings and opinions of a large proportion of the English people. The promoters know that so repulsive would this proposed new law be that they do not even seek to compel clergymen to marry people who come within this degree of relationship, and they are obliged to put in a clause exempting clergymen from liability for refusing to perform these marriages. I must protest against the assumption that the Liverpool Trade Union Congress represented the views of the great mass of the working classes on the subject. No doubt the working men, as my hon. Friend said, paid the delegates to meet in Liverpool, and the delegates passed a certain resolution, but I am confident that these delegates were not paid to express an opinion on this subject at all, and that they did not represent the views of the vast body of the working classes of the country in regard to it. For these reasons I shall cordially vote against the Second Reading of this Bill.

(4.35.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I am somewhat surprised to hear the taunts thrown out by Members opposite about our inability to make a House punctually at 2 o'clock, to-day. It is not our fault, but that of the opponents of the Bill, that the House did not meet at 2 o'clock to-day. We were most anxious to give every opportunity for full and fair discussion, and it is not we but the opponents of the Bill who, whilst the Speaker was in the Chair, showed discourtesy to the House by stopping in the Lobbies and declining to assist in making a quorum. I would point out also that it was well known that the House could not be counted out before 4 o'clock, so that the only consequence of keeping out of the House was to prevent the Debate coming on. It has been urged as an argument against the Bill that there is no agitation at the present moment in the country for it; but the fact is, that public agitation in favour of the Bill took place 20 years ago, and the demand for it has continued ever since. Year after year it has been brought before Parliament, and has been carried in this House by increasing majorities under both Liberal and Conservative Governments, while it has only been stopped from going to the other House, or receiving proper attention there, by want of time. The hon. Member for Crewe (Mr. M'Laren) said he would not support the Bill unless it made women and children equal with regard to the law of marriage. Those who support the Bill, however, do not believe that there is any demand for marriage with a deceased husband's brother. We look upon the measure as altogether in the interests of poor people and children. The greater part of the arguments that have been urged against it are of the old society or social character that have been trotted out over and over again, as if the whole question affected only a small part of society in London. The fact is, that the class of people who most require this change in the law know comparatively little, as a rule, of their relations, and the wife's sister, is not often or long in the home of the labourer or the artisan during the lifetime of the wife. In most cases she, like the other members of the family, has to go away to seek her living, and, therefore, the argument about the sister-in-law creating jealousy in the family falls to the ground in the cases where the Bill is most desired. We believe that the person who would be the kindest to the children who have lost their mother would be the deceased wife's sister, and, of all others, she is naturally the most likely to take care of them; therefore, if the husband is to marry again, she is the most natural person to marry in the interests of the children. Marriages of this kind take place now regardless of the law. We wish to revert to the old law, and not to bring about a new law, and we do not propose to bring in either the thin or the thick end of the wedge. The chief argument of the hon. Member for Chichester (Lord Walter Lennox), was that divorce was easier for men than for women, and he thought that was a reason why we should not pass this Bill. If the noble Lord disapproves of divorce then let him attempt to deal with the Divorce Laws. Then the Bill has been dealt with by the hon. Member for Oxford, who seemed to be under the impression that it is a Bill to compel marriage with a deceased wife's sister. But I can assure him we have no idea of any compulsion of the kind, we wish to permit such marriages, and such are very often desirable in the interest of the children. The hon. Member stated that there are few cases of such marriages known, and I do not myself know of one single case in what is called society, but I do know of many cases in the country; and in every such case I know of, the marriage was entered into simply out of consideration for the interest of motherless young children. I recollect two tenants of mine married in this way, and I know that after a struggle against the strong feeling excited against them among the clergy and others, they had to leave their native county and settle in another county where their previous circumstances were not known. This is the unpleasant state of things I want to put an end to. We are told that we have only argued the Bill on the old lines. Well, we have waited to-day to hear some new argument which has not been answered over and over again, but not a single argument has been used to-day that has not been met in previous Debates during the last two Parliaments, and amply and thoroughly dealt with. The fact is the arguments against the Bill are getting feebler every year. Ever since our opponents have dropped the Biblical argument there has been nothing to take its place. We are told such marriages have been disastrous in the colonies. If that is so how is it that when the colonial delegates were here a few years ago they were unanimous in favour of this change in the law, and pointed out the injustice and disadvantage a colonial subject of Her Majesty is under, who having married according to law in the colony finds that his wife cannot be recognised here? I do not think there are any arguments I can add to those so well brought forward by the hon. Member for Camberwell, or that there has been any argument used since he spoke to which I need reply, and so I express a hope that the House will agree and give the Bill a Second Reading.

(4.45.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL, FOR SCOTLAND (Sir CHARLES PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): In supporting the Motion for the rejection of the Bill, I will not deal with the more general subject; but if I pass by arguments that have been used, I desire to protest against the statement of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, that the Biblical argument has been given up. I take it that the reason why that argument is by tacit consent not advanced, is that it is felt that it is not fitting that these discussions should turn largely upon theological considerations. Really the answer is that those who have taken sides on this question have agreed to differ on that particular point. On that ground alone those with whom I think on this subject are disposed to give it the go by. If I do not touch on the social and domestic argument used in former years, it is because I think in regard to that part of the subject enough has been said by other speakers this afternoon, but I rise because there is one aspect of the subject which has not been touched upon, and I am disappointed that it has not been touched upon this afternoon, because there are on the back of the Bill the names of certain Scottish Members who, I think, at all events, might have been here to give us those views of this Bill, which, in their opinion, are held in that part of the Kingdom. I observe in the last clause it is proposed that the Bill shall extend to every part of Her Majesty's dominions. Now, Scotland occupies a somewhat peculiar position upon this question. It differs altogether from the relation and attitude of England towards this matter, and has so differed for centuries. Of course, in the old time when the canon law prevailed, there was, to a certain extent, similarity in the laws of the two countries; but since the Reformation the basis upon which this matter has stood in Scotland has been totally different to that in England. In Scotland, ever since the Reformation, it has been within the sweep of the Criminal Law, and not merely the Civil Law of the land.

That makes a vital difference when we are considering the social aspect of the question, and in considering what the attitude of the public in different parts of the country is towards it. I assume that all Members who represent the northern part of the Kingdom, are aware of this aspect of the question I am just touching; but I will occupy a few moments in the endeavour to make my meaning perfectly plain. I may remind the House that immediately upon the occurrence of the Reformation an Act of the Scottish Parliament was passed by which the crime of incest was made punishable by death. Though I do not, for a moment say that that is a law which we ought to revive or continue, at the same time it is noticeable, as it bears very closely on the view taken by the people of Scotland on this subject, that it was so punishable according to the strict theory of the law until a very recent date; but taking it according to the degree of criminality, that is borne out by actual punishments awarded, a test that will be admitted on all sides. Actual punishments awarded for crimes of exactly the same nature as this of which I am now speaking—this shows the Scottish view on the subject—have within living memory been long terms of transportation or penal servitude.

MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): Does the hon. and learned Gentleman mean this has been the ordinary practice in Scotland?

SIR C. PEARSON: Perhaps I have not sufficiently explained my position. My position is that this is not so much a question of the Civil Law in Scotland as primarily, and in the first instance a question of the Criminal Law.

MR. A. ELLIOT: But as a matter of practice at the present time, are severe punishments awarded?

SIR C. PEARSON: I think my hon. Friend will allow me to proceed with my argument. What I am anxious to make out is that inasmuch as this is not a question so much of the Marriage Law primarily in Scotland as of the Criminal Law; it is rather a question how the law has viewed the matter with reference to the punishments it has inflicted; and although in recent times no prosecutions of this kind have taken place, yet it is the fact that offences which are in the same category have within living memory, been visited by long terms of penal servitude, as for example, incest between an uncle and a niece, or between a man and the sister of his living wife. It seems to me it is hardly necessary for me to go in detail into the matter; but I do say that what I have said bears very close relation to the question how a Bill like this will be accepted in Scotland. I have not, either outside the House or during the Debate this afternoon, heard any argument whatever to convince me that there is any movement in favour of this measure in Scotland. There is absolutely no agitation on the subject; but on the contrary I believe that to pass this Bill would lead to most disastrous consequences and shock the moral sense of the whole community in Scotland. [Cries of "No, no!"] There are exceptions, no doubt, but I should like the ordinary tests to be applied to the question. There are a few petitions on one side or the other, but in Scotland there are the two large Presbyterian bodies which represent the larger part of the population distinctly against the proposed change in the law on the ground of principle. As a principle it is firmly imbedded in the law of Scotland, and has been for centuries, that these marriages are not only illegal, but criminal also; and it appears to me, even assuming, what I cannot for a moment assume, that there has been a recent change of opinion on the question, it is far too recent a change to justify a change in the Civil Law affecting the status of marriage. I submit that it lies on those who represent Scotland in the House to show that they have received a mandate on the question, or that they have been approached by any considerable body of opinion in Scotland to vote in favour of the Bill. I should particularly like to hear from those Scottish Members whose names are on the Back of the Bill whether there has been such an expression of opinion. Having regard to the relation which the mind of Scotland has borne to this question over a long period of years, I humbly submit I am entitled, not using exaggerated language, to say that the passage of this measure would be received with the utmost disfavour in Scotland, and I go so far as to say would shock the moral sense of the country.

(4.55.) COLONEL MAKINS (Essex, S.E.): It does not appear to have been noticed that this is a jubilee Debate on this subject, it was first introduced in 1842. I do not think it appears to excite quite so much enthusiasm as jubilee celebrations usually do. But I rise to repeat what I said last year, expressing the very strong objection I feel to a question of this magnitude being dealt with in a fragmentary manner, and by means of a private Member's Bill. The question of an alteration in the marriage laws is so important that, if dealt with at all, it ought to be taken up by a responsible Government, and dealt with in the fullest possible manner. I quite agree that there is a strong feeling, not only on the part of many hon. Members, but on the part of many people in the country, in favour of this measure; but there is an equally strong feeling on the opposite side held by members of the various religious bodies in the country. If there is any way of compromising a question of this kind it is by making all marriages civil, the religious bodies solemnising those which came within the regulations of their own particular religious section. The State would then be answerable for the proper publication of the marriage banns, the legitimacy of children, the devolution of property, and other matters. Independently of the benefit this would be to the State generally, it would be an opportunity of bringing into accord the law of marriage in the different parts of the Empire, which now widely differ in theory and practice. I certainly am not now going into the religious question, or into arguments repeated to-day for the fiftieth time. I content myself with saying that this is a subject which should be approached and settled in a far different manner than it can be by a private Member's Bill on a short Wednesday afternoon.

Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.

(No. 16.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(5.11.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): It is not my intention to make a speech in support of the Bill. It will be in the recollection of the House that the Second Reading was carried by an enormous majority of 3 to 1 last year; and I believe there is a general concurrence of opinion that some such Bill ought to pass. All I now wish to say is that we are willing to accept some such Amendment as the Attorney General suggested last year as a fair compromise, and we shall be glad if the House by agreeing to the Second Reading will put the Bill into the position it occupied last Session. We will then give ample time before proposing the Committee stage. We will accept any suggestion which will make the Bill a fair and workable measure. The great need is that the law shall be defined, that it shall be made clear to the Rating Authorities what machinery shall and shall not be rated; and that the law shall be what it is, and always has been, in England and Scotland.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(5.12.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The principle of the Bill has been so far conceded that I think the hon. Member is justified in asking the House to agree to the Second Reading; but at the same time I hope we clearly understand the position. I do not know why the Bill has been put forward in its present form, because as it stands it is open to the very serious objections which I pointed out in reference to last year's proposal. The scheme of the present Bill is that certain specified kinds of machinery shall be made rateable, and that all other kinds shall be exempted. Very great difficulties may arise in working such a scheme. A new state of things in regard to machinery may arise; new forms of machinery may be invented; new methods of fixing, new kinds of foundation for machinery may be adopted, and other things may happen which may bring machinery within the category of what ought to be rated, yet because it is out of the category of rateable machinery in the Bill it will be exempt from rating. I think the better form would be to make all machinery rateable, and then to provide for exceptions in specified cases. However, I understand the hon. Member to say that if a Second Reading is given to the measure he is quite willing to postpone the Committee stage for a time when we shall have full opportunity for discussion, and also that he is willing to accept Amendments upon matters which raised much controversy last Session; and so far as I have any right to speak on behalf of the Government I think the suggestion of the hon. Member is a fair one. But I hope it will not be assumed that in assenting to the Second Reading we could under any circumstances assent to the form the Bill now presents, namely, providing for special rating and general exemption. The question should be approached from just the opposite point of view, the exemptions being special. I am quite sure the hon. Member will carry out the undertaking he has given; but I think it is necessary, having regard to the numerous interests involved and the view that exists—among the agricultural classes for instance—that there might be undue exemptions, it is extremely important, in view of the many and important interests concerned, that we should reserve full right to ourselves, and that the conditions upon which the Government assent to the Second Reading should be understood.

(5.16.) SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I am sure everyone will be glad to see a solution of the difficulties arising in connection with the question arrived at. I will only now ask whether the Attorney General will himself put Amendments on the Paper, so that Members may know what will be acceptable to the Government?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I understand the idea is that Amendments should be put upon the Paper either by the Government or by those who support the Bill. Amendments I mean on the lines of those proposed last year. There will be no difficulty about the Amendments being put down either in the shape the promoters are willing to accept or otherwise.

SIR HENRY JAMES: As my hon. and learned Friend is aware, there is a second Bill, the language of which takes the direction he has indicated. Would the provisions of that Bill be acceptable as carrying out the object my hon. and learned Friend has in view?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I am sorry I have not paid attention to the other Bill and do not know if it is on the lines I laid down last year. If it is it will afford a means of arriving at a form of language which might be accepted by the House.

(5.19.) MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I hope the House will not assent to the Second Reading. It is a manufacturer's Bill, constructed entirely in the manufacturing interest; it is intended to exempt large movable machinery belonging to manufacturers at the expense of the ratepayers, who will have to pay about 2d. in the £1 extra. I hope that before the House accepts the Second Reading of the Bill we shall know something more of its provisions.

(5.20.) SIR R. PAGET (Somerset, Wells): This Bill would involve a serious departure from the present law of rating, and yet its promoters say that all they want is that the law shall be defined. The measure is by no means one for merely defining the law, but one which would make serious alterations in it and involve a complete departure from a well recognised system. If the hon. Member who introduced the Bill had seen fit to read the evidence brought before the Select Committee he would there have found witness after witness declaring that if the law were altered in the direction now suggested a heavy burden of rates would be transferred from the shoulders of one class of people to those of another class. In Birmingham, for example, the kind of machinery which the Bill proposes to exempt has for years—ever since 1837—been rated as enhancing the value of property, and the suggested change would mean that £5,000 a year would be taken off the shoulders of the manufacturers and put on to those of the poorer inhabitants of that city. Who are they who would have to bear the burden? Not the manufacturing capitalists, but the people who live in a poor class of houses, and who are already heavily burdened. I venture to think no reason has been shown for this change. The House may be asked to consider whether this matter has ever been fairly investigated. It was investigated not many years ago. A Select Committee sat upon it and took a great deal of evidence, and what conclusion did the Committee arrive at? Did they say that the subject should be dealt with by a Bill of this sort? Nothing of the kind. What they said was that the whole subject of rating should be dealt with by the Government without the least possible delay. That was the Report, and the unanimous Report, of the Committee after they had investigated the matter for weeks and weeks. Their conclusion was not that there should be introduced a fragmentary measure like this to relieve the pockets of a certain class of the community at the expense of others. They recognised the difficulties connected with the subject—and everyone who has taken the trouble to inquire will find that there are great difficulties, and that the law really does require reform. It is hardly fair at this hour (5.25) on a Wednesday afternoon to ask this Assembly to come to a conclusion directly in the teeth of the unanimous recommendation of the Select Committee. I was astonished at the speech of the Attorney General, for it appeared to me that he was perfectly prepared to assent to the Second Reading—to the Second Reading of a Bill which, by the admission of its own promoters, is not to be considered by the House, but is to be remodelled upon the scheme of another Bill. There are two of these Machinery Rating Bills—Bill No. 1 and Bill No. 2. The leading principle of this Bill, Bill No. 1, as defined in the clauses, is entirely different to the leading principle of the other measure. Its promoter would allow it to stand over until the other measure comes up, for according to his own explanation it does not carry out his intention. He proposes to alter the Bill by removing the whole of its interior, and substituting the whole of the interior of Bill No. 2. That is not the way the House is accustomed to deal with questions of principle. A Bill of this kind ought to have been introduced in such a shape as to clearly indicate its object. But the supporters of Bill No. 2 are not much enamoured of their own offspring, for they admit that it will want serious alteration. [Cries of "Divide!"] Some hon. Members appear to me to be in haste to come to a conclusion. I do not view the question from their standpoint at all. I think that when you are asked to consent to hasty legislation which is going to unsettle the whole law with regard to the rating of machinery, you should mark this, that the law as it stands is well known, and has been fought in many a Law Court. Case after case has been tried, and the law has clearly established what is rateable and what is not rateable, and I venture to say that these ideas as to definition are entirely erroneous. The highest legal authorities can tell us that they know what the law is without any further definition. I ask any legal authority whether he would advocate unsettling all the Judgments which have been given on the question of rating? If not, I would then ask why should we pass a Bill of this nature?

It being half-past Five of the clock, Mr. SPEAKER proceeded to interrupt the business,—

Whereupon, Mr. WINTERBOTHAM rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question, and the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Wednesday, 25th February.

ELECTORS' QUALIFICATION AND REGISTRATION BILL.—(No. 44.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

COMPANIES ACT (1862) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 146.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday, 25th February.

TRADING (REGISTRATION) BILL. (No. 183.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(5.34.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The object of this Bill is the same, or much the same, as the object of the Registration of Firms Bill of the hon. Member for Islington. That hon. Member has told me that the Government have assented to the proposal that that Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. I desire to ask whether the Government will assent to the same proposal with regard to this Bill? in which case I shall be willing to move the Second Reading for that purpose.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am sorry to say I am not myself personally acquainted with the provisions of the Bill, and, in the absence of my right hon. Friend (Sir M. Hicks Beach), I am not able to assent to the Second Reading now.

(5.35.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: The two Bills are precisely the same in principle.

Second Reading deferred till tomorrow.

LICENSING (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 180.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I will not keep this Bill on the Paper if the Government object to it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am not in a position to accept the Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I move that the Order be discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Order be discharged and the Bill withdrawn," put, and agreed to.

MOTIONS.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (BANFFSHIRE) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Asher, Bill to make better provision for the administration of certain Educational Endowments in the County of Banff, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Asher, Mr. Duff, and Mr. James Campbell.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 208.]

TRUSTS AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. J. B. Balfour, Bill to amend the Law of Trusts in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. J. B. Balfour and Mr. Crawford.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 209.]

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Third Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY : BILL.—(No. 184.)

Bill, as amended, to be printed. [Bill 207.]

House adjourned at twenty minutes before six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 12th February, 1891.

COLONISATION (HOUSE OF COMMONS).

Leave given to the Viscount Gordon (E. Aberdeen) to attend the Select Committee of the House of Commons (pursuant to message of Monday last) if his Lordship think fit, and, his Lordship (in this place) consenting thereto, a message sent to the Commons to acquaint them therewith.

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN BILL [H.L.]
(No. 31.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Bill read 3^a (according to order).

LORD NORTON: My Lords, I have given notice of an Amendment, which I read the other day to your Lordships, to Clause 4 as proposed, and I did so with great regret that I should have to delay a Bill for which I am sure the country will be greatly indebted to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and in the purport of which I fully concur. I must say that I still think the Bill as now drawn will be a dead letter, because the parents who are intended to be dealt with are of a class who will never sue for a writ of habeas corpus to get the custody of their children. The fees alone in the High Court would be a bar to their so applying. The Bill also does not touch the class of cases chiefly in view, namely, those of vicious parents, throwing away all the good training of a child in an Industrial School when the child's term of detention has expired. My Amendment is upon Clause 4. That clause says that when the Court has rejected the application of a parent on the ground that he is wholly unfit to take care of his child, if the Court is of opinion that the child is being brought up by its foster parent or by the Institution taking charge of it in a religion different from that of the reprobate parent, it shall be the duty of the Court to secure that the child shall be removed from that better training, and shall be taught in the religion which has led to its abandonment and to the parent's unfitness. This may be a necessary reservation of the parental right in a Bill in which all other parental rights are very properly thrown over; but what I want to point out is that if there are no means of teaching the child in the reprobate parent's religion, of course the provision fails. No Act of Parliament can compel the performance of an impossibility. If there are means, there are no funds provided in the Bill to replace the funds theretofore supplied by those taking care of the child.

Amendment moved,

In Clause 4, page 2, line 11, after ("brought up") to insert ("Provided means can be found available for the education of the child in such religion, and any additional cost so incurred shall be a charge on the school-rate, if any, in the district.")—(The Lord Norton.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I am sorry to say I cannot accept the noble Lord's Amendment, for various reasons. In the first place, I think I can show him that inasmuch as the provision which he has just read runs through the whole clause, and is a necessary power in it, what he proposes would be an unjust taxation of some of Her Majesty's subjects, and one which this House has no power to make. The only effect would be that, having given an expression of opinion upon the matter, the proviso would have to be struck out of the Bill as one of the definitive measures. I observe that the noble Lord, in giving his opinion of what the clause provides, says that it shall be the duty of the Court to provide for the education of the child in the religion in which the parent would have the right to have it brought up. That is not the clause. The noble Lord is mistaken in his view of it. The clause says in terms that—

whose legal right it is to secure that the child shall be so brought up. Therefore, the noble Lord will see that instead of its being any statutory obligation or duty on the part of the Court, the Court is simply empowered, if it shall think fit, to make such order as the circumstances of the case may require. Personally, I should not be averse to some such provision as I think the noble Lord has in his mind, although the language of his Amendment, if he will forgive me for saying so, is somewhat vague. I think that what the noble Lord means is that where the parent of a child is, in the opinion of the Court, unfit to be entrusted with its care, and the child is being brought up in a religion different from that of the parent, if the parent has no means to provide for the child being brought up in that religion, there is apparently presented to the Court the difficulty of either allowing it to be brought up in a religion contrary to the wish of the parent or of delivering it up to the parent. I see the point at which the noble Lord aims, but I do not think the difficulty arises. He has, I think, mistaken the effect of the clause. Here, we will say, is a Protestant parent applying to the Court and desirous that his child shall be brought up as a Protestant; the child is being up brought as a Roman Catholic, and yet the Court would have only power to continue it in the custody of a person who certainly would not provide for its Protestant instruction. That is the difficulty in the noble Lord's mind. Well, I do not see the apparent difficulty, but he omits to consider that the whole matter is referred to the discretion of the Court, and I should imagine the Court will exercise its discretion in the best way possible for the interests of the child. It is not for me to say what the Courts might think proper to do; but possibly they might think it better that the child should be brought up in the Roman Catholic religion, although the child of a Protestant, or vice versa, and taught its moral and religious duties, rather than that it should be taught nothing of the kind at all. It is very likely the Court would come to that conclusion. I will not say what conclusion I should come to myself, though I have a strong opinion on the matter. I doubt very much whether any Court would consent to take the noble Lord's view as to the provision that should be made for children who would have no religious teaching. I am afraid he would encounter a very strong body of opposition, if he were to try to establish a kind of sectarianism in these cases at the expense of the State. But

Lord Halsbury

I understand that the noble Lord admits the Bill is a useful and desirable one, and let me also call his attention to the fact that this section was agreed to without a Division, by a very large Committee representing both Protestant and Roman Catholic Peers. The religious difficulty did not arise. This religious question is the one question which I believe would be found most likely to imperil this Bill. Do let me, therefore, urge upon the noble Lord not to press his Amendment to a Division. If it passes with the full authority of this House that this the greatest of difficulties, the religious question, has been surmounted, it will go to the other House with a weight which it certainly will not carry if it is only passed by a majority of your Lordships. I do, therefore, again urge the noble Lord, fully recognising that the Bill is of importance and is greatly needed, as he says it is, not to press his Amendment to a Division.

LORD NORTON: After what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord, I beg leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, before the Bill is put before the House for Third Reading, I should like in a very few words to call attention to the immense satisfaction with which the passing of this Bill will certainly be regarded, especially by the vast number of people who have long been engaged in that most difficult and most important philanthropic work—the training of neglected children. Even speaking within the range of personal observation and experience, one can testify to the fact that the difficulties of that work which are intended to be dealt with and overcome by this Bill, are of constant occurrence. The noble and learned Lord has alluded to the future of this Bill in other regions beyond. I am sure that the fact of its having been introduced by himself, and having received the approval of so many noble Lords in this House, ought to afford a very favourable prospect as regards its future. At any rate, it should surely remain free from the criticism that this is a piece of sentimental legislation. I should rather be inclined to think that some of the criticism indulged in in other quarters has been of a sentimental kind; I refer to the almost superstitious dread which seems to actuate the minds of some persons of any interference with the rights, privileges, and responsibilities of parents. There is certainly one thing which this Bill will bring before a certain class of parents in a very forcible manner, and that is the responsibilities which they should recognise as attaching to them, and more especially in the matter of paying for the maintenance of their children, who have been brought up in institutions and by charitable people. My object in rising is to express my grateful appreciation of the action of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack in introducing this Bill, and the immense satisfaction with which it is regarded by all classes.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

(No. 6.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

COLONIES (CONFERENCE ON IMPERIAL TRADE AND DEFENCE).

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: In asking your Lordships to agree to the Motion which I shall presently have the honour to read, I do so with a feeling of considerable responsibility upon me. It is not by any means a light matter to ask your Lordships to affirm that it is advisable that representatives of the various component parts of the Empire should be invited to meet together for conference in London. Such a Conference is, in my opinion, only to be justified when there are matters of very grave import indeed, affecting the whole Empire, to be discussed. But I think there are such problems now ripe for solution—problems and questions of a very far-reaching character. I do not mean to say that it might be possible to arrive at a solution of them at any one meeting of the Conference, but there are questions which are clamouring for discussion of a much more authoritative character than can be carried on merely by an interchange of views between private individuals. They are problems of such a character that they can only be ultimately solved, in my opinion, by such an authoritative discussion as could take place in such a Conference as I suggest. I have a good precedent for my Motion. It is only four years ago since representatives of the colonies met in London the Ministers of the Queen to consider weighty matters affecting the welfare of the Empire. That was an event of great moment. It was the first time in the history of this country that the Mother Country and the colonies had ever met together to discuss matters face to face. As long as the British Empire endures the first occasion in which the mother and her children met together to consult must stand out as a remarkable landmark in the history of our race. Whether that landmark shall in the opinion of historians mark the point at which a gradual decline towards disintegration takes place, or whether, on the other hand, it shall point down a long vista of united and peaceful progress, I think depends very much indeed upon the wisdom and the action of the present generation. Probably the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would not absolutely deny that the settlement, or partial settlement, of some difficult matters then in dispute with foreign countries was facilitated by the informal interchange of views to which the occasion of the Conference gave rise. And a great deal of good resulted also—an amount of good which must not be undervalued simply because it cannot be measured or weighed and read within the four corners of an Act of Parliament—from the contact and free interchange of views that took place between representatives of all the colonies and Her Majesty's Ministers. We learned a great deal about the opinions, the wishes, and desires of the colonies, and the colonies probably learned a great deal about each other, and they learned also probably a great deal that they did not know before as to the practical difficulties attending the management of a great Empire. In all these matters, to say the very least of it, as well as in other respects, another Conference could not possibly do any harm. Certain matters which were under discussion at that Conference are still unsettled, and ought to be settled. The Conference, I believe, did a great deal in the way of defence. A good deal has been done in legal matters; legislation is in progress with the object of enabling Judgments of Colonial Courts to be enforced in this country, and those of the Courts at home to be enforced in the colonies. A good deal has actually been done in matters relating to bankruptcy, probate, letters of administration, and the like, and I think I am right in saying that there is practical unanimity as to such important subjects as the saving of life at sea and the Merchandise Marks Act. But other matters are not settled, such as the investment of trust moneys in Colonial Funds, an alternative telegraphic route to the East through Canada, and cheaper telegraphic communication. I might mention many other matters, but I mention those to show that even in practical matters such as were introduced at the last Conference a great deal remains to be done, and might be usefully undertaken if another Conference were assembled. But those are, comparatively speaking, small matters. The two subjects, however, to which I wish especially to call the attention of the House are very large and grave matters indeed. If the last Conference was remarkable in what it did, it was also remarkable in what it left undone. The subject of organisation for military defence was the most prominent matter laid down for discussion, and yet, strange to say, very little indeed was done in respect of it. A great deal was done in the direction of increasing the naval resources of the Empire; and the direction which it took was that of providing special ships, a special squadron, for the defence of a certain group of colonies, the expense being shared between the mother country and the colonies interested. I have nothing to say against that principle of applying mutual help localised in that way. On the contrary, I think that is the direction in which the principle should be applied. I believe very strongly in the principle of individuality, and that mutual help and self-help should go together; but at the same time I should like to see the great principle of mutual obligations, of mutual responsibilities, and of mutual help applied in a larger, a more unselfish, and a more Imperial spirit. In the proposition that I shall make, in the propositions which I should wish to see introduced at the Conference, I admit that I am coming near the confines of a proposition which I consider to be quite untenable; it may be urged, if mutual help is to become the principle observed, that all the subjects of the Queen are interested in securing that the forces of the Crown should be able to protect them in either offensive or defensive war, and therefore that all the subjects of the Queen should contribute in due proportion to the maintenance of those forces. That is a proposition or assertion which I consider entirely untenable, in practical politics at any rate, because to carry out such an idea as that would necessitate such an amendment and alteration of the Constitution as would amount to a complete revolution. It would require the creation of a Parliament or of a deliberative body of some kind, which should have the power of raising taxes for the maintenance of the forces of the Crown, and, of course, dealing also with questions of peace or war and all other questions in reference to which the forces of the Crown might be called upon to operate. That is a matter with which I have nothing now to do, and I shall stop far short of any proposition of that kind. I think that mutual help can be given and that mutual responsibilities can be kept within strictly defined limits without necessitating any change whatever in the Constitution or without creating any difference whatever of that kind. It is, of course, impossible to say offhand that the British Empire is more interested in any one particular portion of the Empire than in any other portion, or that it is more concerned for one fortress than for another fortress within its limits; but it is easy to see, at any rate, that the British Empire as a whole and every portion of it, individually and collectively, is especially and particularly interested in one matter, and that is the security of our water-borne commerce and our right of access to the markets of the world—in other words, the security and safety of the great highways of the sea. That is a matter which can be treated quite separately and independently of any other operations of war by sea or by land. You may divide the forces of the Crown for practical purposes into three classes: the forces organised for purposes of purely local defence, the regular forces of the Crown, naval and military, and the forces maintained for the special purpose of securing our commerce and enabling our merchants to send their merchandise in safety across the oceans. That is a matter which I think concerns all portions of the Empire in a degree and to an extent quite different to the degree and extent in which we are concerned in respect of any other defensive or offensive matter, and on that account I can see no reason why Imperial funds should not be raised for a purpose in which the whole Empire—every portion of it—is so especially interested. What I should like to see done would be that a fund should be raised by the mother country and the self-governing colonies, to be devoted to the proper armament, and maintenance, in a proper state of defence, of certain coaling stations and certain strategic points, and the complete equipment and maintenance of a fleet of swift ocean cruisers. It is impossible for me to pretend to say what coaling stations or other places should be selected to be maintained by such a fund, or what number of ships would be necessary, or of what particular kind they should be, or what amount of money would be required, or what would be the best method of raising the money. But I will say this: that, in my opinion, by far the best way of raising such a fund would be by the imposition of Customs' duties, because I believe that such a plan would work automatically, fairly, and easily; but I admit that it is open to the great objection, from our point of view, that as the amount to be raised would be infinitesimally small as compared with the value of foreign imports, the expense of the machinery for collecting the duties would be out of all proportion to the duties to be raised. That, of course, is a serious matter as affecting a country like this, which has, practically speaking, no ready machinery for collecting Customs' duties of that kind. All those, however, are matters of detail; they would have to be and could only be decided in such a Conference as I ask for. No doubt there might be differences of opinion on such matters of detail, but I have no doubt that they would be got over and adjusted in that spirit of compromise and that spirit of give and take which is so characteristic of a practical race. On the main principle, however, I do not anticipate that there would be any very great difference of opinion. I believe that the great self-governing colonies would be glad to recognise that the time has come when, in a matter of this kind, they might reasonably be expected to take upon themselves some share in fulfilling obligations with us. I believe that they would be glad of an opportunity to do so, and I do not anticipate—on the great main principle that it is advisable and desirable and legitimate that a special fund should be raised for this special purpose—that any large difference of opinion would arise. There is another reason which argues strongly in my favour, and that is a matter which is personal to ourselves in the United Kingdom. It is, and I should imagine always will be, a great temptation to all Governments to neglect their duties in respect of those coaling stations and strategic points on account of a desire to appear economical. I should myself be very far from saying that the great spending Departments of the Government are conducted with the greatest economy possible now. I am not at all sure that we taxpayers get the very best value for our money that can be got; but it is possible for a Member of Parliament, and even for a private individual, to arrive at a tolerably fair estimate as to the condition of the Army and the Navy. No Government would neglect its duties too far in that respect, being naturally fearful of the "wrath to come" which would overtake them; but in respect of the arming and protection of our coaling stations and matters of that kind the case is far different. I defy any one of average intellect and ingenuity to find out anything certain about the condition of these coaling stations. They are of the utmost importance to us. We live day by day—we get our daily bread—by our commerce; our commerce in time of war is absolutely dependent on our fleets, and our fleets in turn are absolutely dependent upon the coaling stations and other strategic places which can succour them, and where they can obtain fuel and supplies. The whole safety of our commerce in time of war depends upon those little places scattered about the world which the valour of our forefathers has coloured red upon the map; and yet those little centres of security are practically speaking utterly ignored, and utterly unknown to the people of this country. Those places lie altogether outside their ken, they know nothing of them, and, what is worse, it is impossible to bring the existence of those all-important spots belonging to the British Empire and their condition under the focus of the most scrutinising eye. Owing to that and to many other reasons, I say that the temptation of all Governments (and of course I speak entirely in the abstract) to scamp their work in that respect and to neglect their duty is very great; and I submit that it would be to the advantage of the United Kingdom and of the whole Empire that matters of so great importance should be lifted clean out of range of the possibility of being interfered with by any Party considerations whatever, and should be maintained and administered by an Imperial fund, which could not in any way be influenced by Party politics either here or in any of the colonies of the British Empire. My Lords, those are the reasons why I am anxious that this question of the creation of a fund for certain Imperial purposes, that is to say, for maintaining a fleet of swift ocean cruisers and for keeping in a proper condition of defence the coaling stations and other strong positions and fortresses should be submitted to the discussion and consideration of the representatives of the colonies, meeting Her Majesty's Ministers and the naval and administrative advisers of the Crown. I believe that good results would follow, and that if such a fund was formed and maintained, it would introduce a very wholesome principle—that of mutual obligation, mutual responsibility, and mutual help; and I also believe that it would add greatly to the stability and security of our commerce and trade in times of difficulty or of war. That is the first matter which I should like to see submitted to a Conference, and I turn next to another and perhaps a more important matter. I will now deal with the encouragement of trade within the Empire—the desirability of developing the material resources of the Empire. A great deal, no doubt, can be done in that way by greater facilities of communication and matters of that kind; but it is [useless to blink the fact that if anything definite and lasting is to be done it can be accomplished only by a system of preferential treatment within the Empire. I look at that from three distinct points of view—first of all, the advantage to be gained in developing our resources within the Empire; secondly, from the point of view of counteracting the influences which in their tendency are dangerous to the principle of unity of the Empire, which attract and deflect British capital from profitable investments in the Empire; and thirdly—and most important of all—from the point of view of additional strength which it would give to those ties which already bind the Empire together. It was a subject which was mentioned at the last Conference, and upon which a most interesting and able discussion, or rather conversation, took place, but as it was a matter which was practically out of order and not contained in the reference to the Conference, it was, of course, debated in a more or less perfunctory manner, and the discussion of it was, as it naturally would be, partially paralysed by the knowledge that no practical result could ensue. What I want is to have that most vital question discussed at the proposed Conference with the view of producing some practical result. I do not wish to go into the matter at any very great length, but I must ask your Lordships to consider whether, in view of the general commercial attitude of foreign countries towards this country, it is not at any rate legitimate to do something to counteract the effect of foreign tariffs in attracting British capital? Ought we not to do so if we legitimately can, and especially if, when doing so, we can also accomplish another very desirable result? What is the general attitude towards this country? On every side we see the barriers of hostile tariffs raised higher and higher against us. Consider for one moment the present fiscal policy of the United States, the effect which it has upon British industry and upon Canadian industry, and the effect which it has upon the principle of unity as between Canada and the Mother Country. I do not for a moment mean to say that what is known as the M'Kinley Tariff was designed with any hostile intentions against this country. In fact, the United States have told us over and over again that it was not designed with any hostile intentions against us: and as they say so, of course it was not. Still, as a matter of fact, it has very unpleasant results, and of one thing, my Lords, you may be perfectly sure, that is, that not one atom of the stringency of that tariff will be relaxed out of consideration for this country. So great is the patriotism of the people of the United States that I feel sure, whether it be in respect of the provisions of that tariff or in respect of the extremely irksome regulations attached to it, or whether it be in a matter which I have seen remotely mentioned, the granting of increased subsidies to lines of ocean steamers—if they think it necessary to do anything of that kind to benefit their own industries—it may make them very unhappy, but they will manage somehow or other to bear the inconvenience for the purpose of so benefiting themselves, while reflecting that they are inflicting injuries on British and Canadian industries at the same time. I will not argue the point whether capital is deflected from its natural channel by those means. Whether anything can be done to remedy it or not is a matter of opinion, but I do not think the facts will be gainsaid. I will pass very lightly over this, because, after all, the question which interests and which influences me most is the great question of the unity of the Empire. I believe that it is best for the interests of every portion of the Empire, of every colony, of every dependency, and of the mother country, that the great principle of unity should be maintained, and I am firmly convinced that the best and the surest and most lasting way in which it can be maintained is by making it pay to do so, by making it a practical material advantage to them all to remain portions of one Empire. What are the ties which bind us together now? The ties that bind the Empire together are no doubt strong, but, practically speaking, they are ties of sentiment, community of origin, of race, blood, and religion, common institutions and common traditions, all the ties which arise from common ancestry, and very strong ties they have proved themselves. There is one tie, however, and that perhaps, in some respects, the strongest of all, which is wanting—community of material advantage. We must not forget that ties of sentiment must tend to become weaker and weaker. The natural affection of a man for the country of his birth, and the feeling of affection with which we all look towards a country where those who are near and dear to us dwell—all those naturally strong human feelings must gradually tend to become weaker. No doubt the sentiment of patriotism in the largest sense will remain, but the actual affection of a people for the place of their origin must become weaker, and all attractions of that kind must tend to shift from these Islands to the various countries which are the actual native land. Now, community of material advantage may sound very sordid and very commonplace, but still, as a matter of fact, it is true that the strongest tie that can bind men together and communities together is that of community of material advantage in matters of trade and commerce. It is perfectly true that trade and commerce are the most fruitful sources of jealousy and of international quarrels, but it is true also that trade makes and cements the strongest feelings of attachment and friendship. Such community of interest can only be gained in one of two ways; either by commercial federation or by preferential treatment. My Lords, I look upon the commercial federation of the Empire as a dream. I do not mean to say it is a dream incapable of realisation; but absolute Free Trade throughout the Empire I look upon, for all practical purposes, as nothing but a dream. But the other—preferential treatment—the granting of special advantages within the Empire, is by no means a dream. That is a matter which can be practically realised and brought into manifest life by a little sacrifice of principle or, might I say, a little sacrifice of prejudice on our own part. There is no physical difficulty in the way. The British Empire can produce everything that man may need. There is not a product beneficial for man that does not naturally grow on British soil. There is nothing that can be made up and manufactured that is beneficial to man that cannot be made up and manufactured on British soil. The British Empire is, or if it is not now, it could very easily become, practically self supporting; and, therefore, in advocating preferential treatment I am not advocating anything supremely or physically difficult. I am not advocating the forcing of industries by anything in the nature of Protection. All that I am doing, all that I wish to do, is to endeavour to develop all our natural capacities, all our national resources, by the help of British capital. I desire to do something to counteract influences which are deflecting and dragging British capital abroad, taking it away from profitable investment within the British Empire; and I want to create that common material interest which must—I will not say alone—have a very strong influence in determining the direction in which the component parts of the British Empire will progress and grow in the future. What are the objections? The main objection that I know of lies in the fiscal system pursued by this country. It may be argued that Import Duties are in themselves utterly abominable things, and that no good can ever arise from their imposition. That is a matter which I will not discuss. It may be argued that any kind of departure from our present system must be radically wrong. That is a matter which I will not discuss either. I will grant for the sake of argument that our system is absolutely perfection itself, and I will grant for the sake of argument that it is absolutely wrong in principle to impose any more duties; but even so, I would appeal to your Lordships to consider whether there are not exceptions to every rule—whether there may not be circumstances to justify a departure in one instance from what is otherwise a very sound general principle; and I would appeal to your Lordships to say whether the present is not such an exception—whether the object to be aimed at, the strengthening of the ties which bind the Empire together, would not afford such an exception as would justify us in departing a little from the principles which we may hold in themselves to be in general absolutely true? One thing is perfectly certain, it is impossible for us to remain standing still. In one of two directions we must move. We must move either in the direction of preferential treatment within the Empire or in the direction of preferential treatment for the foreigners. It is not necessary for me to remind your Lordships what are the directions in which those two different courses must lead us. This preferential treatment could be brought about without interfering in the slightest degree with the perfect liberty of action of the colonies. They could raise their revenue by any means they liked. They could take any measures they chose for the development of their own resources. They might make any arrangements among themselves. They might, for that matter, if it was thought desirable, make any arrangements with foreign countries. The only thing they could not do would be to give more favourable treatment to goods of foreign origin than to similar goods of British origin. Now I maintain that discrimination in favour of a foreign nation by the United Kingdom against the colonies, or discrimination in favour of a foreign country against the United Kingdom by a British Colony, or discrimination in favour of one colony as against another—I maintain that such acts approach so near to commercial hostility as to be compatible only with the most shadowy ideas of a common allegiance. With this single exception, that foreign goods should not be favoured as against British goods, the colonies would maintain all the privileges and freedom that they now enjoy, every atom of it, under a system of preferential treatment for goods of British origin, as against similar goods of foreign origin. One other matter is very certain, and that is that the initiative must come from us. In the first place the great difficulty in our way lies in our fiscal policy, and not in the commercial policies of any of the colonies; and in the second place I think it is obvious in a great Imperial question of this kind that the initiative should come from the Mother Country, that is, from the heart and brain of the Empire. I think, my Lords, that the present affords a good opportunity. The commercial condition of the Empire is in a somewhat peculiar state. I have already alluded to the M'Kinley Tariff, and there can be no kind of question that the fiscal policy of the United States offers a temptation to Canada to enter into an illegitimate union. There is a sort of political parody of the duel scene in "Faust" going on in North America at the present time. Well, my Lords, there are many other questions which might come under discussion. I believe there is a Committee sitting now considering the Commercial Treaties in force. There are two questions which have exercised the minds of people both in the colonies and in this country, and those are the status of the colonies under the Commercial Treaties, how far they are free to enter into any commercial arrangements, their relations with each other—and also a far greater question, that is, how far it would be advisable that the colonies should have a more direct voice in the negotiation of Commercial Treaties. All those matters are at present under discussion, and, in fact, the commercial relations of the Empire are all more or less in a state of suspension, and are waiting for some force or energy which will enable them to crystallise again into definite shape. It would be a great misfortune, to my way of thinking, if the opportunity were lost—an opportunity for using that force or energy which will enable them to crystallise in the best possible way. I admit that it is impossible for statesmanship to run in any way counter to the natural development of the community. All these communities must, and will, infallibly develop in their natural direction according to the genius of the people, and as influenced by natural laws and by their environment and the circumstances which surround them; but statesmanship surely can do a great deal by promptly seizing opportunities, by strengthening the existing ties which now bind us, by supplying those ties which are now wanting, by uniting preference with International Law, and by doing all that is possible to counterbalance and counteract the evil which is being done by the artificial attraction and the artificial stimulus that is now given under the commercial and fiscal systems that are universal in foreign countries. It is quite possible that no immediate result would ensue from the Conference I suggest. I do not mean to say that I should expect the Conference would be able to lay down heads of Bills which should be submitted to our Parliament, and to the colonial Legislatures, or anything of that kind; and I admit at once there is not the slightest use in inviting the Conference to consider matters of that kind if they are to be met by a flat non possumus as to any change in, or relaxation of, the rules of our present fiscal system. But if they can be met with any degree of open mind on that point the greatest good would result from a Conference. All those matters of detail which are still unsettled—the effect of the most favoured nation clause upon the arrangements amongst the colonies themselves, the effect of preferential treatment within the Empire, the amount of duties which would have to be taken off colonial produce which is at present heavily taxed by this Free Trade country, the duties which would have to be put on foreign products, the amount of money that would have to be raised and the method of raising it for the creation of such an Imperial Fund as I have suggested—all these matters, and many others, would be discussed and threshed out in Conference, and can only be discussed and threshed out in Conference—hammered out by discussion and brought into such a shape as that they could be submitted to the people in the form in which a great scheme of a national character should be submitted to the people of this country and to the people of the whole Empire. My Lords, I believe that a scheme of that kind would commend itself at any rate to the democracies. Democracies are not slow to grasp large Imperial ideas and are keen enough to see the benefits which would accrue from them. In some respects the idea of instituting an Imperial Fund for certain common purposes of required defence and of steps to be taken in the direction of preferential treatment within the Empire in order to counteract in some degree the effects of foreign tariffs, and the addition of another powerful tie to the ties which already bind us, is an idea which I believe would be quickly grasped, and which would commend itself to the people. They would lay hold of the Imperial idea. The notion of a great Empire occupying the four corners of the earth, advancing steadily in the paths of peace and progress under one flag, exercising complete freedom to develop in every possible direction, according to their own individualities, and, at the same time, knitted together by the great tie of sentiment as well as of material advantage, is an idea which would commend itself, not only to the people of the United Kingdom, but of all the colonies of the British Empire. We should see also that if labour is to be benefited and is to be maintained in a superior position it can certainly best be done by the earnest co-operation in all trade and manufacturing matters between those countries in which the most similar ideas are entertained as to the conditions under which labour ought to be employed. All these matters will commend themselves to the people; and what I am most anxious for, what I most earnestly desire, is that those opinions, which are largely shared I think in this country and throughout the whole Empire, but which are comparatively vague and in the air now, should be wrought and brought into a tangible shape and form by discussion in a Conference, so that something definite, something they can understand, might be submitted to the people, not only of the United Kingdom, but of the whole Empire. That is my object, and I trust your Lordships will agree to the Motion which I have now to make.

Moved to resolve—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Colonial Governments be invited to send representatives to a Conference to be held in London to consider the advancement of trade within Her Majesty's dominions, and the formation of a fund for certain purposes of Imperial defence."—(The Lord Kenry, E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)

*THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, my noble Friend has introduced to the House a subject of great interest and importance, and in doing so he has touched upon a still wider field and upon matters of still more imperious urgency. I shall have no temptation to follow or imitate my noble Friend, for I should fail in the eloquence with which he has dwelt upon the more sentimental and emotional portions of this subject, and I am the less inclined to do so because I think the subject is one which rather lacks treatment of the opposite kind. I have observed that all the questions which attach to Imperial federation while they create naturally the greatest interest and call forth speeches of the greatest power, seem to me to lend themselves more readily to peroration than to argument, and it is rather exactitude of expression and of reasoning that we require in dealing with a subject which may readily lead us astray if we allow ourselves to repose upon vague, sonorous generalities. My noble Friend asks us to summon a Conference—a Conference of the colonists; and I have to ask myself what are the considerations which should guide us in summoning a Conference. It is not a matter which can be undertaken by the colonial statesmen who join in it without very considerable inconvenience—inconvenience not only personal to themselves, but which, I believe, extends to the political systems which they work. I believe the eminent men who came over here four years ago found when they got home that political matters had by no means prospered during their absence. And we must remember that this Conference, if summoned, is a Conference purely of advice. They are not a Parliament which can pass Resolutions which will have practical effect. They are not even negotiators, a Conference in the diplomatic sense, which can bind the authorities from whom they came. The votes they give or any view they may have may be entirely repudiated by each colony from which they are deputed. Under these circumstances it seems to me we should be very careful only to make use of that instrument when we have some definite question to ask and some definite proposition to lay before them, which can be canvassed by the colonies which send them forth before they come, so that they may come here with a definite mandate which we know will be respected and upheld. Any other course, I fear, must lead to confusion. My Lords, I appeal to your own experience. You as a body have the power of summoning a Conference—one of the most august Conferences of the realm. You can summon the 12 Judges to give you advice; but suppose instead of laying before the 12 Judges certain definite questions which you desire to solve you were to merely ask them to give their opinions generally upon certain subjects on which you may be engaged, I am afraid the result would not lead to the explanation or illustration of the law. Now, looking at the Conference from that point of view, I confess I do not see what are the definite propositions which we are to submit to so distinguished a body if we invoke its assistance. My noble Friend has indicated two directions in which the Debates which he wishes to evoke would go. The first (I will give it in his own words; he has inverted the Order in his Motion) is the formation of a fund for certain purposes of Imperial defence. Now, of course, when you ask people to come together for the formation of a fund, they generally feel that that will end in an appeal to their pockets. No one imagines, when you ask them to come together for the formation of a fund, that it is for the purpose of putting anything into their pockets, and I am afraid the colonists might answer us:—"Imperial defence gets on very well now—the money comes from somewhere, and if you propose that the colonies should pay less than they do now, well, we do not object to it. But it would be very difficult to form any propositions upon that basis. If you propose the colonies should pay more than they do now," (and one alternative or the other is necessary if you are to propose any change at all)—"we should like to consider the matter at-home for some time before we join your deliberations." I do not think the proposal to ask the colonists to come here to be taxed for larger contributions for Imperial defence would excite that enthusiasm throughout the Empire which my noble Friend seems to anticipate. But there is another difficulty in the way. "Colonies," unfortunately, is one of those vague words which cover so many things. The colonies which ought to be summoned to meet together in conference and which will contribute to this new war fund are the self-governing colonies. But when we talk of coaling stations and the protection of trade routes and the establishment of fast cruisers to protect our commerce we are not thinking exclusively of the self-governing colonies. We are thinking of other colonies as well, and I may say in a greater degree. For instance: I do not know of any coaling stations protecting trade routes which can be connected with our great North American colonies. How could we ask them to join in subscribing money to establish coaling stations for the protection of our trade routes? There are one or two, I believe, in respect of which the interests of our Australian colonies may be invoked; but in the main it is not the self-governing colonies, it is the Crown colonies and our great dependency of India whose trade has to be protected by these fast cruisers and coaling stations. I join with my noble Friend in all the anathemas he has invoked upon any Government which from motives of economy neglect them; but I do not think that we should advance the matter by asking the great Colonies of Australasia and of North America to join us in contributing to an expenditure for a system of defence in which their interests are, at all events, of a secondary kind. I do not think, therefore, that we have any proposition to lay before the colonies of a sufficiently definite and fruitful character in reference to the creation of a special war fund to justify us at the present moment in summoning a Conference on the subject. I do not, however, wish to enter into any negative engagements in the matter. I can quite imagine a state of things, whether partial or complete, in which a Conference or certain communications with the colonies may be very desirable; but, speaking merely from the present state of things, and from the circumstances which now surround us, I cannot see that we have any proposition to lay before the colonies. Now I come to the other, far graver and more important portion of my noble Friend's proposal. My noble Friend's proposal practically is that we and the colonies should enter into a tariff arrangement to discriminate in favour of the productions of the Empire as against those of all the rest of the world. I am not going to use any deprecatory language of my noble Friend's proposal. We are surrounded by discriminating tariffs on all sides. Outside these Islands he is the greatest statesman who can propose the most discriminating tariffs. We have no ground for thinking that the Protectionist wave which has been sweeping over civilised opinion has yet reached its crown, and therefore we must needs speak with respect of such opinion, and we cannot dismiss and simply pooh-pooh any suggestions which are made. Even quite recently the French Committee on the Tariff has recommended, I believe, a discriminating Customs' Duty in favour of the French colonies of as much as 50 per cent. It will be an interesting experiment when it comes to work. My noble Friend's argument did not very clearly show in what light he regarded in the abstract such discriminating legislation. I should rather have said—I may be wrong—that in the abstract he disapproved it, but that, as retaliation, as defence against fiscal enterprises which are going on all around us, there was a good deal to be said on its behalf. Well, I am not in the least prepared to enter the lists against him on that subject. I know that I shall meet with a severe critic in the noble Earl opposite when I say that I have never yet been able to see the objection to the principle of retaliation as an essential part of the doctrine of Free Trade. We love peace, but that does not prevent us from keeping up an Army and a Navy, and from using them if necessary. We love Free Trade, but that need not prevent us from instituting retaliatory duties, if those duties should seem to us necessary and expedient. But whilst I have not the least desire or intention of meeting my noble Friend on the question of principle or arguing a very difficult economical question, I wish to meet him on the more familiar and easy ground of political possibility. I ask him to look at the state of opinion in this country, especially the state of mercantile opinion, the state of opinion in our commercial, manufacturing, and industrial centres, the state of opinion, above all, among the capitalists and the most educated classes, and say if he sees the slightest chance within any period to which we have a right to look forward of such a modification of opinion in this country as will enable any statesman, whatever his opinion may be, to propose the establishment of retaliatory duties. It seems to me to be absolutely out of the question. If you wish to set up a discriminating system in favour of the colonies as against the rest of the world, just consider what are the goods on which you would have to levy a heavy duty in this country in order to make that discrimination felt. They are grain, wool, meat. What chance have you of inducing the people of this country to accept legislation which would make these essential articles of consumption susceptible of such tariffs? I see no probability whatever of it. That being the case, I think we should be hardly behaving respectfully to the colonies if we asked them to send to a Conference to discuss a question when we know that the answer which many of them, at all events many of their statesmen, would give must be met immediately on our part by the intimation that such a thing is absolutely impossible. Whenever such a modification of English opinion takes place—if ever it takes place—so that this idea of discrimination of duties in favour of colonial produce shall be a fiscal possibility, I, at all events, shall not oppose the wish of my noble Friend to have the matter thoroughly discussed between ourselves and the colonies. But I hold that we are bound, if we ask them to attend a Conference, to lay before them propositions which we believe not only to be salutary, but practicable, and to ask them questions to which practical answers can be given. These conditions are not satisfied by the present state of things, and therefore for the present we think that the summoning of a Conference is not expedient.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I ask your Lordships' permission to withdraw the Motion; but before doing so, perhaps the House will let me say a few words. As far as I am concerned the noble Marquess attributes to me an intention which I really have not got; that is to say, I do not propose preferential treatment within the Empire for the purpose of retaliation. I unfortunately differ from the noble Marquess in that respect. I have very little faith indeed in retaliation. I should propose preferential treatment merely for the purpose of encouraging and developing the trade of our own colonies, and for the particular purpose which I mentioned of creating a strong tie for uniting the Empire together. I shall not argue the matter, because the argument would be very lengthy; but so far as I am concerned I wish to enter my protest against the assumption that any duty, or a duty which would be sufficient to give a preference to British goods, would have any appreciative effect whatever in increasing the price of food stuffs in this country. But that would be a large matter to argue. I should have to explain the immense development in the food-producing capacity of the world; I should also have to explain the great cheapening of practical necessities of life such as tea, coffee, cocoa, and other foods which are colonial products. But I am not going into all that. I simply do not wish it to be supposed that I am advocating the imposition of duties which could possibly have the effect of increasing the cost of the necessaries of life to the people of this country.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

STANDING COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That a Standing Committee be appointed for the consideration of such Public Bills as may be committed to it by the House.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

Appointed: The Lords following, with the Chairman of Committees, were named of the Committee.

L. Privy Seal.	L. Balfour.
(E. Cadogan.)	L. Foxford.
E. Cowper.	(E. Limerick.)
E. Stanhope.	L. Colville of Culross.
V. Oxenbridge.	L. Kensington.

The Committee to meet on Tuesday next, at half-past Two o'clock.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till To-morrow, at a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 12th February, 1891.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

CENTRAL LONDON RAILWAY BILL.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [9th February,]

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to whom the Central London Railway Bill is committed, that they have power to consider the propriety of inserting clauses in the Bill requiring payment to the Local Authority of a royalty or a share of the earnings of the Railway, after fair interest on capital and working expenses have been provided for as compensation for the right to tunnel under the public streets."—(Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton.)

Question again proposed.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I beg to withdraw this Motion with a view of taking the discussion upon the principle involved in it upon the South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LANCASHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL BILL

(by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(3.10.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): Although I have no objection to allowing this Bill to proceed, I think the attention of the House ought to be directed to it. It is a Bill promoted by the Lancashire County Council. Last year it was proposed that County Councils should have power to promote Bills in this House, but the proposal was rejected. It is, nevertheless, contended that by the nature of their existence they have power to promote Private Bills, and I do not think that in an ordinary case this House would interfere with them. If they were to introduce an improper measure there would be the means of stopping them, and it is within the power of the Local Government Board to disallow expenses that have been improperly incurred. In this case the Lancashire County Council are proceeding at their own risk, and I do not suggest that the House ought to interfere with them, because if they are incurring expenses they have no right to incur, there will be means of correcting the evil. I only think that it ought to be brought distinctly to the knowledge of the House that this is a Bill which is promoted by the Lancashire County Council.

(3.13.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I wish to ask whether, in the event of the expenses incurred in promoting the Bill being disallowed by the Local Government Board, they would have to be borne by the individual members of the Lancashire County Council? Is it contended that they would not have the power of introducing an indemnity Bill?

(3.14.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has called attention to this Bill. Like himself, I am entirely in favour of the principle of the measure, but while I am in favour of the principle I also agree that neither the Lancashire County Council nor any other County Council has power to spend money upon the promotion of a Private Bill. The question was raised during the discussion of the Local Government Act, and it was decided that no such power should be conferred. Notwithstanding that fact, the Lancashire County Council are promoting this Bill, the object of which is a very good one. Other authorities have incurred expense in promoting Bills which they had no power to promote. If the Auditor in auditing the accounts of a Local Authority sees that expenditure has been incurred which the Local Authority was not warranted by law in incurring, it would be his duty to disallow it. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Lawson) asks me what would be the consequence in the case of this particular Bill if the auditor were to disallow the expenses. I imagine that the amount would be surcharged on the members who were responsible for the expenditure and who had signed the accounts. I do not think it would be necessary in that case to bring in a bill of indemnity, but an appeal from the decision of the auditor to the Local Government Board would probably be preferred. The Local Government Board would then look into the matter, both from a legal and an equitable point of view, and if they thought proper they would remit the surcharge. It is quite clear that a County Council has no right to promote such a Bill, and if they incur any expenditure in such a case it is at their own risk.

Question put, and agreed to.

SOUTH KENSINGTON AND PADDINGTON SUBWAY BILL—(by Order.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time.

(3.20.) Mr. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): Before the Bill is read a second time, and we proceed to the discussion of the Instruction of which the hon. Member for North St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton) has given notice, I wish to enter a protest against the conduct of the promoters in regard to the measure. The Bill proposes to make a subterranean railway from Bishop's Road, Paddington, under Kensington Gardens and the Albert Hall, with a station in South

Mr. Ritchie

Kensington at a point which is, I believe, in the parish of St. John's, Westminster. The scheme raises a very important Metropolitan question—I had almost said a question of national interest, because the duty of preserving Kensington Gardens may be said to be one of national interest. I endeavoured yesterday to get the promoters of the Bill to adjourn the Second Reading until next week, but failed. It is obviously a question which ought not to be sent to a Committee upstairs in haste. An opportunity should be given to the Metropolitan Members and to the inhabitants of London generally of expressing their opinion upon the proposed invasion of the amenities of Kensington Gardens. Yet, not a single day has been allowed. In regard to other Bills the London County Council and the City Corporation have always been most obliging in fixing the Second Reading for a date that would suit the convenience of all who desired to oppose it, but the result of the tactics of the promoters in this instance is that I have not been able to communicate with the Metropolitan Members, and the people of London have had no opportunity of expressing their opinion in regard to it. I should like to ask why the promoters are so nervously anxious to force the Bill through the House. Promoters generally invite discussion, but I am afraid that in this case they consider that the more the Bill is looked at the less it will be liked. In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Devonport (Sir J. Puleston) I do not feel justified in attacking the Bill on its merits, but I make this protest in the hope that public attention will be called to the fact that Kensington Gardens are proposed to be tunnelled under and a station erected in the Gardens, for no other purpose than to bring money into the tills of the Albert Hall. I hope that before the Third Reading a sufficiently strong public opinion will have been aroused to save Kensington Gardens from this fate, and to prevent this iniquitous Bill from becoming law.

*(3.23.) Mr. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I am not concerned in the promotion of this Bill, but I believe that it proposes to construct a new line between Paddington and South Kensington, by a subway under Kensington Gardens, and I hope the House will not at this stage interpose any difficulty in its way. Without possessing any certain knowledge on the subject, I believe that the amenities of Kensington Gardens will not be interfered with, and there will be a full opportunity after the Bill has been in Committee of considering it on the Third Reading. At the present moment my constituents and the people of South Kensington and Brompton are obliged to make a very long circuit in order to get to North Kensington and Paddington, and in their interests I must support the Second Reading.

(3.25.) MR. COURTNEY: It is only fair to say that, as far as I know, the promoters of this Bill have done nothing unusual, nor have afforded ground for an attack that would prevent the measure from going before a Select Committee.

COLONEL MAKINS (Essex, S.E.): I support the Bill in the interests of the Albert Hall, and I feel with regard to Kensington Gardens that the public user is perfectly safe in the hands of the Chief Commissioner of Works, who would oppose anything that would be likely to be injurious to the Gardens.

*MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I think, after hearing the hon. Member for Peckham, the House will be surprised to hear that the action of the promoters of the Bill has met with the approval of the First Commissioner of Works, and also the proposal to erect a station in Kensington Gardens.

Question put, and agreed to.

*(3.26.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: I beg to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to whom the South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill is committed, that they consider the propriety of inserting clauses in the Bill requiring payment to the Local Authority of a royalty, or a share of the earnings of the Subway, after fair interest on capital and working expenses have been provided for, as compensation for the right to tunnel under the public streets."

It was intended to raise the very important question involved in this Instruction upon the Central London Railway Bill on a permissive Instruction, but it has been thought to be more in order to have a mandatory Instruction. The same question arises on both Bills, and also upon a third Tunnel Bill which will subsequently come before the House.

How many more Bills of the same character may come before the House it is impossible to say. The experiment of establishing the first tunnel railway (from London Bridge to Stockwell) has been a success both in an engineering and a financial point of view, and there is no doubt that this success will lead to other schemes, in which the public will be ready to invest their capital. The question assumes, therefore, very great importance in the interests of the public. The promoters of these Bills propose to avail themselves of the soil under the public streets, and to carry their railways to a large extent under the public streets. The present Bill proposes to empower the Company to make a tunnel railway from Paddington to South Kensington, without the payment or compensation to any one for the tunnel under the streets, to enter houses within 100 yards of the works, to shore them up and to repair any damage that may arise from subsidence. This particular tunnel railway will be very near the surface of the road, whereas some of the other tunnels are 30, 40, 50, and 60 feet beneath it. The idea is to carry the tunnel under the roads, so as to avoid the compensation which would have to be paid if it were made through private property. My contention is that the public have a right to claim compensation for the use of the sub-soil under the public streets. I know it will be suggested that the absolute freehold of the sub-soil is not vested in any public authority, but the public have a right to use the surface of the road and to use the sub-soil also for subways and for gas and water pipes, electric wires, and other purposes. The shadowy right of the landowner is hardly worth considering, as for all practical purposes the public are the owners of the roads and the sub-soil under them. In order to save expense we have now a private company coming here asking for legislative powers to use the sub-soil of the roads without paying anything for it, and also to secure other advantages in connection with the use of the roads. If they were to carry their tunnel 25 yards either one side or the other they would impinge upon private property, and have to pay enormous sums in the shape of compensation; but they ingeniously contrive to carry their tunnel through public property and thus to avoid any such payment. I think, however, that the public have a moral, if not a strictly legal, claim to some substantial consideration. If the company say the sub-soil of the roads does not belong to the public, my answer is that it does not belong to the company, and if the public have no right neither have the company any right whatever. Indeed, they are now coming to Parliament to acquire the right. It is suggested that the public would be protected by giving the County Council power to purchase this tunnel railway on the lines of the purchase provisions of the Tramways Act of 1870. The absurdity of that proposition needs only to be stated to carry its own refutation with it. It is universally admitted that it is impossible to put in force the Purchase Clauses of the Act of 1870 without further legislation. In fact, I know of no way in which to protect the public except by imposing a rent or royalty, or by taking a share of earnings after the payment of interest on capital and working expenses. I do not ask for a confiscatory royalty or a heavy share of the earnings. On the contrary, I desire that only a fair amount should be paid by the company for the benefit acquired under the Bill. I do not believe that a provision of this kind would seriously embarrass the company. It is quite true that the Tunnel Railway from London Bridge to Stockwell has not been placed under these conditions, but that was an experiment, and favourable conditions were granted, in order to induce the public to invest their money. As the experiment has been successful, such favourable conditions are not necessary, and provisions in the interest of the public are now only reasonable. I do not propose to order the Select Committee to insert particular or definite clauses in the Bill, but simply to direct them to consider the propriety of inserting clauses such as those which I suggest, and, unless this Instruction is agreed to, I am afraid that the question which I am raising will not be fairly before the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to whom the South Kensington and Paddington Subway Bill is committed, that they consider the propriety of inserting clauses in the Bill requiring payment to the Local Authority of a royalty, or a share in the earnings of the Subway, after fair interest and working expenses have been provided for, as compensation for the right to tunnel under the public streets."—(Mr. T. H. Bolton.)

(340.) COLONEL MAKINS: The hon. Member has enunciated an entirely new principle, and I think it rather hard that this particular company should be made the vile corpus for trying the experiment. Powers of this kind are never granted by Parliament to any company except for the public benefit, and they will take care that the public get the benefit in one way or the other. It has never before been the practice, in regard either to schemes for gas or water, or the laying down of electric wires, to make the public partners with a private company. The pecuniary interests of the public are protected in the Bill, because if the line is made and turns out as profitable as its promoters hope, a large sum will be put into the public coffers by way of rates. I hope the hon. Member will not press the Instruction.

(343.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): Having taken considerable interest in these tunnel schemes for several years, I wish to make one or two observations. The question is not, I understand, debarred from the consideration of the Committee, and therefore I think the Committee ought to be left entirely free, as they have been heretofore. My hon. Friend who has spoken on behalf of the public cannot ignore the fact that no Committee will sanction the scheme unless they believe it to be in the interests of the public. The experiment has been tried on the other side of the water and has been attended with success, and the principle now advocated is that the County Council, while contributing nothing towards a scheme which may be a failure, shall nevertheless share the profit if it is a success. There is nothing given up by the community, and I hope my hon. Friend will allow the matter to rest with the Committee, and not attempt to hamper their decision or relieve them from the responsibility which ought to rest with them. I should be quite ready to give consideration to a proposal to enable the County Councils, Corporations, or other Local Authorities to carry out these undertakings for themselves; but it is not fair to private companies for the public to stand over them and say, "We will take a share of your profits, but we will not take upon ourselves the responsibility of carrying out the undertaking."

*(3.47.) MR. LAWSON: My hon. Friend is wrong in thinking that this railway is asked to pay anything to the County Council. The only desire is to lay down the principle that the Local Authority, whatever it may be, shall have some profit from the user of the subsoil for a subway. I would not vote for the Instruction if I thought it would in the least degree embarrass the enterprise, but the Instruction itself lays down that a fair profit as well as the working expenses shall be paid before any royalty goes to the public. In the case of tramways, it has been laid down that the Local Authority shall have power to purchase after 21 years. When these enterprises are extended, as they undoubtedly will be, now that the tunnel railway on the other side of the water has become a success, there will be an increased difficulty in developing underground communications in any direction, on account of the use already made of the ground under the great arteries of communication. It is virtually impossible for the Committee upstairs to insert in the Bill similar clauses to those which were inserted in the Tramways Act, as nobody would wish to see our Local Authorities try to run our underground railways, and it will, consequently, be impossible for the Local Authority to obtain any compensation in that form or return for the user of the subsoil. I admit that benefit will be conferred by giving facilities to the public in the way of communication, but I think the House would do well to draw the attention of the Committee to the point, even if the Committee refuse to insert any such clause dealing with the question.

*(3.52.) MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth): I object to the Instruction on two grounds—first, on legal grounds, and secondly, on the ground of equity. So far as the law is concerned the hon. Member for St. Pancras has admitted that he has not a perfect case to put before the House. The veriest tyro in law as to public rights in land knows that the fee simple of a road is not vested in the Public Authority. He therefore asks the Committee to do that which in the present state of the law is absolutely illegal. And so far as equity is concerned I venture to think that there is a strong case against the Instruction. I am afraid that the hon. Member has not recognised how unduly the Railway Companies who provide under-ground communication between different parts of London are handicapped. They are heavily taxed, while the omnibuses have very little to pay indeed, and are allowed to pass freely over pavements which are laid down, repaired, and cleansed at the public expense. One under-ground railway alone, whose net revenue last year amounted to £208,000 contributed £25,435 in taxes and Government duty; in other words, it had to pay half-a-crown out of every sovereign of net income it earned in the shape of local rates and Government duty. The Omnibus Companies which are earning handsome dividends are subject to no rating or taxation of the kind. I therefore venture to think that the present proposal ought not to be entertained by the House.

*(3.55.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): As a Metropolitan Member I should like to say a word or two upon this proposition. It seems to me a reasonable proposition that some part of the benefit of these undertakings should go to the locality. No doubt the undertakings are rated to some extent; but despite that fact, I think the time has come, inasmuch as these subways will become very numerous, when a step in this direction should be taken, as it is an absurdity to suppose that the London County Council can undertake these speculations for themselves.

(3.57.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I listened with attention to what fell from the hon. Member for Walworth (Mr. Isaacs), but I must remind him that, so far as omnibuses are concerned, anyone can place them upon the roads; whereas we are asked now to give Parliamentary powers to a private company, and to hand over to them a distinct monopoly. We are told that this Instruction should not be passed because something similar was not put in the Tramways Act; but under the Tramways Act the Local Authority have a right to purchase the tramways after 21 years, and the Tramway Companies are bound to repair the whole of the roads on which their lines run, as also 18 inches on each side. I would ask those hon. Gentlemen who insist so much upon the legal aspect of the question, what contributions it is intended under the Bill shall be given to the freeholder? Have the company consulted him? If he has a right to the subsoil of the road, are they not asking the House to give them powers to ride roughshod over the interests of the very persons whom they now so kindly take under their wings. In my opinion no reason has been given why the Instruction should not be agreed to, and it is only right that if these great facilities are given to speculative companies, the public should maintain some lien, for the benefit of the community, on the monopolies thus created.

(4.3.) MR. COURTNEY: Undoubtedly the hon. Member for North St. Pancras has brought a very grave question before the House, and I think he deserves our thanks for having done so. But the Instruction is open to the objection which he had to urge the other day in regard to the Instruction moved in the Leicester case, namely, that it orders the Committee to do something which they have a perfect right to do without it, and this raises the presumption that a particular course is recommended by the House. I am not for a moment saying it is not desirable that the interests of the localities should be looked at, and the fact that subways have been made without a provision of this kind being insisted upon is no presumption against beginning now. One way of attaining the object of the hon. Member for North St. Pancras is by providing that, after the profits of the company have reached a certain point, arrangements could be made for cheap fares; another is the payment of a fixed rent; and a third is by entitling the locality, after a certain period, to acquire the undertaking. I would strongly urge the hon. Member to withdraw the Instruction, and leave the various points that have been raised to the Committee upstairs.

(4.7.) MR. JAMES (Gateshead): The hon. Member for North St. Pancras has laid before the House a somewhat plausible plan, but I do not agree with him that the undertaking on the other side of the water has yet been proved to be not only a physical but a financial success. I think it is altogether premature as yet to say that that undertaking has been of a nature to secure the full confidence of the public. I will not attempt to enter into the legal question further than that by saying, that if this Instruction is agreed to it will necessarily complicate and add to the legal difficulties. The whole question was carefully gone into and considered by a Committee last year, and there was a general opinion that the Local Authority ought to regard the promoters of schemes of this kind as their best friends. Unless something is done to relieve the present congested state of the streets there will be no alternative but for the Local Authority to construct new routes, at an enormous cost.

(4.10.) MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I think it is perfectly clear that the soil which will be interfered with by the construction of this railway is not the property of the Local Authority at all, but of the owners of the adjoining land; and if the legal question is raised I am afraid the result will be to put money into the hands of the private owners instead of the Local Authority. The soil is only vested in the Local Authority down to a certain depth, such as is necessary for the construction for an ordinary street. I think it is quite clear if the Instruction is not withdrawn the results may be the reverse of what the hon. Member who has moved it desires to see.

(4.11) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I would suggest to my hon. Friend the Member for North St. Pancras that as his object has been accomplished in having brought this very important subject before the House, he should now, after the discussion which has taken place, withdraw the Instruction.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: After the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees, and on the understanding that the suggestions contained in the Instruction will receive the attention of the Committee, I beg leave to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

LONDON WATER SUPPLY.

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called by the Official Examiner to the condition and quality of the water supplied by the Grand Junction Water Company; whether he is aware it is the worst sample delivered by the company during the past 12 years, that it contains 50 per cent. more volatile matter, 300 per cent. more saline ammonia, and 250 per cent. more organic ammonia than the water supplied on the same day by the Chelsea Water Company drawing from the same source, and that it also exhibited marked browning on ignition of solids; whether the information now in his possession confirms his statement of 31st July, 1890, that there is "no abundant vegetation or cut grass, &c., spread about the Thames Valley," to account for the condition of the water; whether his advisers are still prepared to deny contamination with sewage, and will certify that this water is fit for human consumption; what position does Dr. Tidy hold with relation to the Local Government Board, and by whom his salary, as water examiner, is paid; how many weeks' supply is stored by the Grand Junction Company; and what steps the President has taken to compel the company (after his answer that the filtration power was deficient) to create a larger storage and filtration?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention has from time to time been called by the Official Examiner to the condition and quality of the water supplied by the Grand Junction Water Company. When a question was asked in the House on the 31st July last with regard to this company, I stated that the attention of the Directors had been repeatedly called to the necessity for increased filtering area, and that they had recently intimated that the construction of additional filters would be undertaken without delay. The Directors in accordance with this undertaking obtained plans and estimates, and in the autumn of last year entered into a contract for the construction of filters, having an area of about six acres. The works were unfortunately interrupted by the severe frost during part of November, December, and January. Work has since been resumed and is now making active progress; but as a matter of fact so far as the means at the disposal of the company for filtration are concerned, the company are at present in precisely the same position as in July last, when I gave the answer referred to. The sample of the water delivered by the company to which my hon. Friend refers, is, I presume the sample which is referred to in the Report of an analysis by Mr. Cassal with which he has been so good as to supply me. This sample appears to have been submitted to the analyst on the 30th January. I am not in the position to make any statement as to the accuracy or otherwise of the analysis referred to. But I may state that I am advised by Dr. Frankland that the proportions of volatile matter, saline ammonia, and organic ammonia, furnish no evidence of sewage contamination. Analysis of a sample of water that was taken by Dr. Frankland on the 22nd January last showed that the water delivered by this company was the best of the Thames derived waters. After notice was given of the question of my hon. Friend, I arranged for further samples to be taken, and to be analysed. These samples were obtained on the 5th February, and Dr. Frankland, in his Report, states that they both contained a very large proportion of organic matter, chiefly of vegetable origin, and that during the 23 years in which he has submitted the waters delivered by the eight companies supplying London to the same process of organic analysis he has never met with a sample so strongly contaminated with organic matter, and that only on one occasion, in 1868, was there a near approach to this degree of pollution. The water is described as being repulsive both to the eye and palate, and he states that its supply for human consumption was undesirable. But he says that the excess of contamination is due to the presence of an altogether abnormal amount of vegetable organic matter in solution, that the Thames always contains some soluble constituents of sewage more or less changed by various processes of purification, and that he could find no evidence of any additional amount of these constituents in the two samples of the company's water sent to him for analysis. He thinks that in Mr. Cassal's analysis there was nothing to justify the assertion that sewage contamination exists. As to the circumstances which would account for the condition of things referred to, I am informed that in consequence of continuous rain on the 29th January, the first subsequent to the breaking up of the frost, the Thames was in an exceedingly muddy and turbid condition on the 30th January and following days; and owing to the fact that the filters were covered during the frost with ice of about a foot in thickness, there was great difficulty in cleaning them, and they were not in good condition at the time mentioned, and were incapable of dealing with the water turned on to them. The considerable difference in the qualities of the Grand Junction and the Chelsea water on the occasions referred to is accounted for by the fact that the Chelsea Company have a larger storage than the Grand Junction Company, and can discard the flood water, which the latter company are not able to do. The storage and settling reservoirs of the Grand Junction Company do not contain more than three and a half days' supply of water, those of the Chelsea Company are capable of containing 15 days' supply. Dr. Tidy holds no position in relation to the Local Government Board. I believe that he is the chemical adviser to certain of the Water Companies, and is paid by those who employ him. As I have already stated, the filtration works to which I referred in my previous answer are being proceeded with; but I cannot but add that I regard it as extremely unsatisfactory that water of this character should have been supplied, and further that the difficulties on which the company rely as an excuse, ought not and would not have occurred if they had had a proper storage and filtration area.

HANDCUFFING PRISONERS.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that the practice of marching prisoners, handcuffed together in long lines, through the streets of Chester still continues; and whether he proposes to take any steps in the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have made inquiry both of the Chief Constable of the Borough and of the County. The former reports that, according to the invariable practice for years, prisoners are not marched through the streets at all, but conveyed in cabs or vans. The latter reports that it is not the practice to handcuff prisoners, unless it is absolutely necessary for their safe custody, but that it has been found advisable to use handcuffs in the case of prisoners coming from a certain district where riotous elements exist, and there was reason to anticipate attempts at rescue or escape. I have written to the Chief Constable, saying that, as a rule, it is very undesirable to march prisoners handcuffed through the streets, and asking whether some other means cannot be devised for meeting the particular danger which he specifies.

BARBED WIRES.

MR. BRUNNER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has now informed himself as to the second death in Cheshire in 1890 caused by a wound from barbed wire; and whether he is now contemplating legislation forbidding the use of barbed wire at the sides of public roads and footpaths?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have obtained from the Coroner the depositions in the case referred to. It appears that the deceased was a farmer, and that whilst engaged in driving some cows from one field to another his hand came in contact with some barbed wire fence which was placed along a quick-set fence to prevent the fence being injured by cattle, and that the death was occasioned by blood-poisoning caused by the wound. The evidence does not show that the fencing in this case was at the side of a public road or footpath.

*MR. BRUNNER: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the second part of the question, namely, whether he is contemplating legislation forbidding the use of barbed wires? Now that the planting of spring guns and mantraps has been prohibited ought not barbed wires also to follow in their wake?

*MR. RITCHIE: I certainly see a great difference between the one and the other; but I may inform the hon. Gentleman that the Government are not contemplating legislation.

INSTRUCTION IN DAIRY WORK.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the demand for instruction in dairy work in Munster; and whether he will advise the appointment of a Government instructor in dairy work in the Province?

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received any communications from the Irish Industrial League, on the subject of instruction in dairy work by competent Government instructors, and whether, as Ireland labours under great disadvantage in competing with such rivals as Denmark and Sweden, where efficient teaching in all agricultural matters is supplied by the State, he will favourably consider, and recommend to the Government, the appointment of suitable dairy instructors in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In answer to this question, and to that of my hon. Friend which stands next, I would say that I am far from doubting that a knowledge of the most improved methods of dairying is of great importance in Munster. I must remind them that in addition to such facilities as are given to the localities to provide instruction under the Technical Instruction Act of 1889, the Government have aided in supplying, through the Munster Model Farm and through the National Board, a competent knowledge of the subject to many hundreds of persons.

THE PATENT OFFICE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is within his knowledge that, while the official journal of the Patent Office prefixes to its list of abridgments an intimation that there are many important classes of specifications, including hydraulics, railway signals and carriages, paper making, steam engines, spinning, production and application of gas, and ventilation, of which no abridgments have been published for a quarter of a century, while several of those published before 1866 are out of print; whether under the heads of electricity and chemicals, with their various sub-divisions, any abridgments have been issued since 1876, except since 1883, in the costly volumes of the illustrated journal; whether the subject-matter index from 1856 to 1883 is out of print; and whether, in view of the Patent Office fees and publications, yielding a surplus revenue of nearly £100,000 a year, steps are likely to be taken to expedite the Patent Office publications and bring them up to date?

"Inventors are strongly recommended, before applying for patents, to consult the Abridgments of Specifications,"

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Abridgment of Specifications in the Patent Office is a work which was only commenced within a comparatively recent period, but it is being now pushed forward as speedily as possible, and I estimate that during the financial year ended March 31, 16,000 specifications will have been abridged, and that approximately the same rate of progress will be maintained until the arrears are of my hon. Friend, I arranged for further samples to be taken, and to be analysed. These samples were obtained on the 5th February, and Dr. Frankland, in his Report, states that they both contained a very large proportion of organic matter, chiefly of vegetable origin, and that during the 23 years in which he has submitted the waters delivered by the eight companies supplying London to the same process of organic analysis he has never met with a sample so strongly contaminated with organic matter, and that only on one occasion, in 1868, was there a near approach to this degree of pollution. MR. BRUNNER The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the second part of the question, namely, whether he is contemplating legislation forbidding the use of barbed wire? Now that the planting of spring guano and manures has been prohibited ought not barbed wires also to follow in their wake?

MR. RITCHIE: I certainly see a great difference between the one and the other; but I may inform the hon. Gentleman that the Government are not contemplating legislation.

INSTRUCTION IN DAIRY WORK.

I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the demand for instruction in dairy work in Munster, and whether he will advise the appointment of a Government instructor in dairy work in the Province?

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, E.) I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received any communications from the Irish Industrial League, in the subject of instruction in dairy work by competent Government instructors, and whether, as Ireland labours under great disadvantage in competing with such rivals as Denmark and Sweden, where efficient teaching in all agricultural matters is supplied by the State, he will favourably consider, and recommend to the Government, the appointment of suitable dairy instructors in Ireland?

THE PATENT OFFICE.

MR. LANG (London, E.) I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is within his knowledge that, while the official journal of the Patent Office continues to be out of abridgements at intervals of time.

*Inventions are strongly recommended before applying to the Patent Office to consult the Abridgements of Specifications.

There are many important classes of specifications, including hydraulic machinery, railway signals and engines, paper making, steam engines, spinning, production and improvement of coal and ventilation, of which no abridgements have been published for a century or a century, while several of those published before 1800 are out of print, whether under the terms of copyright and otherwise, and thus the public are deprived of any abridgements have been issued since 1800, except since 1800, in the only volume of the Patent Office Journal; whether the subject-matter index from 1800 to 1880 is out of print; and whether, in view of the Patent Office has not produced yielding a surplus revenue of nearly £100,000 a year which are likely to be taken to extend the Patent Office publications and bring them up to date?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. M. H. BROWN, Bristol, E.) The Abridgement of Specifications in the Patent Office is a work which was in preparation for a long time, and is now nearly finished, and is being now printed forward as speedily as possible, and I estimate that during the financial year ended March 31, 1891, specifications will have been abridged, and that approximately the same rate of progress will be maintained until the arrears are overtaken. Abridgments of only three classes are out of print, and I am not aware of any large demand for a reprint of these. I may inform the House that the abridgments for the subjects of electricity, acids, alkalis, oxides and salts, and benzine and carbon derivatives, have been published up to 1876; and as regards the period between 1877 and 1883, the bulk of them have been made and are now in course of printing. The subject-matter index for 1856 to 1883 is out of print, but it has been widely distributed. For the future, its place will be taken by indexes to abridgment classes.

MAGAZINE RIFLES.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the 100 Mark II. magazine rifles will be reported on before larger quantities are manufactured; whether the 2,000 now turned out weekly are Mark I.; and whether, out of an issue of 100,000, 45,000 were returned for repairs within the year?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The present intention is that the 100 rifles of Mark II. should be reported on before others are manufactured; consequently the 2,000 a week now turned out are of Mark I. The total issue of Mark I. has been 44,500, of which, within the year, 3,720 have been returned for repair, being about 8.13 per cent. of the issue; but among these were included the arms exchanged for new rifles by the battalions which were ordered abroad, so that the number returned in actual need of repair was considerably under 8 per cent., and not 45 per cent., as my hon. Friend suggests.

NAVAL WIDOWS' AND ORPHANS' FUND.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has yet been able to overcome the "financial difficulties," which he has stated more than once he has experienced in obtaining from the Treasury the proceeds of mulcts, fines, unclaimed prize money, &c., in order to enable him to carry out, to some extent at least, the recommendations of the Duke of Edinburgh's Committee; and whether, since the widows and orphans of the men lost in H.M.S. Serpent had to appeal to public charity, he will consider the desirability of establishing a Naval Widows' and Orphans' Fund?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): It has been decided not to attempt to establish a General Widows' Fund on the lines proposed by the Duke of Edinburgh's Committee in 1885. The unclaimed wages and effects of deceased seamen and marines are now paid over to the funds of Greenwich Hospital. There are grave difficulties in the way of similarly appropriating mulcts, fines, and unclaimed prize money. There is a Naval Widows' and Orphans' Fund, from which the widows and orphans of all men whose deaths are directly due to the Service receive pensions. The widows and orphans of the men lost in H.M.S. Serpent are now being assisted from this source. The capitalised value of the annuities either paid or payable is about £24,000.

STEAM COLLIERIES FOR THE FLEET.

ADMIRAL MAYNE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the necessity for steam colliers which can keep up with the Fleet, and also supply our coaling stations, with a minimum risk of capture, he will consider the advisability of offering some inducement to shipbuilders to build fast vessels for this work?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: There are about 120 vessels on the Admiralty list of ships suitable for "cruiser colliers." The fastest of these are 12 knot ships, the average about 11 knots, which speed it is considered would be ample to enable them to cruise with a fleet. If necessary, faster ships could be adapted to the work in a short time. We do not consider special inducements to build fast vessels necessary.

THE SULTAN.

ADMIRAL MAYNE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is proposed to lay down an additional battleship to take the place of the Sultan, which was included in the Scheme of the Strength of the Navy of England relative to those of Foreign Powers in the Naval Defence Programme, and has since been struck off?

LORD G. HAMILTON: When the programme of new construction is more advanced we will consider the question of repairing and re-engineing the Sultan. In the meantime, we do not propose to add to the number of battleships building. The progress of the new ships laid down since 1889 has been so rapid that the relative position of the English Navy as regards new construction, compared with that of Foreign Navies, has much improved during the last two years.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

MR. MAGUIRE (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the acknowledged distress in the Innishowen Division of the County Donegal, he can see his way to provide relief works by the construction of boat slips, shelter piers, and roads, more particularly in the Urris and Clonmany districts, for the protection of the fishermen's interests and the better development of the Division?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member will understand, from previous answers which have been given to similar questions, that I can make no specific reply at present.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Can the right hon. Gentleman now give us any information as to when any portion of the fund subscribed for the relief of distress will be handed out?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What fund?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Lord Zetland's fund.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must be permitted to point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that he has no right to ask me about a private fund, with which this House has nothing to do, and with which he has had nothing to do.

MR. S. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): May I ask whether the Earl of Zetland and the right hon. Gentleman did not, in a letter published on January 3, appeal for funds for the relief of distress in their respective capacities of Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary for Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

THE LEICESTERSHIRE REGIMENT.

MR. TAPLING (Leicestershire, Harborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Times of 31st January last, relating to alleged insubordination in the Leicestershire Regiment at Bermuda; whether it is true that since 22nd January the regiment has been in almost open revolt; whether it is the case that the intervention of the Grenadier Guards has been found necessary to prevent serious breach of the peace by soldiers of the Leicestershire Regiment; and whether there is any foundation for these and similar statements contained in the same paper?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Beyond the fact that at Christmas there was a slight drunken disturbance between a few men of the Leicestershire Regiment and some of the coloured population, which was immediately stopped by the officers on the spot, there was no foundation whatever for the reports telegraphed from Halifax. The General Officer commanding reports that, with this small exception, the conduct of the Leicestershire Battalion has been excellent; and I much regret that such unfounded and unfair statements should have been sent home.

HAULBOWLINE DOCKYARD.

MR. FLYNN (Cork Co., N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what are the steps which the Government are taking, or are going to take, with regard to Haulbowline; and when do they propose (if at all) to erect the necessary workshops in connection with the dockyard?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have already answered this question three times. The dock and basin at Haulbowline are complete. Existing buildings and machinery are being adapted and provided for fitters' workshops, and will shortly be completed.

MR. FLYNN: At what date may the docks be expected to be completed, or at least so advanced that operations on a ship may be begun?

LORD G. HAMILTON: That is a question I can hardly answer. It must be remembered that the yard at Haulbowline is a graving dock, and will only be used when a ship is damaged below the water-line.

MR. FLYNN: I shall revert to the matter on the consideration of the Naval Estimates.

RIVER ZAMBESI SURVEYS.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will have placed in the 'Tea Room' the Chart showing the latest surveys of the mouths of the Zambesi River?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The latest survey of the Chindé, the only mouth of the Zambesi recently surveyed, is not yet out of the engravers' hands. The existing plans of the Zambesi mouths shall be sent over to the House of Commons.

IRISH LAND PURCHASE.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it is the intention of the Government to exempt long leaseholders from the operation of the Irish Land Purchase Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not sure that I understand the purport of the question. The intentions of the Government are fully set forth in the Bill now before the House, and to that I must respectfully refer the hon. Baronet.

SOUTH-EASTERN (IRELAND) POSTAL DISTRICTS.

MR. MORROGH (Cork Co., S.E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if his attention has been called to the inconvenience and delay caused in the delivery of the mails to the inhabitants of the South-Eastern Postal Districts served by runners from Kinsale and Carrigaline; and if he could not substitute one post-car for the present system of three runners?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): It is not quite clear to what district the hon. Member refers; but if it is the district of Ballyfeard to which the question applies I have to state that the post to that district is now maintained at fairly convenient hours from Kinsale. The question of substituting for this service a mail car from Carrigaline via Minane Bridge has been carefully considered, but the additional expense involved precludes me from sanctioning such an arrangement. I shall be glad to have further inquiry made in the matter, if the hon. Member will give fuller particulars.

THE POTATO CROP IN SOUTH-WEST CORK.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can inform the House whether Colonel Spaight, the Local Government Board Inspector, who as far back as July or August last year visited the south-western districts of the County of Cork with a view to inspect and report on the then anticipated failure of the potato crop, has made any Report; and, if so, what was the nature of his Report; and will he lay a copy of it upon the Table of the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Reports have been made by Colonel Spaight and other Inspectors to the Local Government Board with regard to the condition of the potato crop in certain districts of County Cork. I shall lay upon the Table shortly a Report as to this district from the Local Government Board, and that Report will be based in the main on the Reports of the Local Government Board Inspectors.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman inform me, in regard to the distress, whether it is intended that the Police, Resident Magistrates, and Local Government Board Inspectors shall be appointed by the Government to perform the duties of disbursing a private fund?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask for notice of the question.

BRITISH POSSESSIONS IN AFRICA.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will have placed in the Tea Room a map showing all the information in the possession of Her Majesty's Government, up to the latest date, of the coast of Africa between Delagoa Bay and the mouths of the Zambesi, together with the country lying between that coast and the Zambesi on the north, and the 28th degree of east longitude on the west?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I learn from the Foreign Office that as the limits of the territories or spheres of influence in that region are at this moment the subject of inquiry and negotiation, it would be inexpedient to exhibit an official map, in which many features could not be positively defined.

INCHIGEELA POSTAL SERVICE.

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been directed to the insufficient postal arrangements in the Inchigeela district, County Cork, which provide only carriage of letters to and from Inchigeela three times a week, vid Ballingearry; and whether a daily mail car between Macroom and Inchigeela, or a daily post by messenger from Inchigeela to Ballingearry, might be established?

*MR. RAIKES: The post to and from Inchigeela is maintained six days a week by messenger on foot, but between Inchigeela and Ballingearry the post is restricted to three days a week, because the letters are few in number. It would give me pleasure to meet the wishes which have been expressed in the matter; but, so far as I am at present able to form an opinion, I fear that the additional expense involved in improving the service will be greater than I should feel justified in incurring. The inquiries shall, however, be pursued, and I will come to a decision as soon as possible.

Dr. TANNER: If representations are made by the inhabitants will the right hon. Gentleman have the subject further investigated?

*MR. RAIKES: I shall be happy to give due consideration to any Memorial sent me.

ANTHRAX.

Mr. CHANNING: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he proposes to direct an inquiry to be made as to the alleged discovery by Mr. Hankin of an effective cure for anthrax?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I understand that there have been some communications between the Department and Mr. Hankin on this subject already, and I have directed further inquiry to be made at an early opportunity.

ILLITERATE VOTERS.

Mr. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, having regard to the increasing number of declarations of illiteracy made at some Parliamentary elections, he is prepared to bring in a measure making it an offence under the Ballot Act untruly to make such declaration with a view to evade the provisions of the said Act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I have no information to show that such declarations are on the increase, and I am not, therefore, prepared to propose legislation such as that suggested. I believe that the spread of education will in due course of time diminish the number of illiterate voters.

ZANZIBAR.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the statement by the German Chancellor, reported in the Times of 6th February, that in addition to 4,000,000 marks paid to the Sultan of Zanzibar for the surrender of his Coast territory, another 6,000,000 was to be paid as compensation to the sufferers by the disturbances in that quarter; and if he can say whether any portion of that money is to go to the British-Indian subjects who suffered, or to any other British subjects, or to the East Africa Company?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): There was a mistake in the Times telegraphic summary. The sum of 6,000,000 was mentioned as destined for the improvement of the country. Nothing was said about compensation to sufferers, and I fear that, in the circumstances, they have no valid claims.

ACTIONS AGAINST RESIDENT MAGISTRATES.

Mr. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the following paragraph from the Traders' Gazette copied into United Ireland of 6th September:—

“King’s County. MacSheehy John Thomas Resident Magistrate, defendant; W. C. J. Crawley, Esquire, Ely Place, Dublin, plaintiff. Queen’s Bench amount £33 13s. 1d., costs £5 10s.;”

what action do the Government intend to take with regard to this Magistrate; and whether he will grant a Return of the cases tried under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, in whose adjudication Mr. MacSheehy has taken part? I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the fact that, at the October Quarter Sessions of the County of Kildare, held before County Court Judge Darby, Colonel the Hon. W. F. Forbes, Resident Magistrate, was sued by several shopkeepers for goods supplied to his wife and children, and was also sued by Mary Grogan, a cook in his employment, to recover from him a sum of £7 8s. 10d., for wages, and 6s. for cash lent by her to her master; whether he is aware that County Court Judge Darby gave decrees in all the cases, certifying for fees for counsel, and allowing witnesses' expenses; and that Mrs. Forbes swore that whenever she went to her husband's study to speak to him about these bills, the lamp was always put out, and sometimes she was struck and knocked down by the said Colonel Forbes, Resident Magistrate; whether he is also aware that, at the Easter Quarter Sessions, the said Hon. Colonel Forbes, Resident Magistrate, was also sued, and decreed, for goods supplied by several tradesmen; whether it is intended to retain this gentleman in his position of Resident Magistrate; and whether he will grant a Return of the cases under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, in whose adjudication the Hon. Colonel Forbes has taken part?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The matters referred to in these questions are solely personal, and the Government do not intend to interfere.

DISTRESS IN DONEGAL.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to a letter of the Rev. Patrick Logan, P.P., Kilcar, County Donegal, dated 29th September, 1890, which appeared in the Freeman's Journal, calling attention to the fact that 500 families of his parishioners would by the 1st November not have a potato to eat or to seed the ground in the coming spring; whether, on the 5th November last, the said Rev. P. Logan had an interview with him in Carrick, County Donegal, and handed him a tabulated statement respecting the population of his neighbourhood, and then stated the potato crop in his parish was a complete failure; and whether he assured Father Logan that he was "anxious to aid him through this period of distress"; whether his attention has been directed to another letter of the said Rev. Father Logan in the Irish Times of 15th January, again calling public attention to the acute distress in the district of Kilcar; and whether the Government intend to make any provision for the relief of these destitute people?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am somewhat surprised at this question of the hon. Gentleman, because relief works have been for some weeks actively proceeding in the district referred to. The number of labourers employed on the works on the 21st January was 305.

THE FINN VALLEY RAILWAY.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is intended that the cess-payers are to be under any liability in respect of the working of the new Finn Valley Railway; whether the fair town of Brockagh will be touched by the line; and whether the tracing on the map in the Tea Room is correct in showing the line along the north side of the river from Doosh to Frintown?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The arrangements are not yet finally completed. There is no ground for believing there will be any liability on the cesspayer. The district south of the river will be served by the line.

TRADE WITH BRAZIL.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, under the proposed Treaty between Brazil and the United States, manufactures from the latter country of cotton, steel, and iron will be admitted into Brazil at 25 per cent. less duty than will be levied on similar goods shipped from the United Kingdom; and whether he has received any information on the subject from Her Majesty's Ministers in Washington and Rio de Janeiro?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The intelligence received in this country is conveyed in a telegram from Washington, and does not afford information as to the manner in which the Brazilian Government propose to apply the provisions of the Treaty in question. Her Majesty's Ministers at Washington and Rio de Janeiro will, no doubt, in accordance with the general practice of the Diplomatic Service, duly report by despatch the terms of this Treaty and its bearing upon British trade. I will inform the hon. Member when those despatches are received.

A LAND DISPUTE.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on what ground it is stated that Lord Waterford's tenant, Michael Keily, was satisfied to purchase his holding (on being served with an ejectment) on terms involving his paying the Government in instalments more than he paid the landlord in rent; and what is the name of the Court valuer who visited Keily's holding, and certified that the advance was a safe one for the Purchase Department to make?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the first part of the question, I understand the matter referred to has already been dealt with by my right hon. Friend the Attorney General for Ireland in an answer which he gave the hon. Gentleman on the 3rd inst. As regards the other inquiry, the name of the Inspector who valued the holding was Mr. Philip Newton.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken. He stated that Mr. Keily had expressed his satisfaction at having to pay £7 instead of £6 10s. I ask upon what ground?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The hon. and learned Gentleman asked if the arrangement was a satisfactory one to the Government. I answered that whether or not it was satisfactory to the Government, it was eminently satisfactory to the tenant, as it had been entered into at his urgent request.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes, under stress of notice of ejectment.

MR. MADDEN: I came to the conclusion that the tenant was satisfied, as he made the request to the landlord, and his request was granted.

HOURS OF LABOUR ABROAD.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, as a Select Committee is to be appointed to inquire into the question of restricting by law the hours of railway servants, he will send the Labour Correspondent of the Board of Trade, or some other competent person, to the United States to inquire into the working of the various laws which have been passed by the State Legislature to restrict the hours of adult male labour, and to report thereon to this House?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): No, Sir; I do not think that it would be advisable to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member with regard to Mr. Burnett. His time is very fully occupied with important matters in this country. I have already requested the Foreign Office to obtain information with regard to the various laws and regulations of foreign countries respecting the hours of labour of railway servants, and this information will, I hope, be received in time to be laid before the Committee.

NAVAL PENSIONS.

SIR JOHN PULESTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Naval pensions which were to be transferred from the Greenwich Hospital Fund have been so transferred?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Yes, Sir; we have decided that the transfer shall be made at a date to be fixed in concert with the Admiralty.

WELSH POSTMASTERS.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the large number of vacancies which will be caused in Welsh post offices by reason of the superannuation of postmasters over 65 years of age at the end of the current year, he will take steps, as far as is consistent with the efficiency of the Service, to appoint only persons who speak and understand the Welsh language to post offices in the districts where that language is generally used?

*MR. RAIKES: It is not intended generally to superannuate Postmasters over 60 years at the end of the current year. A notice has, however, been given to those over 65 years of age that this course will be taken as regards offices in the gift of the Postmaster General. And it will, in my judgment, be necessary to require the retirement of those over 70 at a still earlier date. No such step, however, is in contemplation as regards the minor offices to which the Treasury nominates, and which are those to which the right hon. Gentleman's question probably refers, as these are often situated in backward and remote parts of the country. I have always taken care, with a due regard to the efficiency of the Service, to appoint persons who speak and understand Welsh to Post Offices in districts where that language is in general use.

HEFFERNAN'S CASE.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, with respect to the case of District Inspector Carter and Constable John Loohig, both of Tipperary, in which a Coroner's jury found a verdict against them for the shooting of a boy named Stephen Heffernan, on the 5th September, 1889; and whether the inquisition has been quashed, or a nolle prosequi entered to it; and, if not, do the Government intend to prosecute on this inquisition?

MR. MADDEN: I stated fully why I saw no reason to take further proceedings in reply to a question put by the hon. Member on the 4th December last, and I now beg to refer him to the answer which I gave on that occasion. With regard to the second question of the hon. Gentleman, I beg to state that the action referred to was decided not on a technical point, but on a substantial issue. I cannot accept the view of the verdict of the jury put forth in the fourth paragraph of the question having regard to the findings to which they in the first instance agreed, and no reason why the Government should take the very exceptional course suggested in the latter part of the question.

DR. TANNER: Did not Inspector Carter frequently admit that the men fired without orders and killed this man. Is he not to be held responsible?

MR. MADDEN: I have answered questions relating to this already, and must refer the hon. Member to the answers given in December.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen a report of the case, Johannah Heffernan against John Collis Carter, District Inspector, and Constable Loohig, tried before Mr. Justice Holmes and a special jury of the City of Dublin, on the 22nd, 24th, 25th, and 26th days of November, in which the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff on the principal issue put before them, namely—

“That the firing of the shot was not necessary for the self-defence of Carter and his policemen while engaged in the performance of the duty aforesaid;”

whether he is aware that a verdict was given for the defendants on a technical point, namely, that at the time of the boy's death there was not a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit to his mother, within the meaning of Lord Campbell's Act; whether he is aware that Mr. Justice Holmes, who tried the case, declared in his Charge to the jury that it raised a most grave and important issue, and that the jury who tried the case was a special jury of the City of Dublin, consisting of men of various political opinions; whether, under this verdict, the entire cost of the case falls upon the mother of the deceased, although it is practically a verdict of manslaughter against the police; and whether, since the costs amount to £285 2s. 9d., the Government will save this poor woman from ruin by defraying the costs?

MR. MADDEN: The answer I gave to the last question applies to this.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Is it the intention of the Government to enter a nolle prosequi in this case?

MR. MADDEN: That course will not be taken. The case was laid before a Bench of Magistrates, who refused an information.

DR. TANNER: Is Carter to be promoted for the murder of this boy?

MR. MAC NEILL: Inasmuch as this case resulted in loss of life, I must ask a further question as to the Bench of Magistrates who refused the information. Was it the ordinary Bench, or exclusively composed of Resident Magistrates selected for the purpose? Was not the brother of one of the Magistrates, within two days after the decision was given, made a Deputy Lieutenant of the County of Dublin?

MR. MADDEN: It was an ordinary Petty Sessions Bench. If the local Magistrates do not attend, the Government cannot be held responsible.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: What were the issues found by the jury? Was it not that the firing of the shot was not necessary for the self-defence of the police while engaged in the execution of their duty? Will the right hon. Gentleman recommend the Government not to allow this woman to be mulct in the police costs?

MR. MADDEN: The issues submitted to the jury were—1st, as to whether it was the duty of the police to disperse the crowd; and, secondly, was the performance of that duty accompanied by personal danger, which the Judge in his Charge explained to mean danger to life or risk of serious injury. The jury without difficulty found both these issues in favour of the defendant—they agreed it was the duty of the police to disperse the crowd, and that there was personal danger. They stated, however, they could not agree as to the remaining issues, which were—was the firing necessary in self-defence, and had the plaintiffs any pecuniary interest in the life of the deceased? They asked the Judge, could they find a verdict on one conditional on the other? He told them no such verdict would stand, and they then found for the plaintiff on the self-defence issue, and for the defendants on the issue as to pecuniary benefit. How they could reconcile their finding on the self-defence issue with the finding as to the duty of the police to disperse the crowd I cannot imagine, as they admitted the duty was attended with personal danger.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I ask the Government whether, in any single instance of the finding by a Coroner's Jury of a verdict of wilful murder, they have allowed it to stand against the person concerned without making some effort to set it aside. Is this to be the only case in which no such effort is to be made?

MR. MADDEN: There have, especially under previous Governments, been many verdicts of wilful murder in which no step whatever has been taken by the Government of the day. In this case the Government laid it before a Bench of Magistrates, who refused an information, and, in my opinion, that decision was amply justified by the evidence in the civil action.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: There are two points on which I wish to be satisfied. Was not the jury composed almost entirely of gentlemen of the right hon. Gentleman's way of thinking, there being very few Catholics among them, and will the Government see that the woman is not mulct in these heavy costs?

MR. MADDEN: As to the constitution of the jury I have no information. Under the circumstances, the Government cannot undertake to pay the plaintiff's costs.

ARMY BANDMASTERS.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the bandmasters of the Army were invited to compete for position of Director of Music at Kneller Hall on 10th and 11th November last; and whether he can state the names of, and number of marks awarded to, the first three candidates as arranged by the Court of Examiners?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: All bandmasters serving at home, who were eligible by age, were invited to compete. As the decision of the Court of Musical Examiners was only one among the considerations on which the selection was made, I do not think it would be desirable to state the marks of the several candidates.

HYDE PARK.

MR. EDWARD HOARE (Hampstead): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will cause direction posts, similar to those in Hyde Park, to be erected in Regent's Park?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET, Dublin University): Yes, Sir. Since our attention has been called to the matter several posts have been put up, and more will be erected.

THE GOLD COST.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is correctly reported that Mr. E. A. S. McMunn has been called upon to resign his post as District Commissioner at the Gold Coast; and, if so, whether he will inform the House as to the reasons for this; and whether a Report has yet been received from the Governor of the Gold Coast as to the alleged sanctioning of slavery and the slave trade in the colony?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Mr. McMunn has not been called upon to resign; but, in accordance with the terms upon which he was appointed, his appointment has been cancelled, it having been established to the satisfaction of the Governor and the Secretary of State that he was not qualified to render efficient service on the Gold Coast. The answer to the second paragraph is, No; but the Governor has been reminded.

MR. PICTON: Was the cause of disqualification excessive zeal against slavery?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: No, Sir; certainly not.

FALCARRAGH EVICTIONS.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a constable of the Royal Irish Constabulary, during an eviction in Falcarragh in November last, assaulted the hon. Member for South Donegal, and refused to give his name when he was requested so to do in order that his misconduct might be reported to his superior officer; and whether, having regard to the great difficulty of identifying Royal Irish Constabulary constables by reason of their uniforms and helmets which conceal their features, and the repeated refusal of the Government to place numbers on the uniforms of this Force, he is prepared to suggest any methods by which members of the Force whose conduct is impugned may be identified?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I am informed, no assault was committed on the hon. Member. It is the practice for constables to give their names when asked for in a proper manner.

MR. MAC NEILL: Does the right hon. Gentleman take the statement of a constabulary officer in contradiction of that of myself and my hon. Friend? Is he aware that when I was at the Falcarragh evictions, accompanied by my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield, I unintentionally entered the cordon? I was not asked to move, but was rudely jostled by the constable. I asked the constable for his name, and as he refused to give it I had to take means to identify him.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: And is the Chief Secretary aware that I witnessed the assault?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am aware the fact was brought to official notice by the hon. Gentleman. If he was able to take exceptional means to identify the man I suppose he was satisfied.

MR. MAC NEILL: I was only able to identify him by chalking him, and that I did do.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: Will the right hon. Gentleman agree to have the constables numbered in future?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I propose to make no change.

PACKETS AND THE POST OFFICE.

COLONEL EYRE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is a fact that foreign packets are allowed to come through the Post Office in closed envelopes, whilst those sent from England must be open at both ends, whereby injury is frequently caused to the enclosure; and, if such is the case, whether anything can be done to remedy this inconvenience?

*MR. RAIKES: I understand my hon. and gallant Friend to be under the impression that printed papers may be sent to this country from places abroad in unclosed envelopes, but that the same method of packing is not allowed in the opposite direction. I may assure my hon. Friend that such is not the case, the same facilities being permitted in both directions. This only applies to countries coming within the jurisdiction of the Postal Union.

SUAKIN.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have sanctioned the action of the Egyptian Government in sending an expedition to recover a portion of the Soudan, near Suakin, which was some years ago formally abandoned at the urgent instance of the British Government; and whether care will be taken that these measures do not throw any burden on this country, either directly, on account of the military operations in the Soudan, or indirectly, by withdrawing a portion of the Egyptian forces, and throwing the defence of Egypt and the Nile more heavily on Her Majesty's Army?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have raised no objection to the occupation of Tokar and Handoub by the Egyptian troops, as the occupation was strongly urged by the Civil and Military Authorities, in order to relieve the district round Suakin from oppression and plunder by the Dervishes, and especially in order to facilitate the opening of trade in grain. No additional burden will be thrown on this country by the measures that are being taken.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Will it not be necessary to occupy the country with British troops when the Egyptian garrison is withdrawn for this expedition?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is not anticipated that any addition will have to be made to the garrison of Suakin on account of the occupation of these outposts.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if, considering the disadvantages under which the Newfoundland fishermen are labouring owing to the heavy bounties given by France upon fish, and the grave importance of the fisheries dispute, he can state that Her Majesty's Government are taking active steps to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the difficulty?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The system of giving bounties upon fish is one to which the French Government attach great importance, and as it is entirely a matter of internal regulation we have no ground for objecting to it. The dispute with respect to the Treaties is receiving the anxious attention of Her Majesty's Government.

DR. TANNER: Will not attention be paid to the claims of the poor fishermen who suffered, seeing that the Government have made an allowance to Mr. Baird for the disturbance and annoyance to which he was subjected?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That does not arise out of the question.

INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY CONVENTION.

COLONEL HILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the further Papers respecting the Industrial Property Convention held at Madrid will be laid upon the Table?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir; further Papers will be laid on the Table when it is seen whether the projects submitted by the Conference are signed on behalf of the countries which respectively adopt them.

TRADE WITH BRITISH COLONIES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Report of the Treaties Committee has been received, upon the representations of the Agents General of the self-governing colonies, and of the Imperial Federation League, as to the importance of annulling the clause in the Treaty with Belgium of 1862, and the Treaty with Germany of 1865, precluding the conclusion of preferential commercial arrangements between the Mother Country and the colonies, or between any other portion of the Empire, except between the Colonies of Australasia; and, in such case, if he has any objection to state the nature of the recommendation of the Committee, and the decision of the Government upon the subject?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: I can only inform my hon. Friend that the second Report of the Trade and Treaties Committee has just been received, and is now under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. I must not be understood as admitting the accuracy of my hon. Friend's interpretation of the effect of the two Treaties to which he refers.

THE CASTLEREA ARRESTS.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that 18 prisoners have been remanded seven times by Mr. Brady, R.M., who has been holding a Court at Castlereas under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, and have been taken from their beds at 9 or 10 o'clock in Castlebar Gaol and sent to Castlereas, arriving at midnight, and then kept in the police cells all night without a bed to lie on; whether he is also aware that one of the prisoners (Mr. T. Forde) was treated in this way, though he had been for some days suffering from illness; and whether this prisoner has been discharged on the report of an independent doctor; can he explain why the prisoners were not brought by the train which arrives at Castlereas at 11 o'clock a.m.; and why these prisoners are detained till midnight, and then sent back by train to Castlebar, to arrive about 4 o'clock in the morning, when other and more convenient trains are available?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that seven, not 18, prisoners, as alleged in the question, have been committed seven times for refusing to be sworn or to give evidence at the Castlereas inquiry. Such prisoners, who are to be again brought up, are released from prison about 9 a.m. and conveyed to Castlereas by the 10 o'clock train the same morning. In no case have these prisoners been kept in police cells. When it is necessary to detain any of them in Castlereas Police Barracks for a night a comfortable room is provided, with a fire. Timothy Forde was at once discharged from custody when it was found that he was suffering from a slight complaint. In every case where it was practicable to have prisoners sent back by the early train it was used. Any inconvenience suffered by these prisoners is solely the result of their determination to obstruct and impede the administration of the law.

MR. O'KELLY: I now ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland at what hour of the night the police arrested Mrs. Owen Lavin, of Lisahurka; whether he is aware that Mrs. Lavin, who is in a delicate state of health and whose husband was at the time in prison, objected to go with the police, and asked to be permitted to wait till next day when she would be driven on a friend's car to Castlereas; whether the police, the day or two following, came to Mrs. Lavin's house at 2 o'clock in the morning to arrest her mother-in-law, an old woman 75 years of age, and in bad health; and under what authority did the police act in these cases?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the woman was arrested at 11.45 in the morning, that she made no complaint of delicate health, but on the contrary, seemed to be in excellent health. She offered to go with the police, and a seat was provided for her on the car. The police did not endeavour to arrest the mother-in-law at 2 o'clock in the morning. She had absconded. The police acted on the warrant issued by the Resident Magistrate.

MR. O'KELLY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mrs. Crane, of Fairymount, County Roscommon, who was in a delicate state of health, having a baby only a few weeks old, was arrested at 1 o'clock in the morning, and brought to Castlereas; and if he can explain why her request to be allowed to go into Castlereas next morning, and have her husband accompany her, was refused by the police?

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps have been taken for the relief of distress along the seaboard from Cahirciveen to Kenmare; whether he is aware that a deputation of 300 labourers from the Ballinskelligs district, a locality remote from the facilities of the railway works, waited on the Cahirciveen Board of Guardians to demand work or relief; and whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the advisability of constructing a pier at Ballinskelligs, which would give employment to the starving people of the district, and tend to develop the local fishery?

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mrs. Shaskett was recently arrested on the De Freyne estate under an Inquiry Court warrant at midnight and brought into Castlereas in custody, the result being that from the fright she sustained she was unable to take any food until she reached home 20 hours after; and whether the practice of making arrests at night has been sanctioned by the Government? I beg also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that Edward Egan, of Carreenturpane, was arrested under an Inquiry Court warrant at midnight, and brought into Castlereagh; that, after Mr. Egan returned, the priest had to be sent for to anoint him; and that he is now in a dying state, owing to the shock and the exposure of the night to which he was subjected; and whether the practice of making arrests at night has been sanctioned by the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not in a position to answer these four questions, and must ask that they be put down for another day.

MR. J. O'KELLY: Will the right hon. Gentleman make further inquiries into the allegations as to the midnight arrests?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; I will inquire into any special case brought to my notice. I have shown the hon. Member he is in error in the one case he has named.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Plan of Campaign on the estate, in regard to which these cases have arisen, has broken down?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

CHARGE AGAINST MR. P. MAGAN, J.P.

MR. HAYDEN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what steps were taken to recover from Mr. Percy Magan, J.P., for the Counties of Roscommon, Westmeath, and Wexford, the amount he was alleged to have obtained under the Arrears Act of 1882 by false representations; what amount, if any, has been recovered, and in the case of what tenants; what amount of rent was sworn by Mr. Magan to be due by these tenants up to 1st November, 1881; what is the actual amount which has been found to be due; whether any inquiries have been made as to whether money may have been similarly obtained in the case of other tenants on the same estate; has Mr. Magan's conduct in this matter been brought under the notice of the Lord Chancellor; does he still hold the Commission of the Peace and act as a Magistrate: have any steps been taken to prosecute Mr. Magan and recover the penalties provided under the Arrears Act; and in how many cases have prosecutions under the Arrears Act been instituted; what were the charges, and what was the result?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone this question till Monday.

STOCK FOR SCHOOL BUILDINGS.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer under which of the Education Acts have issues of stock for school buildings been authorised by Parliament without the maximum amounts being named; and were these stocks issued under the Imperial guarantee?

MR. GOSCHEN: If the hon. Member will refer to the answer I gave him on Monday, he will find that I said nothing about issues of stock. I spoke of loans being made without limit of the liability. I may refer him, for instance, to 33 & 34 Vic., Cap. 75.

THE JAMAICA EXHIBITION.

SIR GEORGE BADEN - POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the fact that no news of the opening of the Jamaica Exhibition was published in this country until a week after the event; whether he can state the reason of this delay; and whether he can present to the House any official account of an Exhibition which is of such interest to those connected with West Indian industries and commerce?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Telegrams direct from the West Indies are very costly, and this may probably have been the reason why no accounts of the proceedings at the opening of the Jamaica Exhibition have been given by the Press until yesterday. My hon. Friend will see in the Times of yesterday a full telegram from New York. The more detailed accounts by mail have not yet arrived; but it will be considered, when the Governor's despatch has been received, whether there will be advantage in presenting it to Parliament.

H.M.S. MOHAWK.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty to be good enough to inform the House of the nature of the Report (official or otherwise) received from Her Majesty's cruiser Mohawk since her arrival at Las Palmas; whether it is true that she is described as being top-heavy and very uncomfortable in a sea way, owing to which all hands were turned out for two nights in succession on the passage; "that the gangways were carried away, and the boats stove in;" that there were two feet of water in the steerage, whilst the pumps had to be kept going an entire day, the vessel at the time heeling 45 degrees; and whether, in face of this, it is intended to reduce the top-weight of cruisers of this class now under the course of construction?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No Report has been received from Her Majesty's ship Mohawk since reaching Las Palmas. If anything unusual or exception had occurred on the voyage there, it would have been reported. No cruisers of this class are being built.

THE LAW OF SELF-DEFENCE.

COLONEL DAWNAY (York, W.R., Thirsk): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a case of assault committed in the Commercial Road on Sunday last, when the Magistrate who tried the case expressed the following opinion:—

"The attack the prisoners had been guilty of justified a man in using any deadly weapon in order to protect himself, and even if the prosecutor had shot both men dead, he would have been justified in doing so;"

and whether, in view of these frequent outrages, and the various interpretations of the law on this subject, he will inform the Magistrates and Judges what a man may and may not do under similar circumstances?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the learned Magistrate that he did not make use of the words quoted. What he said to the prisoners was as follows:—

"Some people contend that your conduct would justify the complainant in using a revolver and shooting you both dead, but with that I certainly do not agree."

I have no reason to believe that outrages such as the one referred to are frequent, or that the law on the subject is not thoroughly understood. I should, however, be exceeding my duty if I took upon myself to define or interpret the law for the guidance of Judges and Magistrates.

COLONEL DAWNAY: I took the words verbatim from the Daily News.

DR. TANNER: Hear, hear! Good paper!

H.M.S. SANSPAREIL—THE 110-TON GUNS

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is true that the new split band of the Sanspareil 110-ton gun, on being tested, showed signs of shifting, and that each round fired caused the muzzle of the gun to droop, inclining it to one side; and whether he is bound to accept the gun from the manufacturers, irrespective of test?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The gun is still under proof, and some further rounds are about to be fired, including some against a 20-in. compound armour plate, with an 8-in. wrought-iron plate behind it. A detailed Report will be made in the usual course when the tests are completed. The Admiralty is not bound to accept this or any other gun irrespective of test.

THE CONVICTION OF A CLERGYMAN.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has observed the case, reported in the papers of 11th February, of a clergyman who was, on the evidence before the Magistrate, committed for stealing a variety of articles from the Army and Navy Stores, and was tried before Sir Peter Edlin, Chairman of Quarter Sessions, that he pleaded guilty and no evidence was heard, but his counsel was allowed to make an ex parte statement, saying that he was the son of a man of position, that having failed in other pursuits he became a clergyman, that he failed in that profession also owing to intemperate habits, that he was suffering from want and anxiety when he committed the offences charged, and that if he was let off his friends would take care of him and place him in a home for inebriates, that Sir Peter Edlin thereupon released him on security on condition that his friends would take care of him; and whether the Chairman has the power to act in this manner?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have seen a newspaper report, from which I learn that the prisoner, who had already been two months in custody, was liberated on condition that he found one surety in £100, and entered into recognizances in the same amount to come up for judgment if called on within the next 12 months, so as to insure his good conduct during that period. I am advised that the action of the Judge was in accordance with the law as laid down in the 117th section of the Larceny Consolidation Act, 1861, and in the 1st section of the Probation of First Offenders Act, 1887.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Have any cases occurred in which poor men convicted under similar circumstances have been treated in this way?

MR. MATTHEWS: It does not appear to me to be unreasonable that a man who appears to me to be out of his mind should for a first offence be treated in this way.

CLASSICS FOR ARMY CANDIDATES.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what are the circumstances which have caused the recent change, making a classical language compulsory for candidates in the Army; and if he will produce Papers on the subject?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: In accordance with the recommendation of the majority of headmasters of public schools, and with the full concurrence of the Civil Service Commissioners, it has been decided prospectively that elementary Latin shall be an obligatory subject for military candidates. I will consider whether any of the correspondence can, with advantage, be produced.

BULKHEADS.

MR. FURNESS (Hartlepool): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the serious inconvenience caused to shipowners through the uncertainty with regard to No. 12 of the General Rules of the Board of Trade, under "The Merchant Shipping (Life-Saving Appliances) Act, 1888;" whether, though the Rules came into operation on 1st November last, no decision has yet been arrived at by the Board with regard to the application of the said Rule 12;

when the Committee on Bulkheads, appointed to inquire into the matter, is expected to report; and whether the Report, when presented, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The General Rule No. 12 under the Merchant Shipping (Life-Saving Appliances) Act, to which the hon. Member refers, is as follows:—

"12. Watertight compartments.—When ships of any class are divided into efficient compartments to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade they shall only be required to carry additional boats, rafts, and other life-saving appliances of one half of the capacity required by these Rules."

The Board of Trade are not in a position to arrive at a decision with regard to this Rule until they receive the Report of the Bulkheads Committee appointed to inquire into the matter. This, I hope, will be about the end of next month. The Report, when received, will be laid on the Table of the House.

COFFIN TARGETS.

MR. JACOBY (Derbyshire, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there is any truth in the statement that "coffin" targets are to be discontinued; and, if so, whether he will sanction the use of Wimbledon targets this year for class firing by the Reserve Forces?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The use of the so-called "coffin" targets will be discontinued, and regulations are in preparation for introducing the Wimbledon marking for use by the Regular Forces. The Musketry Committee has recommended changes based on like conditions for the Auxiliary Forces, but before they are adopted the proposal will have to receive very careful consideration.

ROADS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Secretary for Scotland has received representations from County Councils and others on the subject of new roads in certain parts of the Western Highlands and Islands of Scotland, and suggesting grants in aid; and whether, in its proposed special dealings with these localities, Government would take this point into favourable consideration?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Secretary for Scotland has received communications from several bodies in the Highlands of Scotland praying for grants in aid of the construction of roads. The Commissioners appointed to inquire into the question of grants in aid to these Highland districts have not made any special recommendation for the purpose referred to, but the Government will give the whole matter their most careful consideration.

THE CZAR OF RUSSIA AND THE CITY.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will explain the circumstances under which Her Majesty's Ministers accepted the responsibility of becoming the medium through which the Memorial of the Lord Mayor and Citizens of London, on the subject of the treatment of the Jews in Russia, was returned to the Memorialists?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am under the impression that the circumstances under which Her Majesty's Ministers accepted the responsibility mentioned in the question were sufficiently disclosed in the letter from the Under Secretary of State to the Lord Mayor.

MR. O'BRIEN AND MR. DILLON.

MR. J. M'CARTHY (Londonderry): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true that Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Dillon have been already arrested?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information on the point. I imagine the question should be addressed to the Home Secretary.

MR. J. M'CARTHY: Then I will address it to the Home Secretary.

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not received any information to that effect.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Does the right hon. Gentleman expect to receive such information?

MR. MATTHEWS: I should not be surprised at receiving it.

THE VOTE OF CENSURE.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In the ordinary channels of information I see a statement that the Debate on the Vote of Censure will probably terminate on Monday. It would probably contribute to the convenience of the House if that statement were confirmed by right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Will only one day be given to the discussion?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I was ready to give any longer amount of time that might be required. But it appears from the morning papers—especially from one peculiarly representing the Party opposite—that it is intended to conclude the Debate on the first day, and it is obvious that if this is so the fact ought to be generally known.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.—(No. 207.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

(5.15.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I may state, at no unnecessary length, the reasons why I feel bound to vote against the Third Reading of this Bill. There are circumstances in connection with the Bill of which I confess I do not remember any example. During the progress of the discussions on the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman who has charge of it has very fairly recognised that there are omissions which ought to be supplied. One of these omissions related to the very important question of derelict farms, and when an Amendment dealing with that matter came to be discussed the Government found themselves unable to defend their own Amendment. These deficiencies were discovered too late to be remedied in Committee, and the Government promised to deal with them when the Bill came before the Upper House.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I simply withdrew the Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I pointed out at the time there was great difficulty in dealing with the matter at that stage, seeing that it was a vital and important matter. The Government saw their Amendment would not hold water, and withdrew it; but I certainly did not anticipate they would leave their Bill derelict as well as the farms. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will admit the intention to reserve this Amendment to be dealt with in the House of Lords, for he pledged himself the Bill should come down to this House in a form which would enable this matter to be discussed. And I assert that the House of Lords is a singularly inappropriate Body to deal with these matters, for it consists of large tithe owners and landlords. If, therefore, there were no other reason, I should vote against the Third Reading of a Bill admitted by the Government to be an incomplete measure. These conditions have been produced by the desire of the Government to rush legislation of some kind, regardless of its thorough consideration. In 1889 the Government introduced a Bill to settle the tithe question on the principle of throwing all the burden of the tithe on the occupier. This was strenuously opposed by the Liberal Party, who were denounced as wicked obstructionists. Our opposition was described as factious. Yet the Government saw fit to give way, and that principle, which has now been rightly abandoned by the Government, would have been embodied in an Act of Parliament but for the strong opposition of which the Government complained. In the course of the Debate on that Bill we were described as unscrupulous obstructives, as Church robbers, and as the friends of disorder. Then in 1890 the Government introduced another Tithe Bill of quite a different character. It embodied the principle for which we had contended, namely, that the liability should fall on the landowner, and not on the occupier. The old Bill had disappeared, Sir, mainly by reason of your ruling, because you determined that the Amendments proposed by the Attorney General were so complete a change in the character of the measure that they, in fact, constituted a new Bill. Now the first Bill of 1890, so far as it placed the liability on the owner instead of the occupier, was a measure to which I, at least, offered no objection. Still, the Bill contained a number of provisions which, in our opinion, were most injurious to the occupiers of the land. It made occupiers, who were under a contract to pay tithe, liable to execution, bankruptcy, and eviction. It gave most extraordinary powers in the case of the small yeoman, and enabled a receiver to go in and intermeddle with his farm. To these things we offered strenuous resistance. Again, we were denounced as unscrupulous obstructives, but with the unexpected assistance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Compensation Clauses we got rid of that Bill. And the result of our unscrupulous obstruction was that the Amendments for which we contended have now been adopted in the present Bill. We now have No. 2 Bill of 1890 before us. The 1st clause contains a principle for which I have always contended, namely, that the liability shall be on the owner, and not on the occupier, and that the Bill also removes many of the objections we had entertained to its predecessor. Therefore I, for one, did not vote against the Second Reading. I was quite willing, bearing in mind how far former Bills had been amended in their progress, to see if this one could not be made to fall in with our views. I have forgotten to mention the ambitious scheme of redemption which characterised the two first Bills, and which was found to be so totally unworkable that it had to be thrown overboard in the present Bill. But I repeat, I was extremely willing to see if this Bill could not in Committee be made acceptable. With reference to the present Bill, this I will say: that the 1st clause contains a principle for which I have always contended as against the principle contained in the Bill of 1889. That, in point of fact, is what we have achieved by our opposition. But there is one thing to which I do not think sufficient attention has been called in this House, and I doubt whether it is understood in the country. One of the great professions of the authors of the Bill of 1889 was that it would be a great thing to do away with distress for tithe. But this Bill does not do away with distress for tithe at all. Distress for tithe will exist as much with this Bill in operation as it exists now. Distress for tithe is the only remedy. If you look at Clause 1 you find such sums shall be recoverable from the occupier by distress in like manner provided by the Tithe Act with respect to arrears of tithe rent-charge. That is the old remedy of distress, and no other; it is also the only remedy under Sub-section 2 of Clause 2, in the case of occupying owner and the occupier under covenant to pay tithe. Under Clause 2 we find the order of the Court shall be executed by an officer appointed by the Court, who, subject to the direction of the Court, shall have the powers of distraint conferred by the Tithes Act. Therefore, in the great majority of cases, distress will be the only remedy, as before; and therefore the idea that this Bill has some particular merit in getting rid of distress is a total delusion. It is also believed that under this Bill the owner will take the whole liability for tithe, that he will make a new arrangement with his tenant, and that the tenant will know nothing about the payment of tithe as such. That is the idea of Clause 1, but it is a mistake to think this will happen. In Section 2 of Clause 1 we come upon the case of the occupier who is liable, under covenant made before the passing of this Act, to pay tithe, and that sub-section will govern nearly all the tenant-farmers in this country. Of course, if you have a lease of seven years and that comes to an end, then a new contract can be made in which the tenant-farmer may no longer be subject to the payment of tithe; but in the case of tenants from year to year, which constitute three-fourths or more of the agricultural tenancies in the country, there will be a continuing contract made before the passing of the Act, and the tenant, therefore, will continue to be liable to pay tithe, unless he gives his landlord notice to quit and a new contract is made, which is not likely to happen. Therefore, in tenancies from year to year, this Bill will have no operation in relieving the tenant from payment of tithe; he will continue to pay tithe not levied from him as rent, but qua tithe, and levied by the landlord instead of by the tithe owner, levied in the same way, by distress. The situation, therefore, will not be altered in the slightest degree. I suggested, not in the House—but I do not suppose the right hon. Gentleman objects to my mentioning it—that we should apply to the case of tenant-farmers the same words as were put into the Tithe Commutation Act of 1883, by which year to year tenancies would be treated as annual tenancies simply, so that the provisions of the Act would come into operation with reference to every annual tenancy at the end of six months.

Sir W. Harcourt

If that had been put in the Bill the tenant farmer would be relieved from payment of tithe, he would know nothing of tithe as tithe, and his arrangement would be made with his landlord quite irrespective of the payment of tithe. Now that would have been a reform worth making, but this Bill will leave the tenant-farmer, in the case of an annual tenancy, liable to pay tithe, just as he is now, and the tithe that the landlord pays will be recoverable, not as rent, but qua tithe, and by distress. Let me illustrate this. Suppose a tenant in Wales, willing to pay rent—unwilling to pay tithe. He will pay his rent, and the landlord will say, "I have paid the tithe; you must repay me." The tenant will refuse to pay tithe, as he has before refused, and the landlord will then distraint as and for tithe, and never as rent, under this Bill. I point these things out, and depend upon it you will find the "rub" of this when you come to the working of the Act. The notion that you have instituted a reform as to the liability for tithe when you object to provide for year to year tenancies will be discovered to be a great delusion. That I have to say on the last clause of the Bill. I think it is very defective in that respect, though I have no objection to the principle of the clause. Then we come to the important Clause 2. I have said the only machinery left in this Bill practically, with the exception of the collection of rents by the receiver, which, in my opinion, will only constitute a small part of the operation of the Bill, is by distress. You may say so it is now, but it will not be at all after the passing of this Act as before, for you have called in the machinery of the County Court to effect this distress; it can only be done by that machinery—an expensive, inconvenient, and oppressive machinery. Therefore, we have laboured through this Bill. I confess that was my object, to reduce the difficulties of the County Court in the execution of the provisions of the Bill. I will bear testimony, as I have done before, to the extremely reasonable, courteous, and conciliatory manner in which the right hon. Gentleman has conducted these discussions, and that the Bill has reached its Third Reading stage is mainly due to the change in the management of the Bill, from a former experiment of which we have had experience. But, though the right hon. Gentleman has accepted something like 10 Amendments of a material character from this side of the House—a circumstance which shows that charges of obstruction are totally unfounded—although the right hon. Gentleman has allowed there are omissions in the Bill which have to be dealt with elsewhere, or not dealt with at all, there still remain points in the 2nd clause which make the danger so great that they constitute the main reasons why, not having voted against the Second Reading, I feel bound to vote against the Third Reading of the Bill. First, take the matter of expense. What right have you to benefit the tithe owner and to put the tithepayer to greater expense in doing so? Is there any man in the House who believes that if you are going to exact this tithe charge through the machinery of the County Court the tithepayer will not be put to far greater expense than he now incurs? Every man of practical experience knows that will be the case. The right hon. Gentleman opposite did not feel at liberty to allow that costs should be restricted. We fought this question of costs hard—we fought for a Schedule for many hours, and we had the assistance of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury (Sir H. James), the only assistance we had from the particular Party of which he is a Member, in reference to this Bill, and indeed all our Amendments were mainly defeated by those gentlemen, who say they are Liberals in all things save in reference to Ireland. There have been narrow majorities far below an ordinary Government majority, but those majorities which have defeated our Amendments for the interests of small owners and occupiers have been made up of the Liberal Unionists. Therefore, I do single out the solitary and remarkable exception in the assistance we have received from my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury. But do not let it be said there was obstructive opposition, for if after a few hours—I might say after some days—we succeeded in obtaining a Schedule of costs, it was worth the time expended. But the Schedule does not go far enough. The Schedule only deals with the fees in Court, and not with those extraneous costs which will be the inevitable consequence in many cases of giving this jurisdiction to County Courts in Wales. You are, I say, doing that which we have always protested against, giving an advantage to the tithe owners at the expense of the tithepayers—an advantage to which the tithe owners are not entitled, and for which the tithepayers ought not to pay. This is a great blot in the Bill. I will not say much about the 3rd clause of the Bill, that is in charge of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Gray). I voted with him, and we were defeated by the votes of representatives of the great landowners in England. I suppose they thought they were acting wisely, at all events they are generally able to take care of themselves, and I do not feel very much called upon to contend in their interest; but I doubt very much whether the small owners and yeomen of England, who are not so able to take care of themselves, and who have few representatives or sympathisers on that side of the House, will regard this achievement, this principal measure of the Session of a Tory-Unionist Government, as a blessing in disguise; at all events, the disguise is very complete, and the blessing will disappear as the Act comes into operation. Apart from these matters, there is one matter which is conclusive in inducing me to vote against the Third Reading. We contended that if you were going to confer a jurisdiction necessarily more vexatious and more costly than the existing proceeding, you should take very great care to make that jurisdiction one which would engender confidence, and not irritate and cause vexation among the people among whom it is to be newly introduced. In Wales you are going for the first time to County Court the great majority of the agricultural population. ["No, no!"] That, in itself, is a serious matter. The right hon. Gentleman says "No;" but I speak on the information of persons well acquainted with conditions of agricultural tenure in the Principality, which I do not assert that I am. I will say large numbers of the population. You are going to County Court these people; what does this mean? It means bringing them in matters that affect their deepest sentiments and strongest convictions under the jurisdiction of a tribunal that is as ignorant of their feelings as it is of their language. That is one great defect in your Bill. I will say nothing against the County Court Judges, except that I think they are not very likely to know much of the sentiments of the Welsh people, and will not gather it from any knowledge of the language in which those sentiments are expressed. If you tell me the Courts will deal with these matters as with other small debts, that is nothing at all to the purpose. This is not a question of small debts at all, and it has never been under the jurisdiction of the County Court as a small debt. You are making it a County Court question for the first time, and you are bound in doing this to see that the County Court shall be surrounded by proper safeguards appertinent to this new jurisdiction. There is this also in the peculiar condition of Wales: that whereas in England the great majority of the persons amenable to the Bill will have the right to appeal to a jury, in Wales hardly any of the persons subject to the Bill will have that right. We have contended throughout this Bill as well as we could that if you granted this new jurisdiction you should at least give in that jurisdiction some weight and some voice to public opinion and popular sentiment among the Welsh people. If you had chosen you might have mitigated, I think, the exasperation which may be caused by this Bill, and I think you would have been wise if you had done so. The Government think our opposition to the Bill has been too strenuous. I suspect that one of these days they will regret it was not more strenuous and more persistent, so that we could have converted them from their errors on this occasion as we did before. The day will come when the Government will be only too glad to concede the right of trial by jury to Wales, as they are now glad to cast the burden of the tithe on the owner instead of the occupier. I do very much regret that again the Government have availed themselves on this matter of the assistance of their allies who are Liberals in all things except as affecting Ireland. They have voted down Welsh opinion in favour of trial by jury; this is a test of their Liberalism in all things except as regards the Union. If the Government had made this concession I think we might have made a settlement of this question, and certainly I would not myself—I speak for no one else—be voting against the Third Reading of this Bill. You think this Bill is going to settle this question, and bring tranquillity to Wales. I hope it may. I wish I thought it would. I think it is much more likely to bring a sword than to bring peace. At all events, from the form this Bill has finally assumed, in spite of all our efforts, successful on some points, but unsuccessful in many more, I have come to the conclusion without hesitation that I must vote against the Third Reading of a Bill which, I am sorry to say, I believe will cause more evil than it is likely to cure.

*(6.52.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: We have just witnessed what is always a great and solemn spectacle—that of a man struggling with the supreme difficulty of explaining the reasons for the difference between his views and his actions. I am quite sure, judging from the erratic course the right hon. Gentleman has hitherto pursued on this subject, that if it had remained among the Forms of the House that there should be not only the Question that the Bill be read a third time, but also the further Question that the Bill should pass, on that further Question the right hon. Gentleman would again change his mind. What are the reasons the right hon. Gentleman has given for taking, with regard to the Third Reading of this Bill, a different course to that which he adopted on the Second Reading? First of all, he told the House that the Bill is better than previous Bills. The right hon. Gentleman claims the parentage of the principle on which the Bill is based, namely, that the liability for the tithe rent-charge should be transferred from the occupier to the owner. I think, however, that it ought to be stated, in all fairness to my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon, that it was on his motion and persistent action that the House in 1889 established that principle in opposition to the Bill then proposed by Her Majesty's Government. [Sir W. HARCOURT: I admit it was with his assistance.] The right hon. Gentleman further claims that a great part of the Amendments which he and his friends proposed to our Bill of last year have been adopted in the present Bill; that during the progress of the Bill through Committee we have adopted ten at least of the Amendments proposed on his side of the House; and he has praised, in terms for which I thank him, the manner in which I have attempted to perform the duty of conducting the Bill through the House. Surely these are all reasons for not taking a more hostile course to the Bill on the Third Reading than he did on the Second Reading. The right hon. Gentleman says the Bill is admittedly incomplete. I have made no such admission. The right hon. Gentleman declares that we have recognised an omission in the Bill which ought to be remedied, and he referred to the question of derelict farms and the right of entry of the tithe owner. I myself never regarded the right of entry of the tithe owner as a right of any serious value to him; and if that right is to be complicated by questions of compensation, I do not think we have done any injury to the owner of the tithe rent-charge by omitting it from the Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the right hon. Gentleman be kind enough to explain, for certainly it has not been understood until now. Is it understood, then, that this Bill abolishes altogether the right of entry upon the land by the tithe owner?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The 2nd sub-section of Clause 1, as it at present stands, leaves only the right of distraint to the tithe owner to be carried out through the County Court. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to an Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Norfolk, with regard to which I have made a promise on behalf of the Government that we will endeavour so to amend it in another place that the House may again have an opportunity of discussing it. That promise was made simply because hon. Members lost their opportunity of discussing the matter, not because I myself had any objection to the Amendment. The only point upon which the right hon. Gentleman can fairly say the Bill has been admitted to be incomplete by us is that just at the close of our proceedings on Tuesday night the Attorney General, at the urgent request of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite, consented to include in the Bill certain provisions as to costs of solicitors and witnesses in undefended cases which he had previously promised would be made by Rules of Court. I must say I think the contention of the right hon. Gentleman, that he is justified in objecting to the Third Reading because of the incomplete condition of the Bill, is not founded on the facts of the case. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to complain that the Bill does not abolish distraint for tithe rent-charge. We have never said that the Bill does abolish it. What we have said is that it abolishes the liability of the tenant for the tithe rent-charge, and abolishes the possibility which now exists that the tenant may be distrained upon for a debt that is not his own. Under Clause 1, he can only be distrained upon for the equivalent of the debt which he has himself contracted to pay, until he chooses to make a fresh contract. The right hon. Gentleman objects to the time when the 1st clause will take effect, but he never placed an Amendment on the Paper to carry out his views. He objects to Clause 2, on the ground that it will bring into the County Court a large number of the people in Wales. But the only people, either in England or Wales, who can be brought into the County Court will be the owners of land. No doubt there are in Wales a considerable number of small owners of land; but to say they form a very large part of the population is to speak with an exaggeration which is hardly worthy of the right hon. Gentleman. There is no injustice: there can be no injustice to Wales in this matter, or in the matter of trial by jury. The right hon. Gentleman also objects to the County Court as the tribunal in these matters, because he thinks its decisions will not be based on popular sentiment. I hope judicial decisions will never be given in accordance with popular sentiment. I hope they will be given in accordance with justice and law. Hon. Members from Wales admit that they have confidence that the County Court Judges will act according to law and justice. But if the right hon. Gentleman feels so strong an objection to the 2nd and 3rd clauses, how is it that when these clauses were put from the Chair his name does not appear among those who voted against them? The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) at the time pointed to the absence of the right hon. Gentleman as a proof of his lukewarmness.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Permit me to say I had an engagement which I could not break, and which made it necessary for me to be absent when the Division on Clause 2 was taken. I certainly was not deliberately absent.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I entirely accept the right hon. Gentleman's explanation, and I will not pursue the subject. The real question is not the consistency of the right hon. Gentleman, but whether the Bill in its present shape is such that the House ought to accept it? I will not, however, enter into a discussion of the merits of the Bill, for these have already been fully discussed. I believe it to be a measure which will be an advantage to the tithe owner in assisting him to recover a debt legally due to him; an advantage to the tenants of England and Wales, who will be freed from liability to distraint for a debt not theirs; and an advantage to the tithepayers, who, in cases where it can be shown that the tithe, owing to agricultural depression, is excessive, can claim and obtain relief and remission.

*(6.5.) MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I cannot allow the Third Reading to pass without recording on my own behalf and on that of my constituents, and I hope I may without presumption add the people of Wales, my protest against the principle of legislation involved in this Bill. This is no doubt, in name, a Bill for England and Wales, but no one will deny that in substance it is a Bill to punish persons in Wales who have declined to pay tithe, not because they desire to rid themselves of a just and honest obligation, but because they object to what they consider the misappropriation of the tithe. That such is the true intent of the Bill was confessed in some observations which were made in Committee by the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes). I have no sort of inconsistency to defend, nor do I think there is any inconsistency in the course which has been taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. I presume the right hon. Gentleman, in common with others, might well have approved of a portion of the general principle of the Bill, whilst he hoped his own efforts and the efforts of others would have the effect of inducing the Government to adopt such suggestions and Amendments as would have enabled him on the Third Reading, not partially or generally but wholly to approve of the Bill. That expectation, if it was indulged in by the right hon. Gentleman, has been lamentably disappointed, and we are confronted by the argument that the Bill is being passed for the benefit of each and all the various classes of society within the Principality of Wales, while the Bill is condemned by the almost unanimous voice of the Representatives of that country. The Government refuse to allow the people of the different nations who go to make up the Kingdom to legislate for themselves within their own borders on the ground that the House of Commons is able and willing to consider their case; and yet when the whole body of the Representatives of one of the nations unite with one voice in condemning the provisions of a Bill ostensibly brought in for their benefit no heed is given to the representations made. If the measure is to benefit Wales, why do the Government not take care to make the majority of the Welsh people their coadjutors in the work of pacifying Wales? Why do the Government exclude the people from the exercise of part of the judicial functions with which in other matters they are entrusted? Why is it there has been such a desperate resistance to the demand for trial by jury? In principle it cannot be pretended that there is anything in the arguments of the supporters of the Government, because trial by jury already exists in cases where the amount in dispute is over £5. Why if there is no question of principle, and the Bill is for the benefit of Wales, do the Government decline to make the people their assistants in carrying the measure into effect? The effect of refusing trial by jury in cases under £5 is really to deprive the people of Wales of the right of jury trial in such cases altogether, because, practically speaking, the people who will be brought into Court under the provisions of this Bill will be persons whose tithe is under £5. I object to the Bill, not only because it is an irritating measure, but a measure which increases and aggravates and complicates the difficulty which already exists around the collection and appropriation

tion of tithe in Wales. I object to the Bill because it is unnecessary, and not demanded by any large section of the people. Who is it who demands the Bill? It is not the landowners. It is not the tenant farmers or small yeomen, and it is not in all cases the clergy, because in some parts of England, notably in Essex, dread notes of dissatisfaction have been heard from them. And in some parts of Wales the clergy themselves do not seem to regard the Bill as a boon. The increased expenses which will be put on the people through the intervention of the County Court will put a new bone of contention between the people and clergy, in addition to sowing dissension between the landowners and the clergy. I consider it is going to extreme lengths for the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to characterise the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, or that of any other Member of the House in regard to the Bill, as erratic, especially when we recollect the peculiar gyrations and singular evolutions which have been performed by the Government itself in regard to the tithe question. I should have thought that, under the circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman would have avoided imputing to the Opposition a course of conduct which has so signally marked the proceedings of the Government on behalf of certain classes who are now owners of tithe. There have been some amendments made in the Bill, but those amendments do not reach the point which the Welsh Members wish to attain. The right hon. Gentleman eloquently and warmly expressed the hope that our Judiciary would never be affected by popular sentiment. In a sense, I re-echo the right hon. Gentleman's hope. If the right hon. Gentleman means that those who exercise judicial functions ought not to be affected by the clamour of the moment I agree with him; but if he means that Judges are to shut their eyes to the circumstances that surround them, if he means that people who share in the popular sentiment are to be excluded from the administration of judicial functions by being kept out of the jury-box, I disagree with him in toto. I do not desire to frame any indictment against the County Court Judges of Wales; but Judges have their prejudices as well as jurors. It is impossible for a man to disentangle himself from the effect of his training and surroundings, and it is because I and my hon. Friends believe the prejudices of the one class are less injurious in the long run to the nation's welfare than the prejudices of the other, that we are anxious to insist that justice will not be done if the people of Wales are not made assistants and coadjutors in the carrying out of this Bill by being empannelled as jurors in cases under £5 as they can be in cases above £5. With this protest on behalf of my constituents, against what I believe to be an unnecessary and mischievous Bill, I shall go into the Lobby against the Third Reading.

(6.20.) MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): Since the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) has imagined that I was opposed to this Bill, he has been good enough to pay a good deal of attention to my views. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to do so once more and refrain from opposing the Third Reading of this Bill. It contains so valuable a principle in its 1st clause in regard to the transference of the tithe to the right shoulders that I think we ought to allow the Third Reading to be taken without waste of time. The right hon. Gentleman was good enough to say that he left Clause 3 entirely in my hands. Well, it is in reference to Clause 3 that I have been at issue with the Government; but I have been beaten, and I will not unnecessarily prolong the Debate by reiterating what I have said about it. I will say that at a former stage of the Debates on this vexed question I hoped that more concessions would have been made by the Government on Clause 3. I based that hope on words that fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes), who, replying to an appeal on my part respecting the value of buildings, said the point I had urged in regard to a separate assessment of buildings and land, and a reduction of the rateable value of buildings was one which the Government regarded as well-deserving of consideration. But as the Debates proceeded, and some hon. Members opposite—particularly the hon. Member for Leicester and the hon. Member for Northampton—turned their prentice hands to the defence of property, I knew my cause was lost. The alliance then made between the representatives of the tithe owners here and those Radical Members would, I knew, be too much for me, and I acknowledge that it is useless for me to try again to get any of my views incorporated in Clause 3. All I can say is, I hope that when this question again engages the attention of Parliament—and it must do so when the Report of the Commission on the Redemption of Tithe is presented—the compromise and the give-and-take of which we have heard so much, will be more real than they have been during the present Debates. Before I sit down I wish to thank the Government, and especially the right hon. Gentleman (Sir M. Hicks Beach) in charge of the Bill, for the continued courtesy with which they have treated the views that have come from all sides of the House. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill did somewhat, I must admit, upset my equilibrium the other night by the way in which he was good enough to apply to me the simile of the ostrich. But I have since had time to rub up my natural history, and I find that, after all, I need not mind the simile, because the ostrich is described as a wary bird that is difficult to catch, and that, when assailed at close quarters, is in the habit of giving very hard kicks. After the very hard kick the right hon. Gentleman says I gave him the other night it would not be graceful on my part to say more on the point.

*(6.25.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) : As I am one of the Members for a county which is, perhaps, more affected by this Bill than any other, I should be wanting in my duty to my constituency if I did not enter a final protest against it. Upon the whole, I think the Bill in its present shape is rather better than the measure as first produced to the House. I cordially acknowledge the great courtesy and good temper which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has shown during the whole Debate. If I may say so, it seems to me he has a shown qualities which mark him out for even a higher position in this House than that which he at present occupies. But having said this, I must add this Bill will be immensely unpopular in that part of Her Majesty's dominions for which it is specially intended. Look at the Division Lists on this Bill. I think nearly all the Liberal Members for Wales—certainly all those in town at the present moment—voted solid against the Government proposals. But there are three Conservative Members for Wales and two for Monmouthshire. Out of these five Members, only one—the Member for Pembroke Boroughs, who, after all, represents what is called “little England beyond Wales”—is the only man who has given any support to the Government. It is literally a “one man, one vote” support. I agree with my right hon. Friend in saying it is scarcely prudent for the Government to force down the throat of the population which will be chiefly affected by it even a good Bill. There is in Wales a much larger number of small occupying freeholders than the Government supposes. There are certainly very many thousands of them. The 1st clause may be welcomed by these men, but the 2nd clause will be resented by them. That clause constitutes the Welsh County Courts tithe collectors to the Welsh clergy. It makes a popular tribunal the agent of an unpopular law. What do you gain by such a provision? It will make the Courts unpopular without adding to the popularity of the clergy. You will have litigation in every case, conducted in populous centres, where of course it is much more easy to get up hostile agitations, and when this has been done, you will have to go through the same process as at present, the only difference being that the distress will be levied by the Court and not by the tithe owner. It is quite clear that the clause will not be acceptable to the County Courts or to the numerous litigants who will find their business stopped by the number of cases that will be brought into Court by the Act. It has been called a Clergy Relief Bill. I doubt very much whether it will do much good to the clergy. I believe there are many clergy who feel that the Bill will only make their position more untenable than it is at present. I believe it will be another downward step in the direction of the future of the Welsh Establishments.

(6.31.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport), who spoke amid cries of "Divide," said: I am by no means a strenuous supporter of this Bill, but I cannot give a silent vote for the Third Reading, because there is much in the measure which I and many of my friends disapprove. But if anything could have induced me to support the Bill with all my heart it would have been the remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman and by hon. Gentlemen opposite against it. There can be no doubt that my right hon. Friend in charge of the Bill has with the utmost courtesy accepted many Amendments from the other side, but I cannot say he has treated Amendments coming from his own side in the same way, and the result is that the Bill is capable of much improvement. I was not thoroughly aware of what the Bill did until I read it as amended—and I doubt whether other Members were. It is one of the inconveniences of rushing a Bill through Committee that it takes just as long on Report as in Committee. I find that the 1st clause of the Bill deprives the landlord of his present right to enforce a tenant's covenant to pay the tithe rent-charge, and leaves him open to the one remedy of distress to enforce payment of the tithe rent-charge. That seems very objectionable. The 2nd clause deprives the tithe owner of his right to get his money by distress at the end of 21 days, and keeps him waiting for probably five months before he can do anything at all. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that he does not value very highly the power, of which the Bill also deprives the tithe owner, of taking possession if the land is in the owner's occupation, but I can assure him, from my own experience and practice, that that power is very efficacious. It is true it is seldom put in force, but that is because the mere threat of exercising it is sufficient. The tithe owner can only get the tithe out of the future rents if there is nothing to distrain on, and they will not be able to touch them until a year after they are due. The Bill also makes the rates assessed on the tithe rent-charge a personal debt due from the tithe owner, who may not have received the tithe rent-charge on which they are assessed—a personal debt which can be obtained by execution or distress upon his property.

The argument of the hon. Member for Cardiganshire (Mr. Bowen Rowlands) simply came to this: that the law ought either to provide for the immediate disendowment of the Church of England or to provide that no tithe rent-charge should be recoverable against any occupying tenant. With regard to the costs, I must point out that they can never be incurred by the defendant unless he has refused to pay that which the Court has decided to be a just debt, and if any costs are incurred it will be his own fault.

(6.39.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I should not have interposed at this stage of the Bill but for a remark of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), who endeavoured to make out that I and some of my hon. Friends differ from my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) in the recommendations he has made with regard to the measure. On the contrary, as far as I am concerned, I have voted consistently every time in the same Lobby as my right hon. Friend, and there has not been one of my right hon. Friend's recommendations which has not had my concurrence. As nearly all my right hon. Friend's recommendations have been carried without a Division, I should like to know what has led the Member for Derby to believe that we differ from my right hon. Friend. Though I supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division of Essex (Mr. Gray)—and regret that it was not carried—I loyally accepted the decision of the House. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade will be right and I wrong, and that the Bill will prove thoroughly satisfactory to every one in the country.

(6.41.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I desire to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and of the Attorney General to the 5th sub-section of the 2nd clause. It provides—

"Where the occupier of the lands out of which the tithe rent-charge issues is liable under any contract made before the passing of this Act to pay the tithe rent-charge, and is, consequently, liable by virtue of this Act to pay the amount thereof to the owner of the lands, the owner of the lands shall serve notice of such liability on the owner of the tithe rent-charge, and, thereupon, before an order under this section is made, there shall be such service on and hearing of the occupier in addition to the owner as may be prescribed."

But there is no penalty whatever imposed and no security taken that the owner shall serve such notice, and, therefore, it seems to me that there has been an oversight. There ought to be a provision declaring that where the owner of the land neglects to serve notice on the owner of the tithe rent-charge, then his remedy against the tenant shall cease. If no penalty is attached to an omission of this kind on the part of the landowner, it is questionable whether he does not by omission render himself criminally liable to an indictment. Under the Bill a statutory obligation is imposed, but no penalty is provided for non-performance of that obligation. I merely draw attention to this in the hope that the right hon. Gentleman will consider the matter with the view—if he agrees with me—of having the defect in the Bill cured in another place.

*(6.44.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I intend to vote against the Third Reading of this Bill, and I venture to trespass on the time of the House for a few moments in order to say what I had not an opportunity of saying on the Second Reading of the Bill. [Cries of "Divide!"] I object to the Bill because it is an openly avowed electioneering Bill, and nothing else. We are told that it is the result of a bargain between Lord Salisbury and the Church—the Bill being offered to the Church for its support at the next election. Well, I object to the measure being forced through Parliament simply on that account. If it were brought forward as a matter of business to facilitate the collection of tithe, I could understand it, and should support it, but we know very well it is no such thing. Then, I object to the Bill because I object to any interference with the collection of tithes until the question of what shall be done with this national property has been settled by Parliament. That is one of my strong objections to interfering with the subject at all, because I say it settles nothing. It does not get rid of the question before us, and which has been before us all along. So far as the 1st clause is concerned, I, of course, heartily agree with the principle that the landlord or owner of the land should pay the tithe. It was always intended that he should do so, but most landlords have contracted themselves out of it, and would do so now if they could. [Continued cries of "Divide!"] We have been told by the Postmaster General that the real reason why this Bill is brought forward is to settle the religious difficulty in Wales. Well, this is not going to settle it, and, even if it were, to my mind it is not the proper way of settling it. My opinion is, that the proper way to settle the matter is by Disestablishment and Disendowment; but I do not want to go into that question until it is before the House. I have here a letter from a noble Lord, written in January of this year, in which the same opinion is expressed. At any rate, therefore, we shall have one supporter when this Bill gets to another place. [Cries of "Name!"] I have no objection at all to giving the name. I refer to Lord Brabourne. That we should have a proper settlement of this question in the way I point out is the view not, perhaps, of the money-making Bishops, but of the hard-working clergy. They would prefer to see a settlement by Disestablishment and Disendowment, because the present difficulty separates them from the people. But I have another objection to the Bill, and that is that the tithe is not now, and will not be when the measure is passed, honestly divided amongst the Church ministers. We are constantly being told, especially by the Church, that the religious income is for the religious instruction of the whole of the parishioners. That I quite agree with, but I disagree with this Bill, because it does nothing to compel the Church itself to divide the income properly amongst its own ministers. The parish in which I live has five churches, each with an ecclesiastical parish of its own. [Renewed cries of "Divide!"] Perhaps it will surprise some people who support the Church so strongly to hear that the whole of the income in the parish goes to one church, and that the other churches which are called upon to perform four-fifths of the work have no endowment whatever, and have to depend, like the Nonconformists, on what they receive from the people. Is that right? Is it right for one clergyman of a parish to put the whole of the income in his pocket and allow other clergymen to do the work? Before I agree to any interference with the collection of the tithe I want to see these questions settled, and I am speaking not as a Nonconformist, but as a Churchman. I have another reason—[Cries of "Divide!"—and a very important one, as it comes from the Church herself. The Church has declared that it is persecution to force people to pay tithe in support of a Church they object to. I may be told that that is not correct, but my attention has been called to the fact that this subject was discussed in 1771. [Cries of "Divide!"] I have here a copy of a letter written by the celebrated Benjamin Franklin on this question of persecution. On June 3rd, 1772, he wrote:—"Sir, I understand from the public papers—[Continued cries of "Divide!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: I must point out that the hon. Gentleman's observations are not relevant to the question before the House.

*MR. MORTON: The letter shows that the Church of England claimed that it was persecution to compel Episcopalians to pay tithe or tax in support of the Presbyterian Church, and the Americans settled the question (and that is what I want you to do before you pass this Bill) by allowing every person to pay his tithe or tax to the Church he made use of, and gave the minister of that Church power to compel him to pay it. As a Churchman, I object to persecution, and I object to dealing with this tithe question until we settle it in the interest of the whole of the people. [Cries of "Divide!"] If the Bill had been brought in by a Liberal, not a single Member on the other side would have voted for it. I shall vote against it as a Churchman and a churchwarden, and I shall oppose every Bill of this sort until you are prepared to disestablish and disendow the Church.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ELECTORS REGISTRATION (ACCELERATION) BILL.—(No. 147.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

* (7.12.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr.

RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It will not be necessary to occupy the attention of the House long in explaining the Bill, the Second Reading of which I now rise to move. In consequence of the passing of the Local Government Act, the register has been very largely increased by the addition of numbers of electors for the purposes of the County Council elections. Representations have been made to the Local Government Board that the time between the last day for the revision of the register and the day for the completion of the register is not sufficient. The last day for the revision of the register is the 12th of October, and the day for the completion of the register is the 20th of October, leaving, therefore, only eight days for printing and completing the register. The most important representation which was made to the Board on this subject was made by a deputation from the County Councils Association. It was not in any way a representation from any particular Party, as no Party question was involved, and it was introduced by Mr. Hibbert, at one time Secretary of the Local Government Board. It was stated by this deputation that while in every case the expense of preparing the register would be enormously increased if the present limit of time were maintained, in some cases—those of large counties with a great number of electors—it would be absolutely impossible to complete the register in the requisite time. In any case the haste necessitated would lead to a great deal of inaccuracy and incompleteness. The hon. Member for Somerset induced Parliament to pass a Bill in 1889, which was operative for two years, and which remedied the complaint which had been made. But we are now face to face with the election for County Councils on the 1st of November next, and therefore it is essential that if anything is to be done in the direction I have indicated it should be done quickly. It was represented to me by the deputation which waited on me that the difficulties in the way of private Members passing Bills were so great that unless the Government undertook the charge of the present Bill there was exceedingly little chance of its passing, and the consequences would be very serious at the election for County Councils in November. I could not but acknowledge the force of this representation. It would be a great misfortune if the registers were not ready in time, and sufficient time given to secure that they should be as correct as possible. I have, therefore, introduced this Bill, which make some important alterations in the dates. The main alteration is setting back the end of the qualifying period from July 15th to June 26th. The reason that date has been taken is in order that householders going into occupation on quarter day should not be placed in any less advantageous position than under the present period. Instead of leaving only 12 days between revision and completion the Government propose by an alteration of the dates to give a period of 27 days, which it is said would be ample for the purpose. Under the Bill the revision will be over on September 23rd, and the register will be completed on October 20th. When I undertook to introduce the present Bill I did so with certain qualifications and reservations, which were assented to by all the Members of the various Political Parties who attended with the deputation which waited on me upon the subject. I said to the deputation that it was quite impossible, in view of the other engagements of the Government, to introduce a Bill of this kind if it should be made the ground for an attempt to revise the whole registration law and re-open the various important questions which I know many Members desire to see opened upon the question of registration. It is obvious that a revision of the whole Registration Law is a matter of first-class importance, and would require to be very fully discussed in this House, so that we could hardly expect to get it through without giving up a considerable amount of Government time for that purpose. On the other hand, the proposals in the Bill are of a very simple character, and deal entirely with machinery. They raise no questions of serious importance in connection with the registration of voters. The Government have undertaken the charge of the Bill with a view of making the register as complete and accurate as they can for the next election, and I hope the House will assist and support the Government in the limitation which they have laid down, and not endeavour to carry the Bill beyond the four corners of these small machinery alterations. There is, however, one alteration which I think will meet with general acceptance. The register for Parliamentary and local voters is now practically the same, and if the register is to be brought into operation on November 1st for the purposes of local elections, I see no reason why it should not be brought into operation for all purposes on that date. If the Bill is to be operative for the next register we have no time to lose. I will ask the House, therefore, to assist the Government in passing into law at the earliest possible date the recommendations I have made.

(7.28.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I think the House will agree that the Bill makes a useful alteration in the law, and will probably be accepted without much contention. I have only two criticisms of a practical character to make upon the Bill. The County Council Register comes into operation on November 1. It is to be deposited with the returning officers on October 20. A week must be allowed for printing. The Government must find some means of trying the appeals, for otherwise the appeals from the decisions of the Revising Barristers must go unheard. The result would be that persons not entitled to vote would be upon the register, and persons entitled to vote would not be on the register at the time of the election. I do not see how the Government can meet that difficulty if they adhere to the dates they have given. Another point is, that by changing the date from July 15 to June 26 any person having gone into occupation on July 1 would be disfranchised for a year. I do not think we should ruin the Constitution if, for this year, which is the only year to which it will apply, we made the qualifying period 345 instead of 365 days.

(7.30.) MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I think the measure which has been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board will be regarded by hon. Members generally, on both sides of the House, as introducing for a special and limited purpose what he considers a necessary change in the present state of things; but at the same time I concur with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury in regard to what he has pointed out as practical objections to the measure. I do not speak so much with regard to the way in which it will operate with reference to County Councils, of which bodies I know very little, but I understand to some extent the way in which the Bill touches the Parliamentary Register, and it is solely as to the Parliamentary Register that I now wish to speak. I may, however, say one word with regard to the County Councils Register, and that is, that in my belief, if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board were to issue a circular to those who are responsible for the preparation of the register, urging them to proceed with their business with all possible despatch, the work that has to be done might be accomplished in plenty of time. If this is not done, I think the most simple way of dealing with the matter would have been not to have brought in this Bill, but simply to have postponed the elections of the County Councils from the 1st of November to the second week in January. I believe the bulk of the people all over the country agree with me that that would be the most practical and popular way of dealing with this question. With regard to the Parliamentary Register I would call attention to four practical objections which seem to me to present themselves on a consideration of this Bill. The revision of the register by the Revising Barrister, under this measure, is to take place between the 20th of August and the 23rd of September. Now, Sir, I venture to think that that will be found to be a most inconvenient period for overseers, especially for those who reside in the rural districts, a large proportion of whom are farmers. It would be highly unsatisfactory to those who have to discharge the duties of overseers to be called upon to go before the Revising Barristers at that particular period of the year. If it is difficult for the farmer I am afraid it will be more difficult for the voters, and as I know, representing an agricultural constituency, in such constituencies voters are to a very large extent agricultural labourers. The period between August 20 and September 23 is not only the time of harvest for grain, it is also their harvest for wages. At this period they earn the highest wages they receive throughout the year. I also know from experience that many of these men have to attend before the Revising Barrister because of objections to their votes. Without making any imputation against anybody or introducing any party feeling, I may say that in my own division I was told that in one year 400 absurdly frivolous objections were taken to votes of men in the labouring class in the hopes that some of them would not be able to attend and defend their claims, and so would be disfranchised. That is a point, however, I will not now deal with; it is a matter that will have to be dealt with some day. That is my first point, that the time proposed for revision will be very inconvenient not only for the overseers, who are generally farmers, but for the agricultural labourers who will have to defend their votes if they are objected to. Then I want to point out a much more serious objection. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) has pointed out there would be some disfranchisement under this Bill, but I do not think the House is aware of the extent to which that disfranchisement will really go. I observe the memorandum attached to the Bill which the President of the Local Government Board has been good enough to distribute for explanation of the contents of the Bill, says in the last line that the Bill "does not in any way propose to alter the franchise." Now, I question the strict accuracy of that statement, because I think I can show that the Bill will disfranchise a large number of the working classes, and therefore it does to that extent alter the franchise. The Bill proposes to alter the period of qualification for occupation voters on the Parliamentary Register from July 15th to July 15th, as it is at present, to the period from June 26th to June 26th; it proposes also to alter the date when the register shall come into force from January 1st to November 1st. Well, of course that is a very excellent provision; we all recognise that, for it to some extent shortens the time of the present ridiculous period for which a man has to live in a place before he can vote; but even that very shortening from January 1st to November 1st, even that, because the Bill is retrospective, in itself causes disfranchisement. I am afraid I may be rather tedious, but these are technical matters, and I will try to make myself clear. Every voter who is now on the present register, that is, the register which came into force on January 1st, 1891, under the present law, can give his vote in any election which takes place between January 1st and December 31st, 1891. Now, what can that man do when this Bill is passed? If he changes, or if he has changed his constituency without receiving any notice of any new legislation, after June 26th, 1890, it is clear he will not be entitled to be on the new register, under the arrangement in the Bill, coming into force on November 1st, 1891. If that is the case, he will not be upon that register, he will not get any qualification for that register, but he will distinctly lose the right he has now to vote in all elections which take place between November 1st, 1891, and January 1st, 1892. If that is so, clearly there is a disfranchisement, I do not know of how many voters, but if it disfranchises only one man surely that is not seriously proposed, and surely the House will not agree to it if it is? And now I am going to point out a disfranchisement which seems to me to be very much more serious and which, so far as I am able to gather the facts, will be a disfranchisement under this Bill of thousands of the working classes. I will try to make this clear. The effect of this Bill will be that every single voter who changes his constituency—I say constituency, for I am not alluding to successive voters—or who has already changed his constituency irrevocably, and without notice of this proposed change, between the 26th June and 15th July, 1890, will be disfranchised under this Bill for a period of 10 months, from January 1st, 1892, to November 1st, 1892, I will give an instance to make that clear.

*MR. RITCHIE: It is so.

*MR. COBB: Well, if the right hon. Gentleman admits that, I need not trouble the House with my illustrative instance. All these men, therefore, will be disfranchised for 10 months. Well, then, a Bill which takes away existing rights —

*MR. RITCHIE: We will make provision for that.

*MR. COBB: Then, upon that understanding, I pass on from that to mention another point. The scope of this Bill and the scope of the Schedule is to put every date forward by 19 days; but there are exceptions for which I do not know the reason, and one exception is the payment of rates. Instead of the payment of rates being put forward by 19 days it is put forward by 35 days. Of course, it is obvious that imposes a liability upon a man to pay his rates in order that he may vote at an earlier date than that to which he is now subject. I do not want to continue discussion; I have prepared Amendments for Committee with a view of remedying these points to which I have taken exception. Of course, if there is a flaw in the view I have taken I shall be the first to admit it if it is pointed out, but if my view is the correct one, then I think these dates ought to be altered. No one ought to be disfranchised under this Bill; no farmer or labourer ought to be taken from harvest operations to attend before the Revising Barrister; and the period for payment of rates ought not to be altered. I must say it is an unfortunate time for us to approach this question. I quite agree that we have in the near future to deal with it, and I know the idea now is to deal with the next County Council election, but there will be plenty of time to deal with it before another County Council election comes on, and for the sole purpose of facilitating one County Council election on November 1st, all these alterations are to be made, and all these difficulties will arise, and there are so many technicalities connected with it that there may be other wrongs and inconveniences done by the Bill which none of us are yet able to see. I cannot understand why the Government, instead of making these changes now, do not make a determined effort and push on the printing. I am sure that if the printers are pushed they can get the work done in the time we have now. I am told by Town Clerks there is no difficulty in pushing on the Municipal Lists, but if there is a difficulty, then a simpler way would be to postpone the County Council elections to the first or second week in January. I have taken the trouble to collect opinions from those interested, and since the deputation waited upon the right hon. Gentleman, when I am not quite sure that the scope of the Bill was understood, and they believe that this postponement would be the better course.

*(7.40.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I admit difficulties arise in carrying out the object of the Bill, which is that the elections on November 1st shall be on the new rather than on the old register, and to avoid postponing elections until January. The arrangement of the Bill appears to me to be excellent, and I have no doubt that any good suggestion will receive attention at the next stage, and hence it is that I mention one point, and that is the fixing of June 26th as the date from which the qualifying period shall extend back for 12 months. I think the right hon. Gentleman must have intended 12 months prior to June 25th, because Midsummer Day is June 24th, and therefore this date of June 26th appears to me—and I speak from practical experience—just one day too late, because those whose tenancies expire on quarter-day will hold occupation until 12 o'clock on the 24th, but they will not be in possession on the 25th, so if the 26th is the end of the qualifying period they will be a day short. As we come so near quarter-day we might as well make the date coincide, so that the 24th may be the end of the qualifying period, up to the 25th instead of the 26th. I am sure my object will be appreciated, and I conclude that it was forgotten that the Midsummer quarter-day is June 24th, though Christmas and Lady Day fall on the 25th of the months. With regard to hearing householders' objections before the Revising Barristers in the months of August and September, I think, perhaps, the evening sittings which are used for the purpose of listening to lodger qualifications, might be utilised to a certain extent for those householders who cannot attend in the day time, but in regard to appeals it does not strike me how that can be remedied, because the Courts are not sitting. But no doubt some special arrangement might be made for taking appeals in the month of October; there are not many of them. The balance of convenience is very much in favour of the Bill, and I do not think it is beyond the skill of its promoters to make it perfect in Committee. I trust that we shall have a new register for the convenience of the County Council elections, and perhaps of a general election, and that we can thus dispose of our electoral differences before Christmas.

(7.45.) MR. F. ROBINSON (Gloucester): I quite admit the difficulties attending this question, but I am afraid the proposal of the Government will create new difficulties I should like to see avoided. It seems to me the better plan would be to postpone the elections. I should like to see the elections in counties and boroughs postponed until March 31st, which is the end of the financial year in these local matters. November is one of the worst months in the year for election purposes. It is dark at four o'clock in the afternoon, and when we think of our country friends traversing long cross roads and dark by-ways after attending a County Council election, I am disposed to think their interest in the proceedings will much diminish. They have not had the experience in this matter which we have had in the towns. When November was fixed originally the same objection did not exist as now, because the poll closed at 4 o'clock, but now that the polling time is extended to 8 o'clock, I can assure the House there are very serious inconveniences to contend with in the dark hours of a November afternoon, when the electors are open to all sorts of corrupt influences. It is very objectionable. I cannot conceive how in country districts the people are to be brought to the poll if the polling is fixed for November, and kept open till 8 o'clock. I have had considerable experience in local municipal matters, and I know the difficulties that exist, and I firmly believe that a few years' experience will so convince people of the difficulties and inconvenience that everybody will be glad to have the elections changed from November to March, when the days are longer and brighter, and which is the end of the municipal financial year. The alteration will have to be made eventually, and why not make it now? The President of the Local Government Board pleads shortness of time, but my proposal would not take any longer than the present Bill, and it would, in addition, give plenty of time for the registration to be attended to, and also for all registration appeals to be determined in time to be inserted in the new list of electors. No Party question is involved, and I earnestly appeal to the Government to consider my alternative plan.

(7.50.) MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): As I had the duty of introducing a similar Bill to this on behalf of the County Council Association, I may be allowed to say a few words. As has been pointed out this is a practical measure, it has no political import, and there is no attempt to drift into it important questions of registration in which much interest is taken. I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby there are practical necessities for the Bill. He seems to think that by putting sufficient pressure upon printers and Revising Barristers the lists might be got through in time, but I can assure my hon. Friend that in a large county where there may be 100,000 names to put on the register under the present law it will simply be an impossible task without waste of money and danger of inaccuracy. That is the opinion of all the Clerks of the Peace, and no class of men have so intimate an acquaintance with the subject. The object of the Bill is twofold—to save Clerks of the Peace this almost impossible task and the money of the ratepayers at the same time. The proposal is to put forward the date by 19 days, and an alternative has been indicated—the alteration of the date of election, and there have been several expressions of opinion in favour of this alternative course. I must say, however, the suggestions made have been somewhat discordant. The hon. Member for Rugby proposes to alter the date of election to January 1st; but the hon. Member who has just spoken (Mr. Robinson) thinks March a better time. No doubt we all have our private preferences; but I may point out that at a large meeting of County Council representatives, held in November last, the alternatives to the Bill were fully discussed, and only one Gentleman present was in favour of postponing the day of the County Council elections. Those of us who are familiar with these matters must strongly object to having the date of election put more into the middle of winter. The 1st of November may not be a perfect day, but certainly it is better than the 1st of January. It would be a mistake to postpone the day of election, already fixed for November, to the following spring, and thus compel many County Councillors, who have other duties to attend to at that time of the year, to begin their County Council duties at an inconvenient season of the year. There is one clause in the Bill which was not included in the Bill promoted by the County Council Association last year; that which affects the Parliamentary Register. We thought that was outside our functions, but the House will see it is only sensible and practical when you have a register complete, to bring it into operation without delay. The defects which have been pointed out will no doubt be considered by the Government. As to disfranchisement, which the hon. Member for Rugby has so clearly explained, I am sure that there is no disposition, either on the part of the Government or of the parties interested in the Bill, to refuse to insert any necessary safeguards for the protection of any elector who may be affected by the change. It was considered by the original framers that the number of electors who would be thus affected would be almost inappreciable. As to the selection of the 26th of June, that date is chosen because in certain years the 24th might fall on a Sunday, and as in that case the tenant would go out on the 25th the qualification period would remain as under the existing law. If we put back the period to 12 months preceding the 24th that would alter materially the franchise as it stands at present, and a principle in the Bill is to affect the franchise as little as possible.

*MR. COBB: In no way.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I am in no way responsible for the memorandum; I am speaking of the view of the promoters of the Bill introduced last year, and I believe the Government in this Bill have the same intention. It may be that the memorandum, a little over or under, states the effect of this Bill, but I believe the intention in the Bill is to affect the franchise as little as possible, while making a change in machinery to save inconvenience and expense to all the ratepayers in the country. I trust a way may be found of meeting the objections raised, and I hope there will be no unnecessary delay in the passage of what I am sure will be a very useful measure.

(7.56.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): Those who endeavour to substitute for the Bill an alteration in the date of the County Council elections may be doing a very good thing so far as County Council elections are concerned, but they lose one of the great points gained by the Bill. The principal point gained is that you get a County Council election upon a brand new register, and we have all the more probability of getting a general election for Parliamentary purposes on a brand new register, or at any rate on a newer register than it would otherwise be. Not only is the register to be a new one for the County Council elections, but it will bring the voter to the poll at a period nearer to the beginning of his occupation than now. It will shorten the period between the commencement of his occupation and the end of his qualifying period. That I consider is a great advantage in the Bill. Whether County Council elections should be held at a later or earlier period of the year than at present is another question. I think, for the reason I have given, most sections in the House will welcome the principle of the Bill. There is no doubt that the Bill does bear traces of a want of full consideration in its preparation, and it is unnecessary to add a word to the extremely lucid explanation given by the hon. Member for Rugby, to show that on the points he indicated the Bill needs amendment. There is another point which the right hon. Gentleman will, I believe, be ready to correct, the opportunity for new lodgers under the present Bill is less for the signing of these clauses—I do not mean for the presentation of them—by something like three weeks. That I believe will also be put right. We are indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for putting various points of disfranchisement straight. There are two points of difficulty to which I desire to call attention. One is with regard to the date on which poor-rates are to be paid, and the other is a more permanent disfranchisement caused by the date of a change of residence from one borough to another. With regard to the first, I admit that it is an excellent thing for the rate-collecting authorities that they should have an opportunity of getting their rates in sooner, but I do not see why there should be any alteration in the number of days allowed under the present system. The hon. Member for Woolwich has suggested that the qualifying period should be from term-day to term-day. The very fact that the suggestion came from the hon. Gentleman shows how entirely out of the region of party politics is the suggestion. For three weeks ago the London Liberal Members, in a deputation to the right hon. Gentleman, brought this very matter before him. I cannot admit that by putting back the date from the 26th of June to the 24th of June, there is any alteration in the franchise. Suppose, for instance, the term-day were to be altered from the 24th of June to the 15th of July, there would be no substantial alteration in the character of the franchise, but there would be prevented that disfranchisement which takes place at present because of the non-coincidence of the quarter day with the termination of the qualifying period, I cannot see how the franchise would be affected by putting back the date which the right hon. Gentleman has now put back by 18 days, two days more. At the present every man who changes his occupation from one borough to another on quarter day loses his vote for a year and the disfranchisement will continue under the new arrangement. It does seem very hard that if a man occupying a house on one side of a street, which is in the Bethnal Green Division, crosses over on quarter-day to the other side of the street, which is in Shoreditch Division, he should lose his vote.

*(8.5.) LORD H. BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): I am quite sure the Government are actuated with the best intentions in asking the House to read this Bill a second time, but I regret for all that, that it is not a more comprehensive measure or far-reaching one. No measure of registration will ever be a just one until every qualified elector is placed on the Register by some recognised official without any trouble or difficulty to the voter. The onus of the objection could still remain, as at present, on either political parties for the ultimate decision of the Revising Barrister.

made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hoxton (Mr. Stuart) to the President of the Local Government Board that he should, now that he is tinkering with the law, change the date from the 26th to the 24th of June. If he did so, he would rectify an anomaly which is felt very grievously in the Metropolis by both Political Parties equally. I can quite understand the right hon. Gentleman wishing to avoid large questions of registration, but I assure him he would do a great deal for us in London in regard to the mere business work of registration if he consented to the alteration in the dates we suggest. It is really a very small matter. He will have our support in any case, but he would do a great deal more to merit the gratitude both of the London Members and the London County Council if he acceded to our wishes in this respect. I do not think there is any advantage gained by introducing the question of what month is best suited for the elections. That has nothing to do with the Bill. We merely ask for a very small reform of machinery; and if the right hon. Gentleman is able to make the concession we seek, I am quite certain none of my colleagues in the representation of the Metropolis would try to introduce any Amendments in Committee inconsistent with the purpose he has said animates him and the Government. (8.11.)

(8.43.) MR. MALLOCK (Devon, Torquay): Sir, with reference to the remarks made by the hon. Member for St. Pancras, I wish to ask the Attorney General if he will explain whether the Midsummer tenant going out on the 24th June would be put on the register. If a tenant came on the 24th June, 1890, for instance, and his tenancy terminated on the 24th June, 1891, and if again the Bill were altered from the 20th June to the 24th June, would that tenant be put on the register? I have letters from the representatives of all parties suggesting the 24th June might be the date adopted. There is one inconvenience which must occur from this Bill. At present the overseers have 37 days from the 24th June to the 31st July to watch the changes and to make out their lists, and that time in many cases is hardly sufficient. Under the Bill the 37 days would be reduced to 18. If I understood the President of the Board of Trade aright he is going to accept the suggestion of the right hon. the Member for Bury, and that he will take care that those who come into residence between the 26th June last year and the 15th July should not lose their votes. I had intended to draft an Amendment to that effect, but now it will not be necessary.

(8.45.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): Sir, several hon. Members have made suggestions about the qualifying period. For my part, if we cannot have the qualifying period the 24th June, I would much rather, under present circumstances, continue the present qualifying period the 15th July. Of course, we are all in favour of the acceleration of registration, but I think it is quite possible, if a little pressure were put on the Revising Barristers, or if an addition were made to their number, that the registration work could be completed by the 30th September. I think the revision might be commenced on September 1st, and still be completed by the 30th, which would get over the harvest objection of my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby. So many objections have been pointed out to the details of this Bill that it would be much simpler if the Government adopted the suggestion I make to keep the qualifying period for the present at the 15th July, and to see that the Revising Barristers do their work between the 1st and 30th September. The President of the Local Government Board said he had no intention of dealing with the general subject of the franchise and registration. I suppose he made that statement on behalf of the Government as a whole. Yet we have on the Paper to-night a Bill which deals with the ordinary Registration Law, and later on we shall have something to say about it. With regard to the present Bill, several inconveniences have been pointed out, especially those indicated by my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby, and, therefore, the Government must expect that when the Bill reaches Committee they will have to deal with several Amendments.

(8.48.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The hon. Members who have discussed this Bill have pointed out several matters of detail and principle. First, with regard to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury as to the best way of dealing with the possible contingency of appeals for Revising Barristers. If this is felt to be a serious difficulty we shall have to consider before the Bill leaves the House how far it is possible to include in the measure some alteration with regard to appeals. It has been suggested by the hon. Member for Rugby that that is a matter for inquiry and consideration. We quite recognise that. Assuming that the House has determined that the operation of the register should be accelerated in the case of the Parliamentary Register, there is one way it appears to me of meeting this difficulty. At present, owing to the old rule, appeals from the Revising Barristers cannot be heard until the 6th of November. It is a relic of the old term, called the October Sitting. The Revision Court is always a strong Court of three Judges; and it occurs to me, should it be ultimately determined to retain the provision that the Parliamentary Register should come into force on the 1st November, that some arrangement might be made whereby the Revising Barrister would put stars against the printed names, or print them in italics, thus indicating that certain questions were raised. Then arrangement might be made for appeals to be heard at the very commencement of the sittings, so that the register would be in effect, even so far as the starred names are concerned, if not by the 1st of November, within a very few days after. So far as the Parliamentary Register is concerned, no serious inconvenience, if any at all, would occur. [The hon. Member for Rugby dissented.] The hon. Member is quite right; I say it is impossible altogether to avoid the difficulty. With reference to the suggested alteration of the date for County Council elections, it will be remembered that all municipal elections take place at the beginning of November, and it would involve various disturbance and dislocation of business if those elections were put forward to January or March. The next matter which requires mention is the possible disqualification, not in future years, but in the year 1891, for the fact that persons have not occupied for the qualifying period, the 12 months, in consequence of having removed between the 25th June and the 15th July. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has intimated that that can be cured by a provision in the Bill. So far as that temporary disqualification is concerned there would be no difficulty in meeting it. The hon. Member for Rugby objected to the Bill on the ground that the revision would take place during the harvest months. I do not see that there would be much difference between the existing period of revision and the proposed period, as affecting the harvest months. I do not think it will turn out that there will be any serious inconvenience in that respect. I would remind the hon. Member that his objection also applies to the County Council elections, and if the objection be insisted upon we shall have to consider whether the Bill is to be pressed forward, because it is an objection which strikes at the position of the whole matter. It is not possible to discuss it unless the hon. Member moves the rejection of the Bill. One or two hon. Members have fallen into a little error, not unnaturally, with regard to the first line in the Schedule, as to the payment of rates on the 15th May and the 1st June. The word should really be "notice" instead of "payment." The rates in question are the rates payable on the 5th January. As a matter of fact, the earlier we put the notice as to the payment of rates, the better it would be for the voter, because he would have a longer notice that he would be disqualified if his rates were not paid. But lower down the Schedule there is an alteration from the 20th July to the 15th June. The hon. Member referred to the 1st June and the 15th May.

*MR. COBB: I did not name any date at all. I said that the payment of the rates was put forward, instead of 19 days, 35 days.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman; it was some other hon. Member who made that observation. As a matter of fact, if he looks at the history of this matter he will find that it ought to have been put at an earlier date in the original Act. It is, however, a matter of no substantial importance, because the notice is to be given on the 15th May, and on the 15th June the man has to pay his rates. We think that a proper date, having regard to the scheme of the Act. It is a matter for the House to decide whether an earlier or a later date should be fixed. I think it will turn out for the proper working of the Bill that it ought to be the 15th June. It has been suggested that the matter could be brought right by bringing greater pressure to bear on the printers; but from communications I have had with Clerks of the Peace, I find that the necessity of one or more revisions of the list, and, in some counties, the distances to be traversed before the printer can be reached, constitute serious difficulties in the way of satisfying the objections of the hon. Member for Rugby. The hon. Member for Southwark suggested that we should increase the number of Revising Barristers. Well, I should be glad if a larger number of deserving members of my profession could receive the small emoluments which are given for the very hard work of registration, but, after all, we have to consider the necessities of the case, and it does not seem to me requisite to increase the number of Revising Barristers. We should not have more of these gentlemen than necessary to perform the work of revision efficiently. We might get over the difficulty of revision by having a larger number of Revising Barristers, but it would not get us over the difficulty of printing, which is one of the principal difficulties.

MR. CAUSTON: I suggested that the 30th September should be the date fixed upon, which would give time for printing.

SIR R. WEBSTER: That date, as compared with the 23rd September, has been very carefully considered by the Clerks of the Peace in the counties with the idea of getting the two or three days that they think necessary. The date we have adopted has not been selected haphazard, but after very careful consideration. The hon. Member for St. Pancras and one other Member suggested that we should make the qualifying period end on the 24th June, so as not to disfranchise anyone, but, as was pointed out by an hon. Member behind me, that would disqualify people very seriously. I need not remind the House that the qualification is for "on and for 12 months preceding" the qualifying day, so that if you fix the 24th June it would be a positive disqualification to many voters who would not be able to prove that they were in occupation of their new premises on the 24th and 12 months preceding, and they would remain on the register for a long time in respect of an old occupation, and would not be able to qualify for the new register. That would effect an alteration in the law which ought not to be made in this Bill. It would be unwise to incur the risk of disfranchisement in a large number of cases for the sake of the simplification of the process by taking the earlier day. Why the 26th is taken is this: No difference of qualification in any year except the first can arise as compared with the existing law. Any question of the occupation not having been long enough in the year 1890-91, can be met by a special clause. The disqualification arises by the fact that on no other date would the occupier have been long enough on the register; but when you have to shift from the 15th July back to an earlier date all that you have to do is to take the earliest possible date that would not disqualify, and the earliest possible date is the 26th June. The 25th June would have given rise to some legal questions, therefore, to be absolutely safe the 26th is taken instead of the 25th. It is immaterial for the purpose of this Bill which date is taken. It would only be material if we were going to make such an alteration as is proposed by the hon. Member for Hoxton and the hon. Member for St. Pancras. That we have said we cannot do, but we have gone back as far as we could to give as much time as possible for the registration. I have only to say, in conclusion, that whilst the Government are anxious to further registration, and to effect, if possible, that the registration shall be got into operation for the municipal elections by the 1st of November, with sufficient time for good revision—for the work of the overseers being properly done, and for the ministerial work of printing being efficiently carried out—if the objections which have been raised are felt by the majority of the House to be such as to outweigh the good we have thought the Bill would effect, the only alternative will be not to proceed with the measure.

(9.7.) MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): I am glad the Attorney General has spoken to the House, as we were waiting with anxiety for a further statement from the Government in response to the criticisms addressed to them from this side of the House—and addressed to them in no unfriendly spirit. There is no disposition on this side of the House to defeat the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman opposite might put his foot down, and refuse to accept Amendments, but I hope he will take a wiser and more tactical view of the situation. I think it would be possible to modify the Bill so as to meet objections raised on this side of the House; and I gather from what has occurred that the Government will be ready to give every consideration to our proposals, though reserving to themselves the right not to persevere with the Bill. As to the risk which would be involved in putting the date back from July 15 to June 26th, as at present advised, I think it could be done, not by naming the 24th specifically, but by adopting such phraseology as “up to the 25th” without saying “included,” which would give the 24th both to the incoming and the outgoing tenant. I do not think it necessary or desirable to multiply discussions on the details of the Bill, or even on the various important points of criticism which have been suggested to the Government and the House. What we were anxious to ascertain was whether the Government would receive, and not repudiate, suggestions in the form of Amendments in Committee coming from this side of the House. I think I do not incorrectly interpret what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman and from the Attorney General when I say that they are perfectly prepared to go into Committee on the Bill, and then exercise their judgment as to how they should deal with Amendments. Still I think it would be rather premature for the Government to announce what Amendments they will and will not accept. It will be for hon. Members and the Government to exercise their judgment on the different Amendments when they are moved in Committee. The objections to the Bill seem to be these: As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury has pointed out, this Bill will, unless amended, certainly disfranchise certain persons, and the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to move Amendments in Committee to rectify that effect.

MR. RITCHIE: We shall be willing, if possible, to insert some clause in the Bill which will prevent the disfranchisement pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury. It has occurred to me, however, that there will be some difficulty in the matter.

MR. STANSFELD: The right hon. Gentleman is quite right in intimating that if possible he will do it, and that if he finds it impossible he will not do it. It is intended to prevent disfranchisement in the Bill if it can be done in the drafting, and we shall be entitled to criticise any Amendment which may be proposed from that point of view. We, of course, reserve our rights as the Government reserve their rights. The next question raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury was the question of accelerating appeals. I do not understand the Attorney General to speak positively on that matter, but he is inclined to the opinion, or hope, that a way may be found of meeting that difficulty.

SIR R. WEBSTER: The Courts cannot sit before the 24th October on account of the Long Vacation, but it seems to me that the register could be printed provisionally so as to be completed by the 1st November.

MR. STANSFELD: That seems to me satisfactory as a Second Reading statement, and we shall be within our right in discussing any solution of the difficulty the Government may propose. Another objection taken by the hon. Member for Rugby was as to the revision going into the harvest time. I do not feel myself a competent judge on that subject. I have not at my finger-ends the beginnings and endings of the harvest time, but the matter might be dealt with to suit the seasons of the different counties. I ask the Government to consider all these points in a fair spirit, as we on this side are disposed to do. I do not know whether they will propose to recommit the Bill—

MR. RITCHIE: No.

MR. STANSFELD: They will table all their Amendments at once?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes.

Mr. STANSFELD: If that is done we shall be able to look on the Amendments on the hypothesis that they are all to be inserted in the Bill, and shall be able to form an opinion as to whether they are reasonable and satisfactory. I feel quite sure we shall come to agreement, and that the right hon. Gentleman is not inclined to be too severe.

(9.18.) Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to enter a protest against the Bill, on the ground that it will not operate fairly in the case of Ireland. Under this measure, if there is a dissolution on the 1st or 2nd of November, the English people will have the advantage of a new register, whilst the Irish people will have a register ten months stale. Of all the remarkable pieces of forgetfulness that it is possible to imagine on the part of the Government in drawing up a Bill of this kind dealing with "integral" parts of the United Kingdom, this is the worst. In the event of a dissolution taking place in the early part of November, Ireland is left out in the cold. How are you going to mend this? Of course you will time your dissolution to fill your own sails. You will naturally think of your own people. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that there are two other partners to this firm, but you have been good enough to forget us. It was all very well before the franchise was extended to treat the two countries, England and Ireland, as not on a parity. Even when the narrow franchise of former days was in force you took good care that the register should start in the month of January in Ireland. With that beautiful Imperial symmetry which you are so fond of talking about and so ready to depart from when it suits your purpose, you have made our Irish Register to synchronise with yours. Now, without rhyme or reason, but simply because it suits your County Councils—we having no County Councils at all—you declare that we may take our chance of a dissolution whenever, for ought I know, it suits the policy of the British East Africa Association and the dukes thereupon. I object in toto to this proposal on behalf of both Ireland and Scotland. The Scotch Members do not seem to have roused themselves on this point. The matter is one of very great importance. The General Election of 1886 took place in January and February, and it was, I presume, determined to have it at the time because the registers were fresh. The question of freshness or staleness of a register becomes of enormous importance when dealing with a franchise so extended as is that at present in force. What happens is practically this: in order to have a vote in this present year, a man must have been in occupation since the 20th of July, 1889. consequently all the removable classes are deprived of the franchise and you have all through the country a mass of people whom it is impossible to find at any General Election. We are now nearing a General Election, and it is natural, after having for five years had a Tory Government in office, that we should be somewhat anxious to rid ourselves of such an incubus, and it is equally obvious that Gentlemen opposite should be anxious to retain their salaries as long as they can. The Government bring in this Bill with the most reckless disregard of all the other component parts of the Kingdom to which it will apply. I have put an Amendment on the Paper, the reasonableness anybody but a Tory or a Liberal Unionist would admit. If you are going to appeal to the people they ought to have notice that the appeal is to be made. Why should this House any longer tolerate such dissolutions? The constitution of this Parliament for five or seven years is a matter of sufficient gravity to justify giving the people the advantage of being registered in advance. Why is the House of Commons to be left at the mercy of a Minister who has perhaps just returned from Berlin bringing peace with honour, or has just made a light railway in Ireland, or passed a Special Commission Act, to make a snap appeal to the people upon side issues of that kind? I say solemnly that in this country where you have a seven years' Parliament the least you can do is to have an enumeration of the people beforehand. My Amendment is in this sense. What will be the argument of those who oppose it? Will it be that it will be too much trouble to carry it out? You cannot expect to get your seats without trouble or to get your places without trouble, and I do not think the people will tolerate the notion that they are to be choused out of their right to settle the composition of the House of Commons for want of a better system of registration. The present system is a disgrace to civilization. We hear about the rings in New York, and yet will it be believed that in the United States every citizen has to come up every October or November and swear he is a citizen and entitled to vote? What you insist upon in this country is that a man shall be in possession of his premises practically for two years before he is entitled to vote, and you offer no facilities to the subjects of Her Majesty to assert their rights as citizens, and to make their voices heard. If you have faith in the people, as you say you have, why are you always so anxious that the people should not be registered? It is one thing to tolerate the present system in regard to chance bye-elections, but when you have 670 elections taking place at once, surely the people should have an opportunity of making an examination of conscience before hand, and of getting upon the register. In bringing in this Bill, simply in order I suppose to save a few pounds, you are straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. If you are so anxious to save a few pounds to the County Council or to the taxpayers, why are you not anxious to expend a few pounds in securing the proper registration of Her Majesty's subjects. What ought your object to be on this question of registration? Ought it not to be to get as many people as possible on the register, to get the proper people on the register, and to see that the voters cast their votes at the proper time. From whom does this proposition come? From the Liberal Unionist Member for Somersetshire (Mr. Hobhouse) who brought on this Bill last year, and had it promptly blocked. I ask what good can come out of Nazareth? Does anyone believe that the hon. Member for Somerset wants to get people put upon the register? That he wants more voters in his constituency? If so, will he vote for my Amendment? My object is to put people upon the register, and I say that before you have a general making up of the minds of the people, such an opportunity as I ask for should be afforded them. That was done by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1885. We were about to have a dissolution, and we all knew it, because the Redistribution Act had been passed. Well, what was the provision then made? A provision was made to secure that, before the people were asked to vote under the new arrangement, they should have the opportunity of being enumerated and registered. If that was done in 1885, why should it not be done in 1891 or 1892? Is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to be the only Minister who is prepared to give the people before they vote the opportunity of registration and enumeration? Why do not the Tory Party do it? I am told that my Amendment will limit the power of dissolution. I do not care whether it will have that effect or not. It provides that if you dissolve in any months except the months of January, February, and March, you must give the people the opportunity of being registered so that you may not shut them out. Why is any person to be shut out who has paid his rents and rates and lived in the constituency long enough to qualify him for a vote? Why is he to be shut out at an important crisis in his country's history, because he was not in occupation on the 20th June or the 1st of July? Is there any magic in the dog-days, because it would seem to be the suggestion of the Tories that you must have a dog-days' date for your registration? What magic is there in the month of July? [Laughter.] Oh, I withdraw. An hon. Gentleman opposite reminds me of the battle of the Boyne, though I believe it was the battle of Aughrim that was fought in the month of July, but, barring those eventful dates of Aughrim and Boyne, I see nothing at all magical in the month of July. After all this is a practical question, one on which the fate of the Empire might depend for years to come. You who sit opposite declare that the people are opposed to Home Rule. The Liberal Party say, on the contrary, the people are in favour of Home Rule; but, at any rate, everyone admits that the Home Rule policy is a question of vast importance. I say that full opportunity should be afforded for registration, and that the people of Ireland and Scotland ought not to be left to the chance of a dissolution in November or December, before means had been taken to secure a proper system of registration. I therefore beg to move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no Bill dealing with the subject of Registration can be satisfactory which does not provide for a special registration of voters prior to a General Election where Parliament is dissolved at a time when the existing Register is more than three months in force,"—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR^r RITCHIE: I am sorry the hon. and learned Gentleman, in making his remarks, has not shown a nearer approach to the tone in which the debate up to this time has been carried on.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It was too low.

*(9.40.) MR. RITCHIE: The hon. and learned Gentleman says it was too low, but at any rate he knew that the change as regarded England had been caused by the large number of voters added to the Municipal Roll for 1888. For my part I confess that I share the idea that amendment is required in the machinery of registration generally, and we should not have touched this question at all without dealing with it in a much more comprehensive way, had it not been that the matter was one of pressing importance, on account of the County Council elections. The circumstances are not the same in Ireland, where there are no County Council elections, as in England. It is not that Ireland is forgotten, but the circumstances are altogether different. The hon. and learned Gentleman finds fault with us for not making some alteration in the time at which the Parliamentary Register in Ireland should come into force. He called attention to this matter the other day, and we promised to consider it, but after all it is a small matter. As I understand, the difference is all a question of a month. I am informed that a serious difficulty might arise in Ireland if the Parliamentary Register there were brought into operation earlier than it is now. The hon. and learned Gentleman has taken up the cudgels on behalf of my poor country, Scotland. If there are no other Members present to defend Scotland I will constitute myself her champion, and say it is an outrageous thing that the people of Scotland should have to elect their members on the old register.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. T. M. HEALY: I said I did not know anything about it. I asked a question.

*MR. RITCHIE: Then why does the hon. Gentleman speak about it? If the hon. Gentleman wished to speak on our case in Scotland, I think he ought to have informed himself as to the law. Perhaps he would be surprised to know that the Parliamentary register comes into operation in Scotland now (on the 1st of November, so that no alteration as regards Scotland is required. This proposal will bring the English system of registration into harmony with the Scotch. So much for the preliminary observations of the hon. Member.

MR. T. M. HEALY: And Ireland is to be left out in the cold?

*MR. RITCHIE: I told the hon. Gentleman the other day that the Government would make inquiries, and if anything could be done they will try to meet the hon. and learned Gentleman's views. With regard to the Amendment I hardly think it can be seriously proposed by the hon. Gentleman. The Amendment would mean that, in the event of a Vote of Want of Confidence, the Government against their own will should be compelled to remain in Office to conduct the affairs of the country with the House of Commons against them for a period of something like three months. Such a proposition is one that it is almost too absurd for the House of Commons to consider.

MR. MAC INNES (Hexham): The County Councils Association, which comprehends persons of every shade of political opinion, are unanimous in pressing for this measure. Although in very large cities there would be no difficulty in doing the work, it has been proved to the satisfaction of the Association that in many of the rural districts it would be impossible to find people to do it. Therefore, we ought to be grateful to the President of the Local Government Board for introducing a measure which will provide the necessary machinery.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES REMOVAL

BILL.—(No. 182.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(9.49.) SIR R. WEBSTER : Sir, I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill. The House will remember that two or three years ago the public were somewhat surprised at a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, which laid down that compulsory absence—if I may use the expression—even for one night, even though the voter was in all other respects qualified, prevented him from being placed on the register. In fact, to take an extreme case, supposing a man to be two nights absent in a Volunteer camp doing Volunteer service in obedience to the orders of his superior officer, he is thereby disqualified. I have received representations from Revising Barristers and others asking me to get the matter put right, and I have the satisfaction of knowing that when the subject was debated during the last two Sessions everybody was prepared to say there was no justification for the existing disqualification. It was then pointed out that there might be other cases of temporary absence whereby a voter would be disqualified by being sent away, and that there was no reason for such a person losing his vote by reason merely of absence in the discharge of duty. Some limit, however, must be adopted, and as four months is the period of absence which disqualifies in the case of ordinary residence, a similar limitation has been introduced into the present measure. Last year objection was taken to the Bill on the ground that I did more than was necessary to cure the evil, by introducing the section relating to police officers. Whatever may be thought as to the desirability of that alteration of the law, this year I have thought it better to do no more than simply cure a mischief which has been largely felt in various parts of the United Kingdom, and therefore I have confined the Bill to the simple provision that a man shall not be disqualified from being registered—

“By reason only that during part of the qualifying period, not exceeding four months at any one time, he has, in the performance of any duty arising from or incidental to any office, service, or employment held or undertaken by him, been absent from his dwelling-house or lodgings, or not resided in or within the required distance from such county or borough.”

I hope the House will consent to the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

*(9.52.) MR. CAUSTON : This Bill is of a very different character to the last. This is really a Registration Bill, and we have been told by Her Majesty's Government over and over again that they do not like tinkering with registration. No more tinkering Bill has been introduced in this Parliament than the present, with regard to registration. I quite admit that the Bill deals with a grievance, but is it the only grievance in reference to registration? Why should only soldiers, sailors, and petted persons be selected for the purpose of being relieved from a grievance? Why do the Government not deal with the grievances of the lodgers and occupiers? Why do they not do what the learned Solicitor General suggested on the 2nd December, 1889, in the Westminster Town Hall, when he said that—

“When Parliament had made up its mind as to the particular class of persons who should enjoy the Franchise, it was their duty to see that it was rendered as easy as possible for every individual belonging to that class to obtain and keep the privileges.”

Is this Bill intended to carry out the view of the Solicitor General? I hope that a stand will be made against this Bill—not that I object to getting rid of any disqualifications, but because I think we have great reason to complain of the tinkering policy of Her Majesty's Government. We all know that Her Majesty's Government are very much divided on this subject of registration. Almost at the time that the Solicitor General was speaking in Westminster Town Hall, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was speaking at Hull. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby was urging the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with the subject of registration; but he was told then by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it would mean a new distribution of political power—one more tinkering with the Constitution. He said—

“I think we may say for sometime now we may look to the results of past experiments, without attempting once more to pick our Constitution to pieces.”

That is what the Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks we shall be doing if we give these men, who, as the Solicitor General says, had the franchise extended to them, the opportunity of having their names on the register. We all know, whether the Conservative Government deals with this question or not, that it is the intention of the Liberal Party to do so at the earliest possible moment, and I hope we shall deal with it in a thoroughly practical way—one man one vote, three months' occupation and six months' register, or something even better than that, and then we shall be carrying out the view which the Solicitor General so earnestly expressed at Westminster. I say we have to deal with the occupiers and the lodgers. It is well-known that if a man moves out of Southwark to Lambeth on the 16th July it takes him two years and five months before he can get a vote. Yet the Government come down and make a proposal to deal with volunteers, militia officers, and so forth; but they have no regard for working men and for those who are just as much entitled to vote as the classes for whom they are pleading now. The original Bill was called “The Electoral Disabilities, Naval, Military, and Police Bill;” this is called “The Electoral Disabilities Removal Bill,” which I suppose is to apply to gentlemen's servants and coachmen taken out of town by their masters. I hope that the scope of the Bill is now sufficiently wide to enable us in Committee to deal with other disabilities. Last year, Mr. Speaker, I think you would have ruled the hon. Member out of order who had put down such an Instruction as this which I put down—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision in the Bill for the removal of the disqualification of occupiers and lodgers by reason of change of their constituency or occupation.”

I do not know whether the scope of this Bill is sufficiently wide to enable us to deal with occupiers and lodgers; if it is, we shall have an opportunity of dealing with their grievance—and the Attorney General says he is anxious to do away with their grievances—in Committee. I do not allow the Second Reading to pass without entering my protest against that which is a one-sided and tinkering Bill.

*(10.0.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I am glad that the Government have thought it right to introduce this Bill; hon. Gentlemen opposite talk about “one man one vote,” and all I can say is we shall be very glad to give every qualified man a vote, but a great many—especially soldiers—are now deprived of that right, for although his name appears on the register yet when a soldier is sent on duty—on a flying column for instance—for two or three weeks he thereby loses his qualification. Coast-guardsmen are treated in a like manner, and by going out for their annual training lose their votes. Surely under these circumstances hon. Members opposite will not oppose this Bill which, after all, only does tardy justice to a deserving body of men. It does harm to nobody; it only enables people already on the register to record their votes, and prevents their disqualification through having to perform official duties.

*(10.2.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): We on this side of the House have no desire to keep any man off the register, and our chief complaint is that the Attorney General has not taken this favourable opportunity of doing away with many other anomalies in our electoral law. His chief argument in favour of the Bill was that it was only a small measure; well, from time immemorial such an argument has been treated as no argument at all. The hon. Member who has just spoken has complained of the disqualification of soldiers, but surely it is an equal grievance that the service franchise does not apply to County Council, as well as to Parliamentary elections. County Councils in several parts of the country have petitioned in favour of this extension of the franchise, and surely the anomaly might have been got rid of by this Bill. Again, many of a very deserving class of men seem likely to lose their votes this year. I mean the agricultural labourers, who through the recent severe weather were driven to accept parish relief, through circumstances over which no human being could have control. Again, I say our chief regret is that the Bill is not a larger one, and is confined to doing justice to one class of the community instead of to many, that are also deserving of consideration.

(10.3.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I cannot agree with the hon. Member for the Basingstoke Division that this Bill does no harm to anybody, although I recognise with satisfaction the pronouncement he has made in favour of the principle "one man one vote." I hope that when the time comes in the not distant future when that principle is embodied in a Bill it will have his active support. Now, I do not at all oppose this measure in so far as it tends to give a man a vote. We want a universal suffrage, therefore any proposal that gives an individual a vote will have our support. But I do desire to point out to the Attorney General that the Bill will inflict a very great hardship on men who have to go away from home in search of work. It will disfranchise a good many miners in my own constituency; and although I have a majority there which I am not afraid will be diminished materially, still I am sure the sense of fair play which the hon. and learned Member possesses will induce him to say that no humble citizen should be disfranchised by inadvertence. In my constituency the miners have to go from one part of the country to another in search of employment, and I think the limitation of four months' absence might very well be extended. May I point out that when these men go away from home to work they keep up their homes in Cornwall and send home their wages for the support of their wives and children, and I therefore think they are entitled to keep their names on the register of voters. Yet by passing this Bill as it stands you will be disfranchising hundreds of them. Cannot the Law Officers of the Crown see their way to modifying this provision, and extend the period from four months to six or nine months. If they do not do so I shall have in Committee to propose an Amendment on that point. I am sure they will recognise it is very unfair to take from one class of men a privilege which they are by the same Bill conferring on another body. I wish they would have the courage to bring in a larger measure, and not to give us reforms in these homœopathic doses. Still we must not, I suppose, look a gift horse in the mouth.

(10.10.) MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): The first thing on which we have to congratulate ourselves is the departure which the Government have taken in this Bill. Those who took part in the Debate upon the last Bill before the House must at least be pleased that they have gained so much by action which was then termed obstruction, for the Government have now seen their way to very materially alter the scope of the Bill, and the measure is not likely to be defeated from this side of the House. I, at any rate, do not intend to oppose it; but I do join with my colleague in protesting against the manner in which its operation has been limited. The Bill itself shows distinctly how much amendment is required in our Registration Laws, and that the Government should have merely proposed to deal with the grievance of only a small section of those who are disqualified under the present system is a matter of very great regret to us. I can quite understand the enthusiasm for this Bill displayed by the hon. Member for the Basingstoke Division—a constituency in which there is a large military vote—but it should be borne in mind that there are many electors who are disqualified from voting by equally unfortunate circumstances. In my own constituency at the present time those who live on one side of a street and who were at the last election qualified to be upon the register, are now unable to vote, not through any default of their own, but simply because the landlord of the houses omitted to pay the rates at the qualifying period. I think the Government ought to deal with a grievance of that nature, and not allow the disqualification of voters for no fault of their own. I hope, indeed, that the Government will seriously consider this matter before the next registration, and see if they cannot bring in a small Bill dealing with that particular grievance. I know there are many other grievances in connection with our registration system. For instance, take the case of a lodger on the register. He finds he is prospering, and is able to take the house in which he had been lodging, but immediately he does so he loses his vote as a lodger, and has to go through the whole probationary period as an occupier before he is qualified to again have his name on the register. Surely that is a small reform which the Government might take in hand, and it is one of many instances of our present ridiculous system. I think that when they are dealing with the matter of registration they might attempt a thorough reform, and not take up the time of the House by a tinkering little Bill like this. If they would only bring in a more comprehensive measure, or give facilities for a private Member to push forward one of the measures which have already been introduced this Session dealing with such matters as successive occupation, I think they might rely upon active support, for they would then be doing justice to deserving classes of the community.

(10.18.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): The hon. Member for Basingstoke will, I think, be reminded pretty frequently hereafter of his declaration in favour of the one man one vote principle. He has, I think, a little understated the true Radical doctrine. That doctrine is not merely one man one vote, but it is every man one vote, and we say that no man ought to be left off the register if he has the least claim to be on it. But if there is any class of men whose claim to a vote is weaker than that of any other, it surely is that class who depend for their daily bread on the favour of Government officials. I do not go so far as to say that soldiers should be left off the register, but I say that their claim is weakened by their acceptance of Government employment. I think we have already a great deal too much official influence in this country, and a good deal might be said in favour of a law which deprived of their votes all who necessarily come under official influence. This Bill is intended to make a very striking exception in favour of one particular class of the population. There are tens of thousands of men subject to disabilities far more unjustifiable than those dealt with in this Bill, but the class now to be relieved comprises simply those who are known to be under Governmental and official influence. They are to be relieved, whilst others are to be left out in the cold. I remember myself that when on being elected a Member of this House I was compelled to change my residence, and I was left off the register for two years, and had no vote simply on account of that enforced change. Now, this disability is inflicted on hundreds and thousands of citizens year after year, and no effort is made by the Government to remedy an anomaly of this kind; but because Tory Members think that their principles are likely to be supported by those who are in the pay of the Government, and by the liveried servants of the rich, this special exemption is made in their favour. Who does not know how rapidly the register changes? In the course of a year probably one-third of a constituency is altered chiefly through changes of residence of the voters. Now we feel that every British citizen who has once been recognised as a voter should retain his right to vote in the future, unless disqualified by disorderly or criminal conduct. My hon. Friend the Member for Camborne has shown how this Bill is likely to affect his constituents, and how desirable it is that they should be relieved. Therefore, although I have considerable hesitation whether I ought to vote for the Bill, I shall support the Second Reading on the ground that I do not like depriving any one of his right to vote. Still, I think every adult man is entitled, as a citizen of the British Empire, to have a vote, and that preference ought not to be given to those specially subject to Governmental and official influence.

*(10.23.) SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S): I see according to the title of the Bill it is one to remove certain disabilities by reason of absence. Will it at any stage be open to the House to enlarge the scope of the Bill by moving the omission of words "by reason of absence"? I take it that it would not be competent while these words remain in the title to deal with any other disabilities.

*MR. SPEAKER: It would not. The whole scope of the Bill is compulsory absence by reason of duty.

*SIR CHARLES RUSSELL: There is no reference to compulsory absence in the Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. and learned Member will see that the Bill deals with compulsory absence.

*(10.25.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I agree with every word which has been uttered on this side of the House with regard to the shortcomings of this Bill. It is, indeed, a wonderful thing that in this nation, which is supposed to be a model of self-government, there should be at least half a million of people deprived of their votes by a bad system of registration, while half a million of people have a vote which they ought not to possess, and yet the only Bill introduced to remedy the evils of that system is the small Bill before us. Notwithstanding all that has been said against the Bill, with every word of which I agree, we cannot, as Liberals, holding the principles we do, vote against it. We are bound to support the Bill also on the ground that it refers only to genuine inhabitant occupiers, who ought all to have a vote. The Bill ought to go a great deal further than it does, but so far as it goes it is framed on right principles. It is much too partial in its application, but we accept it as part of a larger measure which will assuredly some day become law.

(10.28.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I wish to remark, with regard to the protest that this Bill does not go far enough, that the question of successive occupations has been a grievance for 30 or 40 years. For example, a leaseholder buying the reversion of his leasehold and becoming a freeholder has to begin his period of qualification over again, and the same applies to a lodger becoming the householder of the house in which he lodged. But why is the Conservative Party to be attacked for not remedying that state of things when the Liberal Party, having themselves had the opportunity of doing so, took no advantage of that opportunity to give effect to the principles they profess to hold? Over and over again they might have put their professions into practice, but they have never redressed the grievances of which they are now complaining. I therefore do not think they are justified in their present loud complaints.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL

BILL. [H.L.]—(No. 177.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

(10.30.) MR. CONYBEARE: I cannot allow the Second Reading of this Bill to pass without a challenge. I do not know whether there are any of my colleagues in the representation of Cornwall present; but I shall certainly be prepared to take a Division upon the Bill unless we receive some explanation of it. From the hesitating way in which the right hon. Gentleman moved the Second Reading, I am inclined to think he does not know much about the Bill, but it is scarcely courteous to the Members of the House that any measure should be moved without a word of explanation. I will read the Preamble to the Bill—

"Whereas in pursuance of the Truro Chapter Act, 1878, a canonry in the cathedral church of Exeter has been transferred to and forms part of the Truro Chapter Endowment Fund, subject to an annual charge in favour of the Archdeaconry of Cornwall of three hundred and thirty-three pounds six shillings and eightpence, which charge has been since the recent avoidance of the same archdeaconry reduced to two hundred pounds a year."

Although I know something about the political, if not the ecclesiastical, arrangements of Cornwall, I confess I do not quite appreciate the logic of that part of the Preamble. The Preamble goes on—

"And whereas it is expedient that the said sum of two hundred pounds a year, being the future stipend attached to the said archdeaconry, should be paid out of the common fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners instead of out of the endowment of the said canonry."

I should like to know why it is expedient? there is no reason alleged. I think, however, I could give a reason why it is expedient. We have a right to know why it is considered that this £200 should be paid out of the Common Fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners? What I think is the true reason is that the Cathedral at Truro is what is called in vulgar parlance a white elephant to the Church Party. The building of the Cathedral was commenced some years ago under circumstances which reflected great credit upon the generosity, if not on the common sense, of the members of the Church of England in Cornwall. It was thought it was absolutely necessary, in order to convert the miners of Cornwall from their evil ways, belonging as they do to the Wesleyan persuasion, that a Cathedral should be planted in their midst, and consequently the good people put their hands in their pockets and subscribed a large fund for the purpose of erecting a Cathedral at Truro. Any lovers of Church architecture who have not seen the Truro Cathedral would do well to visit it; it is a fine building, and shows that the art and ability to construct magnificent places of worship is not yet dead in this country. The erection of the Cathedral was placed in the hands of the eminent architect, Mr. Pearson, and Mr. Pearson's original estimate was that the entire building, choir, nave, central tower, and two western towers would cost £95,000. I believe I am right in saying that more than £100,000 has been spent already, and only one-third of the Cathedral is at present erected—that is to say, the choir, central lantern up to the ridge of the roof, and the baptistry are the only parts which have as yet been completed. The foundation stone which was carefully installed by itself in a portion of the vacant ground where the nave is one day to be built has yet to be reached, and now stands as a monument of the improvidence of those who undertook so great a work without setting down and counting the cost. Cornwall is a poor county. The people in the county who belong to the Church are no doubt the richest portion of the community, but they are not the most numerous, and although a great deal of money has been collected outside the county I apprehend that the question of the endowment of this great Cathedral is one of very great difficulty to those who are, and ought to be, the main support of the diocese—namely, the Church inhabitants, residents, landowners, and so on of the County of Cornwall. There has been a great deal of difficulty in getting together enough money for the adornment of the Cathedral itself, and I believe that great difficulty exists to find the £3,000 a year which is necessary to support the different ecclesiastics and others connected with the service of the Church according to the regulation and style of conducting Cathedral Institutions. I have not the slightest doubt that this Bill has been brought in to supplement the efforts of the Church people to raise a sufficient endowment for their ecclesiastics and Cathedral Institution in Cornwall by taking this £200 a year out of what I may say is a public fund for the purpose of allocating it to a particular purpose in this way. Beyond that I do not know that there is a very great deal to be said either for or against the Bill. At first sight it would appear that it is merely a transfer of Church funds from one body of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to another body; that is to say, the ecclesiastical people connected with the Cathedral Church at Truro. But then comes in this important point: The day will come, no doubt, when we shall be engaged in the work of disestablishing and disendowing the Church of England. It will then be pleaded that this £200 has been given over to the Cathedral Church at Truro in such recent times that it ought to be excluded from the rule which would bring about a general disendowment. I maintain you have in the funds belonging to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners funds which belong to the nation, and which will, when disendowment takes place, come to be used for national purposes, purposes perhaps connected with education and the like. If this transfer takes place it will be competent for the Church Party in Cornwall to say, "This endowment is quite of modern origin; we have been given this money for a specific purpose, and you cannot rightly take it away from us." I do not think there is any other point in regard to which I need trespass longer upon the attention of the House. I must, however, say I hardly think it reflects credit on the Representatives of Cornwall that when a Bill of this kind is brought forward there should be none of them present except the Chairman of the Committee (Mr. Courtney) and myself.

*(10.49.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): I think it is very likely the other Representatives of Cornwall are not here this evening because they have had an opportunity of considering this Bill, not only this Session but last Session, when it was in the hands of private Members, and they are quite satisfied that there is no foundation for the fears which have just been expressed by the hon. Member for Camborne. I think that if the hon. Gentleman had taken the trouble to study the Act of 1878, he, too, would have got over his fears. This is simply the transfer of Church property from one diocese to another. It was provided in the Act of 1878 that after the first vacancy in the Archdeaconry of Cornwall the amount to be received by the Archdeacon should be reduced to £200 a year, and it was further provided by the 11th section that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should not have the power to pay it directly out of the Common Fund. It is most desirable that the payment should be transferred directly to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is not the slightest ground for the supposition that anyone will cite the fact that we have passed this Bill in 1891 as a modern endowment of the Archdeaconry. It is clear upon an examination of the Bill in connection with the Act of 1878 that there is no additional charge at all. It is a mere matter of book-keeping, and I need not inform hon. Members who are looking forward to the time when the funds of the Church may be appropriated to other purposes, there is no form in which those funds can be more easily available than the form in which they lie with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

(10.54.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): We have a general objection to Bills of this kind. We think the House ought always to be unwilling to manipulate Church funds except in one case, and that is to appropriate funds entirely to secular purposes. I understand that this £200 is to be paid out of the Common Fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. What is the Common Fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners? It is the Socialistic Fund of the Church. I suppose it is employed in helping poor livings, and in relieving poverty-stricken parishes; in levelling up where the state of ecclesiastical funds is considerably below the general average. It is a benevolent fund, intended, so far as it is possible under the circumstances, to do justice. Now, is it fair that this fund should be robbed for such as that of restoring an endowment which was appropriated in the year 1878? I think it is very improper. For all we know some poor living will very likely go without this £200 a year, because the Common Fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners will not be able to afford to make a grant on account of this drain upon it. We are continually told by enlightened and superior persons that we are quite wrong in talking about ecclesiastical endowments as national property, that they are the property of certain corporations, whether the corporations are sole or bodies of men. Yes, but the House, by continually encroaching upon the preserves of various corporations—taking money out of the purse of one corporation and handing it to another corporation—shows that in its opinion the money does not belong to the corporations in the same sense as whatever little money I have belongs to me, or whatever estates hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite may have belongs to them. The House of Commons would never dream of touching the estates of corporate towns, but the House knows that the estates of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners stand on a different footing. Therefore, though I dislike this Bill for the reasons I have stated, and think it will improperly take away money from a fund that is intended mainly for the poor and give it back to those who are better off, yet I welcome it as an additional illustration of the conviction that is so deeply rooting itself in the hearts and minds not only of Liberal but of Tory legislators that ecclesiastical funds do not belong to these corporations in the sense that property may belong to individuals. I know that legally they do, but there is a moral difference. As I have a strong objection to the Bill, I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare) will divide against it, and, if he does, I shall certainly support him.

(10.56.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): If there were any doubt—I will not say in the minds of legislators, because I cannot conceive that there is a shadow of doubt in their minds, but in the minds of anybody that the property of Ecclesiastical Commissioners is national property—that doubt must now be dispelled. [Sir R. FOWLER: "Oh, oh!"] There is one exception. I do not know that the opinion of the House is likely to be swayed by the prejudices which occupy the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. The Church of Ireland was on every legal ground on all fours with the Church of England. When the Disestablishment of the Church of Ireland took place, how did Parliament proceed? It appointed special Commissioners for the purpose of carrying out the disendowment of that Church. The whole of the revenues of the Irish Church were swept into the coffers of that Commission, and life interests alone were satisfied by the Commissioners. That being so, I do not think we need concern ourselves with the question whether the property of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners is national property. It has been admitted on all sides since these questions came up that tithe is national property. The leader of the House admitted it last Session, and on this side of the House I believe not a single voice is raised to express the contrary opinion. I want to know, however, why the House of Commons should be occupied with trivial legislation of this character. The hon. and learned Solicitor General says it is altogether a question of a single individual. I want to know why the time of the House of Commons should at this moment be engaged in considering the interests of the Archdeacon of Cornwall. Why should the House of Commons be engaged in considering the interests of a single individual and he the Archdeacon of Cornwall? Why is he not contented with the provision made in the previous Act? Why, year after year, are we considering these questions of bookkeeping? The right hon. Gentleman did not give us the facts. Is it to increase the endowment of the Cathedral of Exeter. Is it to return part of the money which, under the Truro Act of 1878, was withdrawn from Exeter and given to this new See? I object to the Bill on the ground indicated by the hon. Member for Camborne. Cornwall is a county of Nonconformists. The people run no risk of relapsing into heathenism, though the Church were to relax all her efforts there. I know it is sometimes a plea put forward in favour of a system of Church Establishment, that if State recognition were withdrawn, our remote agricultural districts would be in danger of relapsing into heathenism. No doubt the hon. Baronet has that fear. Cornwall is another instance of that of which Wales is an eminent example. The Welsh people have made ample provision out of their convictions and their poverty for their modest religious requirements. True, they do not lavish thousands a year on a Cathedral and then come here for an additional £200 for an Archdeacon. I look upon this Bill as a covert insult to the religious people of Cornwall that the House of Commons should be engaged in thrusting upon them the manifestation of a hostile system of religion at the national expense, with all the pride and hauteur the system involves. The Government, it is well known, cannot get through its important business, and is obliged to take the time of private Members, and yet it turns aside from the business of Supply to make itself responsible for this frivolous proceeding. I think we ought to indicate to the dignitaries of the Church of England—for all these schemes come from another place—there is a mint royal for their manufacture. I think that whenever these frivolous Bills come before us we ought to say to the Church of England as a Religious Body that it ought to take the management of its affairs under its own control—not coming to the House of Commons for all these modifications, making the House of Commons responsible for these enactments, and the losses Religious Institutions must suffer because, forsooth, it prefers to be under the control of a foreign body rather than take in hand the management of its own affairs. I hope that a protest could be made on every occasion when such measures come before Parliament. There ought to be shown that there is in this House a growing determination to bring to a speedy end this state of things, and to bring about a change by which the Church of England shall manage its own affairs. I hope that in the Division we shall show an unanimity of feeling on this side of the House. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees does not wish the House of Commons to be occupied with this trumpery business. I do not think he will be singular, but will show himself to be a true Representative of the people in his own division of Cornwall, and that there is but one feeling on the part of the people of that county—a feeling of protest against that which is rather more nor less than a sham institution in their midst.

*(11.8.) MR. H. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): It is somewhat puzzling to know why the exception taken to this harmless necessary Bill by my hon. colleague opposite should lead up to a violent diatribe delivered by the hon. Gentleman against the Church of England generally, and in Cornwall in particular. The Bill provides for a redistribution of certain Church revenues in the See of Truro, and without it the redistribution cannot take place. We have long been aware of the strong views of my hon. Friend on Church matters, but this is a matter of simple conformity with the law of the land. The Bill has no opposition from Nonconformists in Cornwall, who, indeed, have nothing whatever to do with the matter. It is a necessary measure for the redistribution of Church Funds, and hon. Gentlemen opposite incur great responsibility by obstructing a piece of Church reform—for purposes which I will not specify, but which the House will understand. I support the Bill not only as a Churchman [Mr. CONTREBARE: "Church lecturer." Cries of "Order!"] but also because any measure of redistribution has to come under the criticism of Parliament. I believe that the Bill is acceptable to the people of Cornwall—Nonconformists as well as Churchmen—and it is in their interests that the measure has been introduced.

*(11.10.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): We on this side of the House are quite willing to incur the responsibility of spending a certain time in the criticism of a measure to which the Government have thought it well to devote a very solid portion of an evening so early in the Session. More especially I think Scotch Members may say a word or two, for we cannot but reflect on the extent to which we have been sacrificed in this matter. It was in the course of the week that the first popular matter in relation to Scotland this Session was going to be brought forward when that evening was taken from us by the Government it was said for the Tithes Bill, but it turns out that of two Government evenings a considerable part of one is devoted to this measure. What is this measure? It is to give £200 a year from the general fund of the Church of England to a specific purpose. It is public money devoted to a public purpose. And to what purpose?

MR. H. BYRON REED: A Church of England purpose.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: Yes, I am speaking according to the law as it exists at present. I am not bound to express my opinions on every occasion as to what purposes public property ought to be devoted. The hon. Member who has a great interest, a lively interest in this subject—I speak with all respect and not satirically—agrees with me in that. We are told that this is Church property, but it is property of which this House is bound to see to the distribution. The proposal is to give £200 a year from the general fund of the Church of England, which is intended to be applied to the augmentation of poor livings, for the purposes of ostentation and show in a district where there is an enormous preponderance of Dissenters, to swell the endowment of the Dean and Chapter and the diocesan central arrangements in a new diocese. Now I just want right hon. Gentlemen to think what they are doing. In this country the rents of great districts may be paid into the hands of one person, and this man has a great responsibility in the manner in which he uses those rents. He is bound to provide for the education of the district. I will go further and say the landowner has no right to devote the rents of a great district of this kind to the exclusive endowment of a religion which is not professed by the great majority of the inhabitants. If that is not the case in Cornwall I do not know where it is. But, unfortunately, the diversion of great reserve funds of this kind is not for the practical purposes of religion, but for swelling the ostentatious and showy part of the Establishment. A bishopric cannot be founded unless the Bishop receives £3,500 a year, while in the august Church of France—[Cries of "Order!"] I am not aware that I am in any way out of order.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT: I was not suggesting that the right hon. Gentleman was not in order in what he was saying, but he was addressing hon. Gentlemen behind him, instead of addressing the Chair.

*MR. G. TREVELYAN: To please the hon. Gentleman I will look hard at him. In the august Church of France a Bishop is endowed with £1,000 a year; but in the Church of England you cannot have a principal clergyman to look after other clergymen without endowing him to the extent of £3,500 a year, an income equal to that of a large landed proprietor. You encourage in every possible way those people who have the wealth of the country, where, perhaps, the enormous majority of the people are Dissenters. You encourage them to provide the enormous capital sum to provide this income, but likewise to provide the Bishop with a house, with a committee of ladies to furnish it according to the latest style. In fact, the money which ought to go to the real interests of the Church in the district is devoted to religious ostentation and extravagance. I do not think that such a course is likely to add to the general popularity or the efficacy of the Church. This poor sum of £200 a year should be left in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the real purposes of the Church.

Sir G. Trevelyan

*(11.17.) SIR R. FOWLER (London) It is ungracious on the part of the right hon. Baronet to complain of the course the Government have taken this week. May I remind the right hon. Baronet that if the Government had not forced the Tithe Bill through its remaining stage this week the right hon. Gentleman opposite would not be able to bring forward his Motion with regard to Ireland next Monday. The hon. Member for Bradford, of course, is an enemy of the Church of England, and therefore we can understand his action.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I wish it to be understood that I am no enemy of the Church of England as a religious institution, but that I object to it as a privileged institution. I have not the slightest hostility to the Church, and the Church suffers more from her friends than from me.

*SIR R. FOWLER: I accept the hon. Gentleman's explanation. What I wished more particularly to say is this: that at the General Election of 1868, when ecclesiastical questions, and particularly the question of the Irish Church, were prominently before the country, I was returned by a Cornish constituency to oppose the Disestablishment of the Irish Church. That shows that the people of Cornwall are not so much opposed to the Established Church as hon. Members opposite would have the House believe. I know a very large proportion of the people of Cornwall are Wesleyans. I do not know that they can be called Nonconformists. John Wesley did not, I think, call himself a Nonconformist. However, this Bill has simply to do with the distribution of Church property, and I hope no other matters will be imported into the discussion to delay the Second Reading.

*(11.23.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I oppose the Bill because I object to money being taken from the Church funds for the purposes here contemplated. There are numbers of churches which cannot get any money from the Common Fund; they are told there is no money to spare. If the Ecclesiastical Commissioners can afford £200 a year to go to a rich Cathedral and a nearly useless office, it is utterly wrong that Churchmen should have to go about to Public Bodies like the Common Council of the City, begging for money to enable them to carry on services in the various parishes. I certainly am no enemy to the Church. As a voluntary worker I have rendered her some assistance, and I oppose the Bill in the interest of the Church.

*(11.25.) MR. C. T. DYKE ACLAND (Cornwall, Launceston): I know Cornwall well, and am able to say that Truro Cathedral is not a rich Cathedral, but, on the contrary, is probably the poorest in England. It has been contributed to by Nonconformists in the noblest way, and they are proud of the edifice, and with reason. The services in Truro Cathedral are carried on with great difficulty, and this is simply a restoration of £200 a year out of £3,000 or £4,000 Cornwall contributes to the general fund. I admit that the Church of England may have no title to take up the time of the House; but so long as there is an Established Church, that Church must have this authority from Parliament. This Bill has absolutely no reference to Disestablishment, but I admit that by Disestablishment the Church might be freer and more able to do her work in the land; but so long as she is established she must come to the House for authority for what is required to be done, and she has a fair claim to come to Parliament in the present case. For that reason I cannot refuse to vote for the Second Reading.

(11.28.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): Those who are not specially interested in the maintenance of the Established Church can hardly be expected to be influenced by the arguments advanced by the hon. Member who has just sat down, and, for my part, I protest against the Church of England having further public time allotted to it this Session. Having regard to the time which has been spent on the Tithe Bill, those who are not specially interested in the Church of England have now some claim to the attention of the House. This House, after all, has no control over the actions of the Church of England, and while we have no control over their actions, it is rather hard that they should usurp so much of our time and attention. Hon. Gentlemen opposite who are most devoted to the interests of the Established Church will admit that regrettable incidents take place from time to time—such as those which occur in regard to burials—in which the conduct of individual ministers is reprehensible. These things ought to come under the authority of Parliament or of some public official. So long as we have these burial scandals without public control it is hard that the Church should take up so much time and attention. Why I protest so strongly to-day is because I have heard that a deputation of miners has interviewed the First Lord of the Treasury to ask that special facilities may be given for the discussion of the eight hours question. The right hon. Gentleman was unable to give any definite promise in respect to a matter which interests hundreds of thousands of people, but he can put a little Bill like this before the House in a prominent place on the Orders. This seems to me a scandalous state of things, and I hope that some of us will take care that it is made known to the miners throughout the country. [Laughter.] A Member of the Government laughs, but I challenge him to rise in his place and tell the miners why no time is to be found for their business, whilst time is found for a miserable little Church Bill like this. The Members of the Government seem somewhat subdued just now in face of the result of the Northampton election. A Midland borough has just returned an opponent of theirs by a larger majority than has ever been known there before.

An hon. MEMBER: On the eight hours question.

MR. PHILIPPS: Both candidates—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! This has nothing to do with the question before the House. I must ask the hon. Member to confine himself to the Bill on which, as yet, he has not even touched.

MR. PHILIPPS: I only ask some Member of the Government to get up and give the House some reason why this Bill should be regarded of such importance as to be put before the question of the hours of labour in mines.

*(11.36.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I must say I was surprised to hear the observations of the hon. Member who has just sat down, for, unless I am very much mistaken, he, like myself, is the son of a clergyman. What I learnt in early days, and what I have seen and heard of late years, has led me to form very different conclusions from those to which the hon. Member has unfortunately been driven. I do not think it fair to blame the Government for the Debate that has taken place. I was not aware, until I heard the speech of the hon. Member, that his speech was inspired by the Government; but as to the business of the House being diverted from secular matters to the Church of England, the Statute Book will show that more Public General Acts were passed in this House relating to the Nonconformist Bodies last year than relating to the Church of England. Several Acts were passed affecting Nonconformists; but, so far as I know, not one Act was passed affecting the Church of England. Hon. Members seem to forget that the establishment of Truro Cathedral was entirely due to voluntary contributions. All that is now proposed is that a paltry annuity of £200 should be secured in order to give more completeness to the Cathedral services. Every one of the Sees recently created has been established on a fund of £100,000 or thereabouts, voluntarily subscribed. That occurred within the range of my own knowledge and observation in the case of Wakefield and Liverpool; it is therefore clear that these endowments are popular. I hope the House will read the Bill a second time.

(11.38.) MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I should like to ask the Solicitor General as to Section 11 of the Act of 1878, which imposes restrictions on the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and declares that they shall not endow the Canonries of Truro. Is the object of this Bill to repeal that section, declaring, as it does, that this £200 shall be paid out of the Common Fund of the Commissioners?

*(11.38.) SIR E. CLARKE: Section 11 sets forth that nothing in the Act should authorise the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to apply any portion of their Common Fund towards the endowment of the Dean and Chapter of Truro. But endowments could be paid out of the Canonries of Exeter, and the object of the Bill is to enable this endowment to be paid out of the Common Fund, instead of the Canonries of Exeter.

(11.42.) The House divided:—Ayes 125; Noes 60.—(Div. List, No. 57.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

(11.55.) Order to go into Committee on the Civil Service Estimates read.

(11.55.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): May I ask when it is proposed to take Supply? The whole of the Estimates are not yet before the House. Supply appears on the Paper to-day for the first time as the fifth Order. To assign it such a place on the first occasion of its appearance is most unusual. The usual practice is to put it down as the first Order, so that when the Estimates are first submitted hon. Members may have the opportunity of raising questions on going into Committee.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): If Supply had not been put down on the Paper the Government would have been blamed if the House should have found at about 10 o'clock that the other Government Business was exhausted. It is therefore necessary to put it down. The Government propose to take Supply to-morrow. It would be highly inconvenient to wait until the whole of the Estimates are prepared before taking Supply.

(11.56.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Are the Supplementary Estimates to be taken before the Estimates for the present year? I shall be astonished to hear that Estimates have ever before been presented in the fragmentary way in which they have appeared this year. We know that there is to be a Supplementary Estimate relating to the relief works in Ireland. Do the Government propose to go into Committee of Supply on the ordinary Civil Service Estimates for next year before they bring forward the Supplementary Estimates to meet the financial exigencies of this year?

(11.57.) MR. JACKSON: The Government will be following the usual practice in going on with the Estimates for next year even before proposing the Supplementary Estimates for this year. It is very desirable to present reliable Estimates. The Government, therefore, have thought it right to postpone the Estimate of the expenditure for the relief of distress in Ireland, as they cannot yet tell accurately what the expenditure will be. It is impossible to say how much will be spent by March 31, as we have no certain data to go upon.

(11.58.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I wish to propose an Amendment to the Motion for going into Committee of Supply on the Civil Service Estimates, when that Motion is put for the first time. If Supply is taken to-morrow, I fear that I shall be prevented from moving my Amendment, as the Resolutions of which notice have been given will have priority. It has hitherto always been the custom to put down the Civil Service Estimates for the first time on a Monday or Thursday.

(11.59.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: As the Government do not seem disposed to answer me I put my question to you, Sir. The first question to-morrow will be that you do leave the Chair. I wish to know whether when the Resolutions of which notice has been given as Amendments to the Motion that "Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair" shall have been disposed of, the Speaker will again put the Motion before leaving the Chair?

*MR. SPEAKER: In the circumstances, the right hon. Member for Bradford would not be precluded from moving a Resolution.

(11.59.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I beg to give notice that on going into Committee of Supply on the Civil Service Estimates I will call attention to the subject of glebe lands and move a Resolution.

(12.0.) MR. JACKSON: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that there is no desire on the part of the Government to prevent him from taking the course which he wishes to take. I will consult my colleagues as to the course which will be taken to-morrow.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): May I ask whether Supplementary Estimates are to be presented in connection with any other matter than the relief of Irish distress?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot speak positively on the point.

Supply deferred till to-morrow.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.—(No. 9.)

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

Committee report progress; to sit again upon Wednesday, 3rd June.

TRADING (REGISTRATION) BILL.

(No. 183.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.5.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I understand that the hon. Member for Islington, who has a similar Bill on the Paper to this, was informed by the President of the Board of Trade that as soon as the Bill was read a second time the right hon. Gentleman would consent to its being referred to a Select Committee. What I wish to know is whether if this Bill is read a second time, the right hon. Gentleman will consent to its reference to the same Committee?

*(12.6.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have no objection myself to refer this Bill, if read a second time, together with the Bill of the hon. Member for Islington, to a Select Committee; but I think the House ought to be informed that these Bills propose to inflict a penalty upon those firms which do not register their names, and that may be rather a serious interference with trade. I am not prepared to assent to the Second Reading of this Bill until the House has first assented to the Second Reading of the Bill of the hon. Member for Islington.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

*(12.10.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Returns have been made since 1888 in a certain form, and I propose to present to the House shortly further Returns for November, 1890, in the old form, adding the two last columns of the hon. Member's form with regard to overtime. I do not think it would be advisable to grant the Return in the form in which the hon. Member has moved it. It relates to certain classes of servants whose employment has nothing whatever to do with the safety of the public, and would raise new issues altogether in this matter. If, when the Committee has been appointed, it should desire information with regard to work over 10 hours a day, then I should be perfectly willing to call upon the Railway Companies to furnish it. So far, Parliament has only asked for Returns over 12 hours a day. Therefore, I cannot agree at present to the form of the hon. Member.

*MR. CHANNING: These Returns take a long time in preparation, and several weeks will be lost if they are not proceeded with at once.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: There is plenty of time.

*MR. CHANNING: I beg leave to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn

HOUSE OF LORDS,

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF) BILL [H.L.]—(No. 33.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, I find that by some inadvertence the Bill which I proposed to read a second time to-day has not been printed. One might have supposed that during the interval which has elapsed since the Bill was last before the House, namely, Monday last, and handed in in a printed form, it would have been in readiness, but that seems not to be so. Without the prints I do not think it would be right of me to take it, as it has been slightly altered since it was before your Lordships last year. I will, therefore, defer it to Monday.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I cannot help saying that complaints have been constantly made of delays in printing. On the last occasion, I thought it right to send to the persons whom I thought responsible for them, and a reply was received that the delay would not occur again, but it seems to be the old story. I am sorry that the negligence should have recurred.

Second Reading put off to Monday next.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1st; to be printed, and to be read 2^d on Thursday next.—(The Marquess of Salisbury.) (No. 38.)

BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HERSCHELL: I beg to ask the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government are taking measures to protect the interests of English companies who were working in Manica at the time the British South Africa Company's agents entered Manica, and who held contracts from the Mozambique

Company granted before the Chartered Company came into existence, and whether Her Majesty's Government will undertake that in any settlement of the question which may be arrived at the rights and privileges acquired by those companies under such contracts shall be preserved to them?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I think that there is in this matter a slight confusion, which, I am sure, is not shared by the noble and learned Lord opposite, between private right and sovereignty. All that Her Majesty's Government have to do with is sovereignty—the questions between themselves and other Powers. Private rights endure whatever the sovereignty may be. If over a particular territory England should be decided to have influence, or Portugal should be decided to have influence, the rights, duly and properly acquired, in other persons will be held just as sacred in the one case as in the other. The answer I should prefer to give to the noble and learned Lord is, that nothing Her Majesty's Government will do will interfere with the private rights duly acquired by either individuals or companies.

LONDON STREETS.

*LORD DE ROS, in rising to call attention to the condition of the streets of London during the recent severe weather, said: My Lords, I think it will hardly be necessary for me to apologise for bringing forward the notice which stands in my name on the Paper, because I think it is a subject of interest to all classes in the community, from the highest down to that very useful individual, the crossing-sweeper. The winter we have just passed through has, I think, most amply illustrated the extremely dangerous condition of the streets of London, more especially during frosty weather. Everybody who has moved about London during the last two or three months must have witnessed the frightful sufferings of the unfortunate horses in consequence of the slippery and unsatisfactory condition of the streets. Severe accidents have happened, and several of them have been fatal. Now, all this cruelty and loss has been occasioned by the inability of most of the Vestries to keep the streets in a proper condition during the very changeable climate which we are subject to in this country. First of all, we had the snow; then we had frost, then a thaw, then snow and frost again; and so it went on alternately. It certainly was very severe weather altogether; but, still, I maintain that the Vestries ought to have been prepared for all those contingencies. The snow ought to have been taken away in the first instance; instead of which it was left to get into a hard mass, and could only be removed with the greatest difficulty; indeed, I saw men with pick-axes working it away from the gutters in the streets. Where it was not so cleared away it was swept from the centre down to the sides of the street; it was there left in heaps, and those heaps, becoming frozen, were extremely dangerous. Then when the thaw arrived they became soft sloughs, and one could not drive up to a shop or dwelling-house without plunging the horses knee-deep into a combination of snow and slush, which, of course, was very injurious to the horses' feet. Direct loss, too, was sustained by tradesmen in consequence. I happened to be in a large establishment in Regent Street about three weeks ago, and, perceiving that part of the street was very slippery, and upon asking the manager whether the business had been affected in consequence during the severe frost, he told me that the coachman of one of his best customers had positively refused to drive to the shop on account of the slippery state of the street; and as the coachman discovered that another street, where a rival establishment was to be found, was in a much better condition, much to their disgust the customer was driven there. Such a state of things is, of course, a great injury to business. About two years ago the Horse Accident Prevention Society was formed, having at its head Mr. Burdett-Coutts, the Duke of Portland and other influential persons patronizing it. On the Committee there are representatives of nearly all the large horse owners in London, the great carrying firms, the Omnibus Companies, and so on. I may say that the Society has no connection whatever with any of the Paving Companies, or horse-shoe inventors, or anything of that kind. It is solely actuated by a desire to endeavour to get the authorities to keep the streets in proper condition for the horse traffic under the varying conditions of weather to which, in this climate, we are subject. One of the first things they did was to issue a circular to all the drivers in the employ of the London General Omnibus Company, the London Road Car Company, Messrs. Carter, Paterson, & Co., and Messrs. Tilling, asking which form of roadway they considered the best and which the worst to drive over. The answers showed that 750 of the men considered wood the best, 219 macadam, 197 granite cubes, and 51 asphalt. On the other hand, 122 men considered wood the worst, 1 macadam, 13 granite cubes, 1,045 asphalt. In view of this decided preponderance of opinion in favour of wood, the Society had impressed upon Local Authorities the necessity of putting down wood pavement in preference to asphalt wherever new streets were being laid or existing streets required to be repaired. In many instances these efforts have been crowned with success. What is wanted, however, is uniformity. If there were a uniform pavement, a uniform shoe could be adopted to suit the pavement. At present there are four different kinds of pavement in use, and one great source of danger lies in the sudden passing from one kind to the other. I have received a letter from the Secretary of the United Cab Proprietors' Association, who is also a member of the Vestry of St. Pancras, which shows the patchwork condition of some of our main roads. He says—

"I desire to call your attention to that portion of the omnibus route which lies between King's Cross and Russell Square, a distance of about half a mile. Starting from King's Cross, the paving is as follows:—Euston Road, partly granite, partly wood; Judd Street, wood; Hunter Street, asphalt, then wood, then asphalt again; Brunswick Square, macadam; Grenville Street, granite; Guildford Street, partly wood, partly asphalt; Russell Square, asphalt. The above-named streets are under the control of the Vestry of St. Pancras and the St. Giles's Board of Works. Both bodies have different opinions as to which is the best kind of silent paving—St. Pancras stands by wood, and the St. Giles's Board of Works asphalt. An attempt was made to arrive at a common agreement respecting the silent paving of Guildford Street, which is in both parishes; but the negotiations fell through, each authority laying its own kind of paving.

With regard to Brunswick Square, which is in the two parishes named, information has just reached me that the St. Giles's Board of Works have agreed to the views of St. Pancras, and I have no doubt that shortly wood paving will be laid down."

As I have said, one of the greatest sources of danger is the constant transition from one kind of pavement to the other, and there, again, uniformity is what is principally required. I must say, as a rule, most of the Vestries have been quite willing to listen to suggestions coming to them from without, but others have been quite indifferent, and have proved themselves totally incapable of grappling with the difficult questions which arose during that severe frosty time. I feel certain that unless there is one uniform pavement, with a uniform system of cleaning and sanding the streets, the frightful accidents and the distress to horses will be of frequent occurrence every winter. The County Council has been approached, I believe, but without success. I do not wish to weary your Lordships with the different letters, communications, and suggestions which have come to me in reference to the condition of the streets. The newspapers were teeming with them all through the winter, and particularly with regard to the non-removal of the snow, which, I know, has been one of the most serious difficulties the Vestries have had to contend with. I am sure, nevertheless, that humanely, socially, and commercially speaking this question is of the very greatest importance, and I wish to ask whether it would be possible to establish one distinct uniform authority for regulating the paving and keeping the streets in proper condition?

THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, before Her Majesty's Government answer the question, I hope your Lordships will permit me, as a member of the London County Council, to thank the noble Lord for having brought forward the subject to-day. At the same time, I should like to make it perfectly clear to him, as I am sure it is to most of your Lordships, that the London County Council have nothing whatever to do with the matter. The noble Lord said the London County Council had been approached in regard to it, but without success. I was not aware of it; but if they have been applied to and without success, it is, as I say, owing to the fact that the London County Council have no power whatever over the streets, which are only certain portions which are under the control of the London County Council—vestries, such as the Victoria, and the rest are entirely separate Vestries, and the London County Council has no power over those streets. I hope that one result of the day will be to encourage the Government to bring forward the promised Bill for reforming the Municipal Councils, which, I hope, in some degree under the control of a central body—the London County Council. Until some legislative action is taken in this direction your Lordships are perfectly certain that the improvement whatever it may be in the streets of this Metropolitan District, I marvel to me that it is, when we consider the Metropolitan District, which is 11 miles from north to south and 11 miles from east to west, and is under the control of 39 distinct local governments which I believe have been altered in their form since the time of the Heptarchy, which was an ecclesiastical basis and an ecclesiastical constitution. I am, nevertheless, a Conservative; still, carrying Conservative principles too far to expect that the polis in the world should be governed upon such a system. I entirely endorse all the noble Lord said with regard to the condition of the London streets, and I marvel to me that more should not have taken place. With regard to the streets, the noble Lord says that wood pavement is the best by the drivers of other vehicles; but unless it is taken care of and cleansed constantly and kept in proper order, it is as bad as asphalt. As to the wood pavement in the streets at this moment just like the old pavement, very much whether there is any difference between the two as to the effect not only to horses, but to people using the streets. I only hope the discussion will tend to some

Some of the Vestries, no doubt, are excellent and useful bodies, but I must say that I do not think the public in general are satisfied with the way in which the majority of the London Vestries are carrying on their work. When we consider what are the constitutions of these Vestries, when we take into consideration the class of men who get into them, when we know how little interest is taken by the public in the Vestry elections, it is a marvel that the management of the Metropolis is carried on as well as it is. There is another point which I do not think the noble Lord drew attention to, and that is, that at the present moment it is almost impossible for any individual who has not studied the question to understand who is responsible for any particular street. Unless we can bring responsibility home to some one body or individual, we know that work is very badly done, and even when we get to know the particular Vestry that is in fault it is a very difficult thing, indeed, to bring any pressure to bear upon that Vestry for which it will care. Public opinion it does not care for very much, from the simple fact that the public will not take an interest in the elections, and will not vote. The members of these Vestries know that though, perhaps, there may be a little excitement raised against them for some particular thing they have done, in the long run it is always some two dozen persons or so who elect the Vestry, and if they can only retain the favour of those two dozen they will be returned. Before we can hope to have our Metropolis put in proper order there must be some central body constituted responsible to the public, and I hope Her Majesty's Government will do something to establish such a central body; for although they have given the London County Council very great powers, they have not—and very justly, I think—given them at once the full powers which they intend to give them. I hope, therefore, Her Majesty's Government will bring forward the Bill they promised us within no very distant period.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I only present myself to answer this question because I am the residuary legatee of all questions which have no other patron. The noble Lord whose duty it is to represent the Local Government Board in this House is unfortunately prevented by illness from attending. This preamble will acquaint your Lordships with the fact, I am afraid, that I am not much acquainted with the subject on which I have undertaken to answer a question, and I must appeal to that benignity which distinguishes the noble Lord, and which I hope he extends to Her Majesty's Government, and exhort him to spare me for any shortcomings I may show in that respect. I must say that his question alarmed me very much, because it took so wide an area. As I understood, the noble Lord was very severe on the weather of this country. I have nothing to say in favour of the weather of this country—I think it is wholly indefensible. Then he attacked all the pavements of the Metropolis and all the Local Bodies to whom those pavements are due; but I do not see what remedy my noble Friend suggested for any of these difficulties. If I am to take the noble Lord who followed him as furnishing an authorised commentary upon his speech—

THE EARL OF MEATH: Not authorised.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Not authorised? Well, a commentary to which we may look for instruction—it would appear that the remedy would be to place everything in the hands of the London County Council. The noble Lord who has just sat down uttered a very spirited criticism upon the Vestries of this Metropolis. He said that they had existed since the Heptarchy; I was not aware of that. And he said that they were eminently ecclesiastical in their constitution. That is not my impression of their present condition. He then proceeded to point out that it was impossible to trust bodies in whose election the public do not take a great interest, and within whose constitution such curious persons were found. I felt, while the noble Earl was speaking, that it was rather hard that there was not a representative of the Vestries in this House. I should have liked to hear a representative of the Vestries give his opinion of the London County Council. I am not sure that the noble Lord might not have found that he had been wielding a two-edged weapon. But I would venture to represent to my noble Friend behind me and to the noble Lord that the remedy of bringing in the District Councils Bill, to which allusion has been made, will not get rid of the variety of pavements of which they complain. It will be quite possible for the District Council of St. Giles in the future to prefer asphalt and for the District Council of St. Pancras to prefer wood. The Bill will not insure an absolute uniformity of opinion on the question of the use of asphalt or wood. Therefore, unless you have an absolute despotism vested in the London County Council you cannot insure that uniformity which is necessary for the purpose of procuring uniformity in the shoeing of your horses. My impression is that there will be some hesitation about intrusting such despotism to the London County Council without a more extended experience than we have hitherto gained of its management of the matters which have already been committed to its charge. I do not wish to say anything derogatory of its business capacities; I believe they are very high, that its energy has been very praiseworthy, and that it has devoted itself to its work in a highly creditable manner. Still, its existence has not extended over a very long period, and it is somewhat early to give it such enormous powers as these at the expense of other bodies that have existed for a long time. There is another difficulty. These various pavements, which have been criticised so severely, represent successive strata that have been deposited by the dominant opinion of the day among the Local Authorities. At one time everybody believed in granite cubes, then they went on to believe in macadam, then there was a perfect millennium of asphalt, and now we have sunk down to prosaic wood. All these were successive stages in the progress of opinion. Do you imagine that the alteration of opinion is stayed for ever, and that we are henceforth to have nothing but wood? My belief really is that if you establish this uniformity and succeed in preventing the various bodies in London from trying in any part any new pavement, you would possibly find that you were bound permanently to some form of pavement which the common sense of the community would universally reject and change in favour of some new invention. I am afraid variety is inevitable in human affairs, and that perfect uniformity has not been attained by the most powerful and the most ingenious despots. With the highest respect for the powers of the London County Council, and believing that it is capable of aspiring to most ambitious tasks, I yet doubt that such a blessing would proceed from it if unlimited power was committed to its hands. After all, in these Vestries, which are spoken of so slightly, the only defect I know of is that every member of them must have an annual rating of £40, otherwise they are absolutely open, and they are elected by the ratepayers of the parish. If the ratepayers of the parish are not fit to elect these men, and if everybody who is rated above £40 a year must be considered as absolutely corrupt and incapable, I am afraid that the chance of obtaining good government in London by any alteration of machinery is small indeed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 13th February, 1891.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

NELSON'S PILLAR (DUBLIN) BILL.

(by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be read a second time."

(4.10.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): In moving that this Bill be read a second time upon this day six months I am afraid that I shall be obliged to occupy the attention of the House for a few minutes. It is brought before the House as a Private Bill, but it contains clauses of a very extraordinary character. It is promoted by three gentlemen who are tradesmen in one of the principal thoroughfares of Dublin, and they propose to interfere with and remove a monument which is almost of national interest. It is a monument to Lord Nelson which was erected by subscription to commemorate the valour of one of our most distinguished sailors. It has been erected in one of the best thoroughfares of the City. Every Irishman ought to take an interest in its preservation, and is entitled to intervene in any action that is calculated to injure it. I am aware that both the promoters of the Bill and those who oppose it belong to all political parties in Ireland; the discussion, therefore, will not partake of a party or political character. I am aware that among the promoters of the measure are some of the most eminent citizens in Dublin, but having regard to the nature of the proposals contained in the Bill I am obliged to ask the House to reject it. I am far from denying that there may not arise circumstances to justify a Bill of this kind, but in order to warrant the House in removing a monument like this I think it is necessary for the promoters to prove first that it is a serious obstruction to the traffic, next that its removal would be for the benefit of the traffic, and thirdly that the proposal to remove it has the general assent of the citizens of Dublin. I am prepared to show that the promoters are unable to establish any one of these three points. So far as the obstruction to the traffic is concerned, this pillar was erected to the memory of Nelson in Sackville Street at the junction of four streets—North and South Sackville Streets, Earl Street North, and Henry Street; and it stands on a site where Sackville Street is 119 feet wide with a carriage way of 39 feet on each side. No one acquainted with the traffic will for a moment contend that the accommodation afforded is not amply sufficient. There is no through heavy traffic to Upper Sackville Street, the principal heavy traffic being diverted naturally into other and more convenient channels. The terminus of the Dublin Tramways Company is on the south side, and on the north side the Dublin Corporation have established a fire-escape station. The promoters of the Bill declare that their object is to confer advantages upon the locality and the general public, but it is perfectly clear that if the pillar is to be removed the residents will be deprived of facilities which they have at hand for speedy locomotion. What has been the action of the Corporation of Dublin in regard to the traffic of this locality? Whatever the traffic at Nelson's Monument may be, that at the south end of the street is five or six times as large, and yet that particular site has been selected for the erection of a monument to Daniel O'Connell. I do not assert that the erection of the O'Connell Statue has involved an obstruction to the traffic. I admit that it is an ornament to the City, and that it is a great convenience to foot passengers who desire to cross at that point. But while I do not claim for Nelson's Pillar the artistic merit of the O'Connell Monument, I maintain that it affords to foot passengers a convenient and absolutely necessary protection. What is it that the promoters—certain buccaneering tradesmen from Upper Sackville Street—want to do? They say that they desire to secure a local public advantage, and therefore they propose to remove the pillar from South Sackville Street for the purpose of re-erecting it on the north side of Sackville Street, where the width of the roadway is only 109 feet, and where the obstruction to the traffic would be much more formidable. I think that nothing more foolish or more futile has ever been proposed in any Private Bill brought before this House. It would be just as reasonable to propose to relieve the traffic between Piccadilly Circus and Pall Mall by removing the Waterloo Memorial and placing it at the end of Regent Street. The Daily Express and the Irish Times oppose the Bill; the Freeman's Journal is in favour of it, while United Ireland, which admits that if the pillar interferes with the traffic it ought to be carted away, speaks of the whole matter with contemptuous indifference. So far as the Corporation of Dublin are concerned I confess that of recent years I have never felt any great personal respect for that body, but they happen to occupy the responsible position of Highway Authority within the City, and I may call the attention of the House to the fact that they have petitioned against the Bill, and decline to permit their funds to be applied for the purposes of the measure.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Where is their Petition?

MR. MACARTNEY: A Petition against the Bill has certainly been filed by the Corporation. With regard to the provisions of the Bill itself they are absolutely inadequate to carry out the intentions of the promoters, assuming that their intentions are of a bond fide character. They propose to transfer the funds, now in the hands of trustees, and which are substantially entrusted to them for the maintenance and embellishment of the pillar, to the promoters; but they do something further. They propose to hand over the pillar to the "undertakers" before any action is taken in regard to its re-erection. They say in a statement which they have circulated that provision was made for the removal of the column in 1882, and that no objection was made to the proposal. That is true, but the reason was that great public advantages were to be gained by carrying out the Act of 1882. This Bill differs entirely from the scheme projected in 1882, and I may remind the House that hitherto the Corporation of Dublin have not availed themselves of the provisions of that Act. It became a dead letter, and has now entirely lapsed. The funds proposed to be taken possession of are altogether inadequate to carry out the purposes of the present Bill. They only amount to £2,500, and the Bill contains no provision by which they can be supplemented, whereas in "The Moore Street Market and Dublin City Improvement Bill" there were specific clauses enabling the promoters to raise capital for the purposes of the Act. Among those purposes was the re-erection of the Nelson pillar. Another objection I have to the Bill is that it contains no clause rendering it imperative on the undertakers to re-erect the pillar at all. They may take it down, but it is not imperative upon them to re-erect it. Indeed, the Corporation have come to an unanimous decision that no site shall be granted for the purpose.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Gentleman is in error. What the Corporation determined was that it should be re-erected on a site which should not interfere with the traffic of the City.

MR. MACARTNEY: The report in the Freeman's Journal of a meeting held in December certainly fails to convey that impression. The resolution then arrived at, as far as I understand it, conveys the impression that the Corporation distinctly declined to give their consent to any site for the re-erection of the monument. A proposal was made that the Corporation should vote money for the re-erection of the pillar, but for once in their lives they refused to prostitute themselves for the purposes of any section of their body, and they declined to sanction the raising of money for an object they never intended to carry out. The purpose of this Bill is to enable three ordinary tradesmen of Dublin to take down a monument of a national character, which was erected by public subscription, and has existed for 80 years without the slightest inconvenience to the traffic of the City. I beg to move the rejection of the Bill.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to second the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Macartney.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(3.30.) MR. SEXTON: As a humble member of the Corporation of Dublin, I regret extremely that that body does not enjoy the respect of the hon. Member opposite, but the members of that Corporation, as long as they command, as they do at present, the confidence of the majority of the citizens, will be content, however painful it will be to them, to dispense with the respect of the hon. Member. Now, if there is any public memorial in Dublin which can be supposed to be obnoxious to the people of that City, I should imagine it is the statue of William III. on College Green, and yet the funds of the City have been devoted to the restoration of that statue.

MR. MACARTNEY: I did not make any suggestion that the Corporation are actuated by political bias. On the contrary, I admitted that the question is altogether free from political or party motives.

MR. SEXTON: Then I am at a loss to understand on what ground the hon. Gentleman withholds his respect from the Corporation of Dublin. I imagined it was because he thought they were animated by political feeling. It is somewhat singular that a Bill which is promoted by the bourgeois of the City of Dublin, in order to remove an obstruction, should find in its most active opponents two Members who represent the North of Ireland—South Antrim and South Belfast. Those who desire to remove the obstruction are those whose this pillar every day, while those who oppose the removal are gentlemen who are seldom in Dublin at all. Let me remind the House that nine years ago a Bill was passed by Parliament which included in its provisions the removal of the Nelson Monument.

MR. MACARTNEY: It was a Bill of a totally different character from the present.

MR. SEXTON: But it included this purpose among others. This Bill consists of one purpose alone—a purpose which Parliament assented to nine years ago, and which the Crown was satisfied with on the condition that the monument should be erected on some other site.

MR. MACARTNEY: I have no desire to interrupt the hon. Member, but I think he fails to appreciate my argument. I said that circumstances might arise to justify the removal of the pillar, but that they have not arisen yet, and the Bill of 1882 included other objects of such great value that the House consented to pass it.

MR. SEXTON: But the other proposals were distinct proposals not connected with the pillar.

MR. MACARTNEY: As a matter of fact Nelson's Pillar was to be removed because it interfered with the new street which it was proposed to make.

MR. SEXTON: That Bill contained in one of its provisions the whole proposal of the present measure. The Crown gave its assent, and the hon. Member—one of the pillars of the Constitution—now describes the proposals that were then passed as audacious and improper. He speaks of "buccaneering traders." Let me read the names of some of them. In the first place, there are the London and North Western Railway Company. Where is the First Commissioner of Works, who, I believe, is a Director of that company?

MR. MACARTNEY: What I referred to was the three undertakers whose names appear in the Bill.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Member has used the words "buccaneering traders." I would ask if the First Commissioner accepts that description of the Company of which he is a Director?

Mr. Sexton

Then come the Midland Great Western Railway Company, Pickford and Company, Wallis and Company, Arthur Guinness, Son, and Company—a firm of which two Members, Lord Ardilaun and Lord Iveagh, have been raised to the peerage—the Thomas Street Distillery Company, Darcy and Company, Findlater and Company—if these are to be looked upon as "buccaneering traders," what is to become of the solidarity of the Unionist Party? The Henry Street Warehouse Company, J. G. Mooney and Company, and Eason and Sons, successors to W. H. Smith and Son, all of them regarded by the hon. Member as "buccaneering traders." The hon. Gentleman has made references to the O'Connell Monument, which are altogether misleading. It stands at the head of O'Connell Street.

MR. JOHNSTON: The Bill calls it "Sackville Street."

MR. SEXTON: I am not concerned in the terminology of the Bill, and I prefer to call it O'Connell Street. What I say is that the statue of O'Connell at the foot of the street does not interfere with the traffic from Amiens Street Station and from the Quays, but only with the traffic up and down the street. The fact is that Nelson's Pillar stands at a point where it interferes with the heavy traffic of Dublin. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is probably acquainted with Dublin and with O'Connell Street [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR shook his head]. Oh! the right hon. Gentleman is not? Then let me inform him that the ordinary straightforward way of the traffic is interfered with by this pillar. What with a tramway station on the one side and a tramway and a fire-escape station on the other it is a work of considerable difficulty to conduct the traffic, and I am certain that no such obstruction would be allowed to remain in the City of London for a day. The writer of a History of Dublin, speaking on this pillar, says—

"The design of this triumphal column was given by Wm. Wilkins, architect, Fellow of Caius College, Cambridge. It is of most ponderous proportions, which is not relieved by the least decoration. Its vast unsightly pedestal is nothing better than a quarry of cut stone, and the clumsy shaft is divested of either base, or what can properly be called a capital. Yet, with all this baldness and deformity, it might have had a good effect when viewed at a distance or placed anywhere else ; but it not only obtrudes its blemishes on every passenger, but actually spoils and blocks up our finest street, and literally darkens the two other streets opposite to it, which, though spacious enough, look like lanes. There were objections to this site at first, but they are now become still stronger, since the building of the new post-office close to it, for by contrast it is a great measure destroys the effect of one of the largest and finest porticoes in Europe."

A point has been attempted to be made that there is no security that the Pillar will be re-erected. Well, there is a guarantee in the Bill that it will be re-erected under the superintendence of the Board of Works within two years after its taking down. The hon. Gentleman has fallen into an error with regard to the position of the Corporation. No doubt the Corporation of Dublin have petitioned against the Bill, but only for the purpose of obtaining a locus standi. They have determined that there is an obstruction which ought to be removed. I humbly submit that the House would stultify itself if it were now to go back upon its former decision. At any rate, a Committee upstairs ought to be allowed to inquire into the merits of the Bill and ascertain whether in its present position this pillar is an obstruction or not. It can certainly be erected upon some other site quite as favourable to the memory of Lord Nelson.

(3.40.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): The argument of the hon. Member who has just sat down is that the fact of the House consenting to the removal of Nelson's Pillar nine years ago affords an excellent reason why the House should consent to its removal now. But no Petitions have been presented to the House in favour of the removal, while there have been four presented against it. The hon. Member says that the Corporation of Dublin are in favour of it, but in their Petition they strongly object to the powers proposed to be conferred upon the promoters. A great deal has been said about the obstruction of the traffic in Sackville Street, but from my own personal observations of the traffic in that thoroughfare, there is no increase to justify the allegation of obstruction. If No. 43, Upper Sackville Street were removed, a much greater obstruction would be got rid of than the monument. Not only have the Corporation petitioned against the Bill, but the Tramways Company are also opposed to the removal of the pillar. I think the House would do well to wait until the public opinion of Dublin and the rest of Ireland has been more fully expressed on the subject.

*(3.45.) MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green): The House cannot have failed to perceive the curious circumstance that the opposition to the proposal to improve the City of Dublin comes from a little knot of Northern Representatives. It is not a new thing to me to notice that a certain number of persons in the North of Ireland, whose spokesmen are in this House, lose no opportunity of supporting everything that would tend to disfigure the City of Dublin, and of opposing everything that would beautify and improve it. No doubt it is a miserable and narrow-minded feeling, but I have seen it manifested over and over again. The simple object of the Bill is to remove an obstruction from the middle of Sackville Street, and re-erect it at one end of the street. At present the pillar intersects four thoroughfares, and prevents free communication from Earl Street to Henry Street. The O'Connell Monument is a large and handsome erection, but if placed where Nelson's Pillar is, it would undoubtedly be an obstruction. The Bill proposes to move the pillar further down the street, where it will be no obstruction, and provision is contained in the measure for the re erection of the monument within one month after it has been taken down. This will improve the City of Dublin, and it would be a hard thing if the House of Commons, in such a local matter, should interfere with the carrying out of a reform which has been long desired in the ancient capital of Ireland. It would be a curious thing if this Imperial Assembly took that course at the request of certain gentlemen representing Northern constituencies, who seem to have ingrained in them a wretched feeling against every attempt to improve Dublin, and in favour of everything that could involve its disfigurement.

*(3.55.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I, at all events, cannot lie under the imputation of being a Northern Member, and I cannot be accused of a desire to do anything to disfigure the City of Dublin, in which I live. I should not have taken part in the Debate if it had not been represented that the opposition to the Bill proceeds entirely from the North of Ireland. I wish the House to understand that the opposition to the Bill proceeds from the citizens of the City of Dublin, there having been four Petitions lodged against the measure, the signatories of which are impartial in the matter, as they have no personal interest in the suggested change. Among them are the Provost, Vice Provost, and several of the Fellows of Trinity College, together with merchants and numerous residents in Dublin. It is said that the House passed a Bill some years ago authorising, amongst other things, the removal of Nelson's Pillar. It is a totally different thing to remove such a pillar as part of a general scheme of improvement and simply to move it a few yards up the same street. Sackville Street is one of the widest streets in any of the principal cities of the Empire; on one side of the pillar there is 41ft., and on the other 37ft. It has been said that an obstruction like this would not be tolerated in any street in London, but I would ask hon. Gentlemen to walk down the Strand and observe the hideous monstrosity which marks the site of Temple Bar, and to remember that the Strand is scarcely wider than the space which now exists on each side of Nelson's pillar. I wish I could say that the traffic in Sackville Street is such as to render the pillar an obstruction, but that is not the case. I consider that the column looks better where it now stands than it would elsewhere, that there is absolutely no good to be gained by moving it, and I therefore oppose the Second Reading of the Bill.

(4.0.) MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I must say that this is the first occasion on which a Member of Her Majesty's Government has risen to oppose the Second Reading of a Private Bill.

*MR. MADDEN: I do not oppose it as a Member of the Government, but simply as a citizen of Dublin.

MR. MURPHY: I do not question the right of the right hon. Gentleman to exercise his privilege in the same way as any other Member, but it is the first time within my experience that a Member of the Government has got up to oppose a Private Bill. The feeling in Dublin is that the opposition to the Bill is actuated by Party and political motives, and that is the reason why certain newspapers in that City are opposed to it. As a shareholder in the Tramway Company it is counter to my interest that the pillar should be removed, but I support the removal. I think it would be expedient and would facilitate the exception of the pillar from all the Members with whom the Bill represents the opinion of the north of Ireland. I will not take the unprecedented course of moving the Bill on the Second Reading.

(4.5.) ADMIRAL FIELD (Dublin): I do not often come upon the House in an opposition, but this is a question on which I am entitled to say a few words. I think that the Debate should not be confined to Ireland, and the opposition should not be confined to Ulster. Unless be shown for the removal of the pillar the House has no right to oppose it. There is no guarantee, the removal of the pillar will be injured or mutilated, and the sentiment is not altogether sound.

AN IRISH MEMBER: What about the Wellington Statue?

ADMIRAL FIELD: The case of the Wellington Statue is an argument against the Bill, for when it was pulled down it was not re-erected in any other part of London. I may add that it was removed in direct opposition to the views of military men. There are not many monuments of our immortal naval heroes in existence, and I hope that those which we do possess may be long preserved. If more space is asked for in Sackville Street, let the Corporation pull down the four corner shops.

ADMIRAL FIELD: As long as Nelson's Pillar remains it is a sermon in stone, and it appeals to the sentiments and impulses of the most impulsive race on earth.

10.) MR. T. A. DICKSON (Dublin, Stephen's Green): I would make an amendment to the House to allow the Bill to be read a second time. I would not, for I vote for the removal of the pillar only for the purpose of re-erecting it a few yards higher up, but I believe that it could be removed altogether from Sackville Street and re-erected somewhere where it will be an ornament to the city. The Attorney General has sided to the opposition of the Provost and Fellows of Trinity College, but some of the most eminent citizens of Dublin are of the other view. Lord Ardilaun was the first who hinted to me the possibility of removing the pillar, and I went with him to the Secretary to the Admiralty to see the right hon. Gentleman upon the subject. The difficulty is not the narrowness of the street but the traffic which comes from the Quays.

11.) GENERAL FRASER (Lambeth, Surrey): I would say one word for my native land and its beauty. The hon. Member for West Belfast made his strong point that certain firms complain of obstruction to traffic. He went into the high-roads and bye-ways to prove this, but the fact is that the firms of Messrs. Eason and of Messrs. Eason are not in Sackville Street; and Messrs. Guinness's distillery is on the other side of the river and their trade is chiefly conducted by water. I trust that the House will not agree to the removal of a splendid monument to a splendid sailor.

12.) SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast): It ought to be pointed out that there is only a less space of two feet in the roadway by Nelson's Pillar than at the O'Connell monument in the same place, which it is not sought to remove. The removal and re-erection would probably cost £7,000 or £8,000, and I understand that only about £2,500 are available for the purpose. I would suggest that every purpose would be answered by moving the wide flight of steps on one side of the pillar, and thus increasing the width of the roadway. If this is done precisely the same room will be left on each side as there is now at the O'Connell statue.

13.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford): Although I am in favour of the Bill I sincerely hope that the House will reject it, for if an argument in favour of Home Rule is wanted it would be found in the refusal of the House to allow this matter to be inquired into by one of its own Committees. Monuments in public streets are a public nuisance, and I should be prepared to support a Bill not only for the removal of this monument but also for those to O'Connell, Father Matthews and Sir John Gray. If it is desired to commemorate the memory of the great dead the statues ought to be placed somewhere where they will not be in the way of the living. If you appoint a Committee it will doubtless be entirely composed of English Members, and surely there can be no harm in allowing your own delegates to investigate the matter. Reject the Bill if you will; and in doing so you will have my blessing.

* (4.16.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): My place of business is within a few hundred yards of Nelson's Pillar, and I have, therefore, constant opportunities for judging of the obstruction which it causes to the traffic. It is true that Sackville Street is wide, but at this point it is intersected by Earl Street and Henry Street, both of which are narrow. The result is that the foot passengers and the traffic have to go round the monument in a most inconvenient manner. Nobody ought to demand the removal of the pillar more than the Representatives of the North of Ireland, because it stands right in the way of the traffic from Amiens Street Station to the Law Courts. I am almost inclined to concur in the remark of the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) that it would perhaps be better if the Bill were thrown out, because it would at once show the people of Ireland that even in such a purely domestic question as this the wishes of the citizens of Dublin are not to be consulted. As a hero, I have no objection to a statue to Nelson, but it might be different if we were to judge of him from a moral point of view. The strongest comment which could be made in favour of Home Rule might, I think, be drawn from the fact that we have now been engaged for an hour and a-half in discussing the small question—whether a monument shall be removed from one part of Dublin to another. More time has been devoted to the consideration of such a paltry question than is sometimes devoted to a question upon which the happiness and fortunes of millions of our fellow-subjects depend.

(4.20.) The House divided:—Ayes 149; Noes 135.—(Div. List, No. 58.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

QUESTIONS.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS—CASE OF SERGEANT MASON.

MR. ASHER (Elgin, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the case that Sergeant John Mason, of Peterhead, formerly attached to the third Volunteer Battalion Gordon Highlanders (a Volunteer of 22 years' standing) was in 1886 dismissed from the Service in consequence of certain charges made against him by his Commanding Officer; whether it is the case that these charges were not communicated to Sergeant Mason before his dismissal, and he had no opportunity of defending himself against them. Whether an application by Sergeant Mason to the War Office to order an inquiry, with a view to affording him an opportunity of proving his innocence of the alleged charges, was refused; and, whether his dismissal, in such circumstances, and the refusal of all inquiry, are in accordance with Military law?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lancashire, Horncastle): Sergeant Mason was dismissed from the Volunteers under orders from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Boroughs, then Secretary of State for War, for having brought frivolous, vexatious, and false reports against his commanding officer. This was the direct result of Sergeant Mason's own communication to the War Office. The present First Lord of the Treasury, when Secretary of State for War subsequently allowed the case to be re-opened, and it was then re-examined. Sergeant Mason, whose statement was then received, brought forward no circumstance which had not been already fully considered. His dismissal was in accordance with Military law, and I must altogether decline to re-open the case.

LEAVING CERTIFICATES.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dumfries): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that a widespread desire exists in Scotland to have examination for leaving certificates thrown open to all schools; and whether having regard to the opinion expressed by the Scotch Education Department that they have no power to extend the scheme as proposed, he will, if necessary, take steps this Session to obtain for the Department the required Authority?
THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I am aware that a very considerable desire exists for opening of the Leaving Certificate examination to all schools. But because of the limitation of the powers of the Department opinions differ on the subject, and there is room for doubt as to the expediency of such extension; and meanwhile, it is felt that there are reasons for delaying any decisive action in the matter until there may be an opportunity of dealing fully with the subject, in connection with any scheme for assisting Higher Education which we may be able to lay before the House.

NEW SCOTLAND YARD.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it has been arranged that the new street leading from Parliament Street to the Thames Embankment shall be opened for carriage traffic; and, if not, whether he will consider any representation which may be made to him with effect?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): In the opinion of the Commissioner of Police it is essential for police purposes that the road by the police office shall be maintained as a private way, and I am not able to consider any representation having for its object the opening of the roadway for carriage traffic.

MUSKETRY INSTRUCTION.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many battalions of Regular Infantry, out of the total number ber in the United Kingdom, practised volley firing with ball cartridge last year ; and how many battalions of Militia, out of the total number, were put through a complete course of musketry ?

MR. E. STANHOPE : Seventy battalions of Regular Infantry out of 72 in the United Kingdom practised volley firing with ball cartridge last year ; and 127 Militia battalions out of 135 were put through a complete course of musketry.

BURIALS AT PLUMSTEAD.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the proposed Orders as to burials in the churchyard at St. Nicholas, Plumstead, are now in operation ; and, if not, what is the cause of the delay ?

MR. MATTHEWS : The Order of the Secretary of State under 15 and 16 Vic., c. 85, is now ready, and will be issued at once. The alteration of the Order in Council of 1859 is awaiting the next meeting of the Privy Council for confirmation. The delay since the Report of the Inspector, upon which I acted, and which was made in November last, has arisen from various applications from the Churchwardens, the Vicar, the Plumstead Board of Works, and others, which had to be taken into consideration before the Orders could be finally settled.

RATING OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.

COLONEL HUGHES : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will grant a Return of the gross and net values of Government property in the County of London upon which the contribution in lieu of rates is based, showing each parish separately ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square) : Yes ; a Return shall be prepared of the net values of Government property in London in the form the hon. Member desires, but our information does not extend to the gross values.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

MR. BOORD (Greenwich) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that Greenwich

Hospital was, under an Act of 1869, let temporarily at a nominal rent of £100 a year and repairs ; and whether he will consider if the temporary arrangement should now be replaced by letting the property at a fair rent, so that more pensioners could receive their pensions ?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing) : Under the powers conferred by the Greenwich Hospital Act of 1869 the Board, by Minute dated August 5, 1873, decided that the buildings of Greenwich Hospital should be used for the purposes of the Royal Naval College without payment of rent, all repairs to the buildings being executed at the expense of naval funds. In 1877 it was decided that an annual acknowledgment of £100 should be paid from naval funds. By this arrangement Greenwich Hospital funds were relieved of the expenses attending the repair and maintenance of the empty buildings, which amounted to about £3,650 per annum. Since 1869 wards have been available in the naval hospitals at the ports rent free for invalided pensioners maintained at the expense of Greenwich Hospital.

THE BUNBEG PROSECUTION.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the report of the prosecution at Bunbeg, County Donegal, on 13th January, of District Inspector Hill, and Sergeants Reynolds and Clarke, and other constables and emergency men, on a charge of riot and assault, on the occasion of the evictions on the Olphert Estate on 15th November last, in which the Magistrates, Messrs. Hamilton, R.M., and Beresford, R.M., held that Sergeants Reynolds and Clarke, and three constables, and three bailiffs, had been proved to have thrown stones continuously at the house from which Mr. M'Ginley was being evicted, but that the stone-throwing was, under the circumstances, justifiable ; and whether he still adheres to the following statement, made by his authority, in a letter to an anonymous correspondent, directed from 4, Carlton Gardens, dated 25th November, and published in the Morning Post of 4th December, with reference to this occurrence :—

" Mr. Holliday makes certain serious allegations against the police. As reported by you they are somewhat vague ; but if he intended to state that the police threw stones at the people, or acted as emergency men, or went beyond their duty in protecting those who were carrying out the evictions, Mr. Balfour desires me to say that Mr. Holliday is stating what is not the fact."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know nothing of the letter, but will make inquiries.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Where is Wyndham?

THE MANCHESTER REGIMENT AT TIPPERARY.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the colonel commanding the 1st Manchester Regiment, stationed in Tipperary, issued orders to the men of the regiment that they were not to partake of any refreshment in the house of John A. Carew, grocer and spirit merchant of that town; that on the 4th inst. two soldiers, having entered the premises of Mr. Carew, they were placed under arrest, stripped of their belts, and put under charge of the picket, but subsequently released because of their ignorance of the Regimental Order; whether any charge of misconduct has ever been brought against Mr. Carew in the management of his house; and what is the reason for Mr. Carew's house being forbidden by the Military Authorities?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The officer commanding the 1st Battalion Manchester Regiment did forbid his men to enter the house of J. A. Carew; but it is not the fact that two men were arrested on the 4th inst. for disobeying the Order.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the questions in the third and fourth paragraphs. Is he aware that during the past two years men have in Tipperary been sent to prison nearly every week for what is known as boycotting there?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am not aware of that fact. As to the questions contained in the third and fourth paragraphs, if the hon. Member will give me time I will try and get the information asked for. All I know at present is that the colonel decided, after full consideration with the Local Authorities, to take this step; but I do not know the reason.

COMPLAINT AGAINST THE IRISH POLICE.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Royal Irish Constabulary have been visiting the house of a widow woman, Mrs. Gara, of Lisalin, County Roscommon, night after night, and alarming the family, for the avowed purpose of looking for her son, a boy 13 years, and that the police threatened to arrest a younger child only 10 years of age; and whether he will inquire into the circumstances of this case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary authorities report that warrants having been placed in their hands, they proceeded to arrest Patrick Gara. They made three efforts to effect his arrest, but on each occasion Gara absconded. The reason they made arrests at night was because they believed those were the times they sought to apprehend would abscond. The police deny that they threatened to arrest a younger child.

MR. O'KELLY: What is the age of the boy arrested?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The officer will not answer that question.

MR. O'KELLY: He is 13.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the hon. Gentleman call the attention of the Executive to the fact that when the Crimes Act was passed the Attorney General (now Justice Hollick) promised that these inquiries should be conducted after 6?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If a person evades arrest of course he or she should be taken into custody whenever opportunity offers.

MR. O'KELLY: Was the arrest merely for the purposes of a first inquiry? Why was the boy arrested?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The boy was taken because he would not accompany the police without being arrested.

THE DE FREYNE ESTATE.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mrs. Murphy, of Cloontowart, a tenant of the De Freyne Estate, was arrested necessary for the police to use all the powers vested in them.

MR. SEXTON: Are we to interpret the right hon. Gentleman's declaration in the sense that the right hon. Gentleman will see that the women are summoned, and not arrested at unseasonable hours?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is perfectly clear that the expedient of arresting women at any time, especially at 3 o'clock in the morning, ought not to be resorted to except in cases of necessity. I am undoubtedly at one with the hon. Gentleman on that point.

MR. O'KELLY: Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to see that summonses are issued and the arrests made at proper hours of the day?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. HAYDEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Edward Egan, an old man 70 years of age, of Carreenturpane, was arrested under an Inquiry Court warrant at midnight, and brought into Castlereagh; that, after Mr. Egan returned, the priest had to be sent for to anoint him; and that he is now in a dying state, owing to the shock and the exposure of the night to which he was subjected; and whether the practice of making arrests at night has been sanctioned by the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary authorities report that Edward Egan was arrested at 3.15 a.m. It is the case that the priest was sent for, and anointed Egan. But the man has not been attended by any doctor, and is not, as a matter of fact, in a dying state.

MR. HAYDEN: Were not these proceedings taken at the instance of the brother-in-law of Lord Zetland?

THE IRISH RELIEF FUND.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, as the Lord Lieutenant's Relief Fund is declared to be an effort of private benevolence, its distribution is to be intrusted to Resident Magistrates, policemen, and Poor Law official or other Government servants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Distress Fund is, as the hon. Gentleman observes, the outcome of private benevolence; but Lord Zetland and myself, to whom the money has been intrusted, certainly do not consider ourselves as on that account precluded from availing ourselves, availing ourselves largely, of the voluntary services of officials in organising carrying out its distribution. Of course other volunteer assistance will also be extensively employed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will other benevolent persons be able to secure the operation of the Constabulary, the Army and Navy in the distribution of relief?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. and learned Member is in possession of any funds which he desires to contribute in relieving distress I shall be happy to give the hon. and learned Member every assistance.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has missed my point. I ask how private individuals can secure co-operation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: And I have endeavoured to point out a method.

PRIVATE SCHOOL REGISTERS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, in making Returns of school attendance, such as in filling up Schedule 33 (a) 1890, School Boards have power by law to examine the school registers of private schools within their jurisdiction?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Returns in the Schedule referred to are called for under Section 31 of the Education Act of 1872; and that section specifies, as the primary means whereby the information necessary to make the Returns should be obtained, that School Boards should call upon managers to supply it. Whether in case of a failure to obtain the information by such means School Boards may fall back upon the powers under Section 30 of the Act is a question which must be decided according to the circumstances in each case, and I am not prepared to lay down any general rule as to the manner in which such powers may be exercised.

ENNISKILLEN BARRACKS.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Commander of the Forces in Ireland Lord Wolseley, has, since his late departure, reported in reference to the military barracks at Enniskillen and on the future disposition of troops and headquarters at station; and, if so, will he lay a copy of it upon the Table of the House?

 E. STANHOPE: Lord Wolseley reported, but I am not prepared to lay the Report on the Table of the House. The whole matter is still under consideration.

JORDAN: Will the right hon. Member state the nature of the Report?

E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; I would not.

JORDAN: Is it possible we shall hear about it?

E. STANHOPE: Anything which Lord Wolseley may recommend is subject for consideration at headquarters in London.

BACCARAT.

MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the playing of "baccarat" at "Tranby Court," Doncaster; and whether he intends to take steps to punish the offenders?

MATTHEWS: I have no information on this subject beyond newspaper paragraphs. I am advised that it is not an offence against the Gaming Act to play baccarat in a private house.

THAMES CONSERVANCY.

LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Works whether he intends to move the Committee to inquire into the Conservancy of the Thames, in view of the discussion last Session?

PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF WORKS (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, St. Pancras, W.): Proposals having been laid before Parliament dealing with the water supply of London, it is not now convenient to take the step suggested by the hon. Member.

COUNTY COUNCILS AND THEIR BILLS.

LAWSON: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the difficulties likely to arise in the case of the Bill introduced by the Lancashire County Council and in other cases, he proposes to give any general power of promoting Bills in Parliament to County Councils, or to those now possessed by municipalities; if not, whether he intends to take any steps to have such Bills pronounced ultra vires?

OL. COOL. [THIRD SERIES.]

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have no intention to take any action with regard to the matter referred to in the question.

JUDICIAL REFORMS IN EGYPT.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state what is the present position of the suggestions for reform made by Mr. Justice Scott in his Report on the Native Tribunals and Judicial Administration of Egypt, and what prospect there is that these or some similar reforms will be carried out by the Government of the Khedive; and whether it is intended to present to Parliament any Papers relating to the subject?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Khedive, who has recently returned to Cairo from the Upper Nile, has not yet given his decision, but there is every ground for hoping that the proposed reforms will be carried out. When the arrangements are complete Papers will be laid before Parliament.

THE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with regard to the fact that the First-Class clerks of the Savings Bank Department recently forwarded a Memorial to the Controller, requesting that they might be paid pro rata for compulsory extra duty, and were informed, in reply, that they would henceforth be relieved from compulsory extra duty, how many members of the Second Division of clerks, who are now compelled to perform extra duty, are paid less than pro rata on their salaries; and whether the same relief which has been granted to the First-Class will also be extended to them?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In answer to the hon. Member, I have to state that the Memorial dated January 30, to which he refers, is now before me, but that as yet no reply has been given to it. The answer which I gave to the hon. Member in this House on the 27th of January still holds good. The hon. Member will, of course, understand that fluctuations in business necessarily affect the attendance, and this would account for any slight variation.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): Is it not a fact there is compulsory overtime all the year round?

*MR. RAIKES: There is extra duty at all times, but it does not fall on every one in the Department.

THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

SIR JOHN PULESTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state the amount to be added to the Wages Vote in the Navy Estimates covering the addition to wages understood to have been agreed to?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I should prefer to make no general statement before the schedule of revised rates of pay is published in the dockyards.

IMPRISONED FOR STEALING MILK.

MR. JACOBY (Derbyshire, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has had his attention drawn to the case of a farm labourer named Kelsey, who was sentenced to three weeks' imprisonment at Belper Petty Sessions for stealing three pennyworth of milk; whether he is aware that Kelsey stated that he took the milk because he had two little boys very ill, and that he had been out of work for some time; and whether he will consider the circumstances of the case, and remit the sentence?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have inquired into this case, and am informed by the Justices that this man had been convicted of larceny 10 weeks previously, and sentenced to pay a fine, and the Justices refused to impose a fine on a second conviction for a similar charge of stealing from the master in whose employ he was. The depositions do not contain the statement made in the second paragraph. I see no reason to interfere with the discretion of the Justices in dealing with the case.

NATIONAL GALLERY.

Copy ordered—

"Of the Annual Report of the Director of the National Gallery to the Treasury for the year 1890."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 96.]

Motion made, and Question proposed—"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

*(5.3.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I do not think I need apologise to the House for bringing forward a matter such as that contained in the Resolution affecting, as it does, the question of labour, because I believe there is a strong public opinion that these questions are in many respects more important than those raised often in this House, and which give rise to heated Party controversy. In moving this Resolution I have no idea of reflecting on any Department of the Government, and I freely acknowledge what has been already done by some of our public Departments in this direction. Neither do I desire to make this a matter of Party controversy, for I think the recent Debate on the question of hours of labour on railways showed the desire of Members on both sides to give the best attention possible to the labour question. I am not proposing any revolutionary or radical measure. I am proposing to fix the hours of labour and the rates of wages. All that I ask is that the State, as a capitalist and employer, shall set a good example. The principle that property has its duties as well as rights has been applied in the past exclusively to the relations between landlord and tenant; it should apply equally to the relations between employers and employed, because the employer has just as much moral responsibility with regard to labour as the landlord has with regard to the tenant who occupies his land. I think we shall all agree with one of the paragraphs in the Report of the House of Lords Committee—a not very revolutionary body—in which they say that the capitalist ought to pay closer attention to the conditions under which the labourer is employed. If that is the case with respect to employers generally, the principle should apply with tenfold force in the case of the State. Where the State employs labour directly, it ought to do so without the intervention of any sub-contractor, and it ought to pay to those it employs wages which are recognised generally as fair in the trade and the country. Where it lets its work out to contract, one of the conditions should be that the workman should receive without abatement the wages recognised in that particular trade, and should not work longer hours than those generally prevailing in the trade. Sub-contracting also, except under special circumstances, ought to be prohibited; and when Government work is indoors, if let out to contract, it ought to be done in factories and workshops, and not in the homes of the labourers, because we believe that the home work is very much at the bottom of the sweating system, and ought to be discouraged by the Government. All these things are feasible, and could be carried out without further legislation. These are matters which each Department has in its own hands. I do not propose to-night to discuss the question of home work. We shall, probably, have an opportunity of doing that on the Home Secretary's Factories Bill. Nor do I propose to discuss the question of the State acting as a direct employer of labour. I wish rather to confine my remarks to the point of view of Government contracts. My Resolution practically includes all Government contracts, whatever the class of labour. But I will confine my attention specially to building contracts under the War Office and the Office of Works. In regard to the question of Government contracts generally, I ask the House to affirm two principles. In the first place, that the contractor should observe the recognised customs of the trade with regard to hours of labour and wages; and, secondly, that sub-letting of contracts should, as a general rule, be prohibited. With regard to the questions of wages, it may be asked, Why is this demand made? It is because we believe the present system of contracting to be injurious to the best interests of the community at large. The Government is far the greatest letter-out of contracts in the country, and Government contracts are the most popular for three reasons. In the first place, the contractor makes no bad debts; secondly, he has quick returns; and, thirdly, a Government contract forms a good advertisement. The consequence is, that there is great competition, and tenders are cut down very much at the expense of the labour market. Such a state of things is unfair to the good employer, hard on the good workman, and injurious to the community. The fair employer is placed at a very great disadvantage as compared with the unfair. Of two men competing for a job, one fully intends to pay a fair rate of wages, his competitor has no such intention; and the latter, to use a somewhat sinister phrase current in the building trade, "throwing back the largest amount of blood money," obtains the contract, and then proceeds to squeeze his profits out of the pockets of the workmen. The result is that the good employer either gives up tendering for contracts; or, if it is necessary for him to continue tendering, he is seduced into imitating the example of his bad competitor—to follow that broad road which leads to the destruction of the workmen. If this state of things is injurious to the employers, it is still more injurious to the working classes. I do not desire to blame the contractors, who are largely victims of circumstances; but the contractor, having taken a contract at a very low price, in which no question of wages is specified, is not able to pay a fair rate to the labourers. The result is he is not able to obtain the services of the most skilled workmen, and has to put up with an inferior class of labour. As every one knows, especially in the building trade, the most skilful workmen are members of Trade Unions, the essence of which is that a man will not undersell his fellow-workmen, nor work at other than a fair wage.

Therefore, broadly speaking, Trades Union men cannot be employed on Government contracts. Not only is there thus a tendency to substitute unskilled for skilled labour, but in order to obtain sufficient inferior labour the contractor is often, on large jobs, obliged to import workmen from other parts of the country. I need not dwell on the evils of the overcrowding thereby created. Further, a case was proved before the Committee on Foreign Immigration, where a Government contractor advertised in a newspaper circulating in this country, but printed in a foreign tongue, for foreign labour to carry out his contract. That, of course, tended to bring into this country a large amount of that foreign pauper labour which many of us regard as a very great social curse, labour which not only helps to reduce the rate of wages, but it lowers the standard of living among our working classes. So much for the effect on employer and workmen. What is the effect on the community at large? The substitution of inferior for more skilled workmanship is not only a national loss, but in these days of extreme international competition it is a national danger also. We are told that the English are a logical people, but surely there could be nothing more illogical than, on the one hand, to lavish money on technical education in order to raise the standard of skill among our working classes; and, on the other hand, by means of the large amount of money paid to Government contractors to put a premium on inferior labour? As to the question of cost the present system may be cheap, but I think it is nasty. Many of our public buildings cost large sums for constant repairs, for never ending still beginning repairs, which might have been saved if they had been properly built at first. If, instead of the present system, we were to introduce one under which the contractor should be compelled to pay the wages recognised as fair in the particular trade, the contractors themselves would probably hail it with satisfaction. Profit would no longer be in antagonism to wages. It would take away the inducement to cut down contracts at the expense of wages, and would enable the contractor who pays fair wages to compete on better terms with the unfair employers. We should also get better work. Being able to offer good wages the contractor would desire, and be able to get, good workmen. It is a well-known axiom that, while inferior materials go with inferior work, superior work and superior materials also go together. No employer would think of putting a good workman on inferior materials, and therefore we should have a guarantee that the work done for the State will be more thorough than at present. It may be said that the present system would be somewhat more costly than at present. No doubt the initial cost would be greater, but I do not think the ultimate cost would be greater, and, even if it were, the benefit to the State would be so great that the nation as a whole would gain. But I deny that the ultimate cost would be greater than at present. It would be capital judiciously laid out, and we should have a more solid and substantial result. I do not know in what way the Government propose to meet my Motion. The official reply in the past has been that it is not incumbent on the State to look anything but the outside of the platter, the solvency of the contractor. Again it is argued that the essence of a contract is that, so long as the proper material and so on is provided, the contractor ought to be allowed to carry out his work in the way he thinks best. Further, the First Commissioner of Works on one occasion, in reply to a deputation, said, "We must not interfere with the full play of the labour market. It will not do for the State in any way to fix the rate of wages." Now, in regard to the moral aspect of the question; the President of the Board of Trade so fully expressed his views on this feature of the question in the recent Debate on railway servants that it requires no further elaboration. He informed the Directors, both in writing and in this House, that unless they treated their men in a way that did not shake the moral conscience of the House, he, as representing the Board of Trade, would have to interfere. As regards the question of wages; the State, as a great employer, cannot fail to have a very considerable influence on the rate of wages throughout the country. Shall this influence be for good or evil? It is not proposed or in any way desired that the Government should fix the rate of wages. All that is asked is that Government shall accept as fair wages those which are fixed in the particular case by negotiations between employers and workmen. There is no mystery about these rates of wages. Everyone connected with the trade knows and recognises them. They are accepted on the one hand as fair by the representatives of the men, and on the other paid without demur by all fair employers. I am a strong advocate of Trades Unions among working men, but I do not desire to raise that question now. The rates of wages to which I allude are those accepted as fair by the workmen, but not necessarily the full amount desired by a Trade Union. I do not by my Resolution desire to draw any distinction between union and non-union men. But I think that under our present system the Government put the Trades Unions at a great disadvantage because it is almost impossible for a Trades Unionist to accept work under a Government contract. That disability I should like to see removed, and all I ask for the Trades Unionist is a fair field and no favour. I do not ask the Government to pledge themselves one way or other in regard to Trades Unions. I hope I have given the House some arguments in favour of my Motion. I am glad to think I can emphasise argument by experience, for I can give several practical instances which will convince the House and the Government that we ought to go a good deal further than we have gone in the past. By some of our great representative Municipal Bodies the system proposed in my Resolution has been already adopted. It is practically carried out in one Department of the War Office, and the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works proposes to adopt it in the case of certain contracts in his office. The London County Council and the London School Board have had the system at work for two years past, and with very great success. There are many hon. gentlemen opposite who are not over-mourning of their creation—the London County Council. Unlike Pygmalion they have not fallen in love with the work of their own hands; indeed, instead of trying to infuse life into it they have done their best to paralyse and petrify it. But whether everyone agrees with the politics of that representative body, I think there is a general feeling that the administrative part of the work of the Council has been fairly well done. With regard to the London School Board, many of us may feel it was high time, with some of their schools falling about their ears, that the Board undertook a new system of contract. In olden days they adopted the principles of political economy, and bought in the cheapest market. Now they have given up that system, and insist that fair wages shall be paid to the men they employ, and they find they get better value for their money. In the case of every contract, whether great or small, which the London School Board enter into they require the contractor to sign the following declaration:—

"I hereby declare that I pay to the workmen employed by me not less than the minimum standard of wages in each branch of the trade." The London County Council require contractors to affix their signatures to the statement that—

"We hereby declare that we pay such rates of wages and observe such hours of labour as are generally accepted as fair in our trade."

This system has worked extremely well in the case of both of these great representative bodies. No proposal has been made to modify it in any way; but, on the contrary, proposals are constantly made to extend it. It has been found that, so far from harassing the contractors, as some hon. Members might think, the system has not been objected to by a single contractor. The list of contractors in both cases has been enlarged, and no difficulty has been experienced in conforming to the conditions laid down. It may be assumed that a contractor making a declaration such as I have read would desire to abide by the terms of his contract. It would not pay a man to break his contract, and thus risk being no longer allowed to tender. The probable loss would be much greater than any possible gain, and, in addition to that, the authorities have found that they have a sort of watch-dogs in the workmen and different Trades Unions interested, for they are ever ready to bring any cause of complaint before the Council or Board, as the case may be. With regard to the War Office, hon. Members will remember that the representatives of the War Office acknowledged before the Lords' Committee on Sweating that under the old system of Government contracting, a system of sweating had not only grown up, but had actually been encouraged and protected. The Director of Contractors, very greatly to his credit, determined to put an end to such an iniquitous system, and, as far as can be judged, the result of his action has tended greatly to diminish sweating under Government contract. In the Tailoring Department, before a contract is signed, inquiries are made of the contractor as to the rate of wages he proposes to pay, and unless it is found that the wages are no longer starvation wages, but liveable wages, the War Office decline to allow the contractor to undertake the work. In the Accoutrement Department the War Office goes still further, because they insist that every contractor before he can tender, or certainly before he can get a contract, must send in to the Department what is called a log of wages, and unless the Department are convinced that the log represents a fair and reasonable rate of wages in the trade, they decline to entertain the tender. That is not all. The Department of Works has gone a great deal further, further even in one respect than I propose we should go. The contract for the maintenance and repair of the House of Commons and other public buildings will come to an end very shortly. A Departmental Committee sat on the question, and they decided that instead of employing men directly, they will again let the work out to contract. I confess I regret they do not see their way to employ men directly. I, however, congratulate the First Commissioner of Works upon the very great step in advance which he now proposes to take. He has issued a new form of contract, which he expects those who tender for the maintenance and repair of our public buildings to sign. The right hon. Gentleman intimates to contractors that it is his intention that men employed on day work shall be competent workmen, and shall be paid wages at rates such as are generally accepted as current in the trade to competent workmen, and the contractor has to sign a declaration—

"That the rates of wages which I propose to pay to the men employed on day work under this contract are shown in the accompanying Schedule, and in my opinion represent the rates of wages generally accepted as current in each trade to competent workmen."

Furthermore, the right hon. Gentleman

not only expects the contractors to state what they consider the maximum and minimum wage prevalent in the trade, but he intends to provide that the Surveyor of the Office of Works shall fix within the limit of the maximum and minimum wage what the contractor shall pay. That is, indeed, Government fixing wage. So much as regards wages. In regard to the other point in the Resolution, I must ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes longer. I ask the House to affirm that a contractor in the case of Government work, shall be prohibited from sub-letting any portion of his contract. I hope the House will not misunderstand the proposal I make. I recognise to the full that you cannot entirely prohibit all sub-letting or sub-contracting. There are particular forms of work that an employer cannot himself do, and which he must in some way sub-let to others, and I have endeavoured to qualify the general principle against sub-letting by certain words which I have placed at the end of my Motion. I recognise to the full that in the case of probably of every contract the contractor uses certain material under the contract which he does not supply in the ordinary course of his trade, and requires certain descriptions of labour which is not within the competency of the labour which he generally employs, and, therefore, he is obliged to get that material and labour from others. But it is against the abuse, not the use, of the system of sub-letting I desire the House to guard. Even most legitimate sub-letting requires careful watching, and all that is not legitimate ought to be absolutely prohibited. Often a contractor, in order to save himself risk or trouble, lets out to some middleman certain portions of the work which, in the ordinary course of his business, he could do himself. This brings in an unnecessary middleman who has to make his profit, and he makes part of his profit either by scamping material or sweating labour—probably by both means. But there is a worse form of sub-letting, that in which material is so to speak, divorced from labour—the contractor supplies the material, and depends on the middleman to provide him with the labour. I maintain that in letting out a contract the Government ought to insist that the firm who undertakes the work should carry it through

Government will probably say they already have in all their contracts a clause against sub-letting. That is perfectly true; but there are two objections to that clause. In the first place, no penalty is attached to the breach of the clause; and, in the second place, the clause is practically inoperative, because, as far as I can learn, sub-letting in Government contracts is almost as a matter of course. I will not detain the House by giving instances of the very frequent and gross infringement of this sub-letting clause. I ask the Government to make the clause absolutely operative, because nothing could be worse or more useless than an inoperative clause. I ask the First Commissioner of Works and the War Office whether they cannot see their way to adopt some such wording as that which is always inserted in the contracts of the London County Council, and which I ask them to cover all the essential principles, while allowing all proper freedom. I thank the House for the patience with which they have listened to me. I hope the Government may find their way to accept my proposition. They tell me they have anticipated it and will be glad; at the same time, I do think I need apologise for having brought the question forward, though I apologise for the inefficient way in which I have presented the case. If the Government really propose to carry the principle further, it is very right that public attention should be called to the fact. The Government should not be allowed to hide their light under a bushel; but they should give, by public resolutions, that encouragement, that moral and material support to the workman which will be shown to our employers by our setting an example to other employers. I do not desire to withdraw the Motion, whether the Government accept it in principle or not, and for the reason that at the present time there is a great deal of public feeling and sympathy in reference to labour questions. Unfortunately, public opinion is somewhat fickle, and it turns to other matter. Red tape springs up and chokes the good seed which may have been sown, and the process goes on as before; but if the Government, by Resolution, declares itself in favour of the principle of this Motion, there will be a guarantee to the nation at large that, in the opinion of the House, the State as an employer ought to set the best possible example to all other employers in the country.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "Clauses be inserted in all Government contracts, requiring that the contractor shall, under penalty, observe the recognised customs and conditions as to rates of wages and working hours that prevail in each particular trade; and that the contractor should, under penalty, be prohibited from sub-letting any portion of his contract, except where the Department concerned specifically allows the sub-letting of such special portions of the work as would not be produced or carried out by the contractor in the ordinary course of his business,"—(Mr. Sydney Buxton.)—instead thereof.

*(5.50.) MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to second the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Poplar (Mr. S. Buxton). It was originally intended that the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) should second the Amendment, but, unfortunately, my hon. Friend is too unwell to be in his place. I, personally, am sorry that is the case, because my hon. Friend has given a great deal of attention to the subject which he has on more than one occasion brought under the notice of the House. I think it will now be generally admitted that where labour is underpaid or poorly paid it invariably leads to inferior workmanship. Most private employers of labour who care at all for the character of the work which is carried out by them are anxious to pay skilled and capable workmen as much as the price obtained for their produce will enable them to do. Experience shows that scamping and jerry-mandering in trade is usually the result of ill-paid or under-paid work; and if the Government are to secure skilled and capable workmen, it is highly important that they should be prepared to pay the rate of wage which is current. Why should the Government as a hirer of labour pay a less rate of wage for a similar class of work than is paid by private employers of labour in the same district? Let me mention a case which has recently come under my notice. The Mayor of Richmond recently received a requisition signed by 30 out of 32 members of the Council calling upon him to convene a town's meeting in order to protest against the wages that are paid to the labourers and the constables in the public gardens at Kew. I have no doubt the First Commissioner of Works has had his attention drawn to this question. Until the month of April last year the wages of labourers in Kew Gardens were 17s. per week, and of the constables 20s., the hours of labour for the former being 66 per week, and the hours during which the constables were on duty a little less. A question was asked in the House by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Kingston Division (Sir John Whittaker Ellis) in May last as to the wages paid to the labourers and constables in the other parks of London. The answer given by the First Commissioner of Works was that the wages in the London parks were from 21s. to 34s. per week, but at Kew they were from 18s. to 20s. per week, and the reason he gave for the difference was that it was in proportion to the difference in the wages obtaining in London and the suburbs respectively. I submit that the right hon. Gentleman must be rather incorrectly informed, because an extensive inquiry among the nurserymen and florists in the neighbourhood showed that the average wages paid by these private employers of labour was 21s. per week, as against 18s. paid by the Government. The low rate of wages paid by the Government has a most demoralising effect. The tendency is to bring down the wages of labourers in the neighbourhood; for when the attention of private employers is drawn to the fact that they are paying 2s. or 3s. more per week than the Government, they ask why they should pay more than the Government for the same class of work. I know I may be told that the Government workmen have constant employment, and that that should count in considering their wages; but whatever advantage it may be to a man to have constant employment it is an equal, if not a greater, advantage to the employer to have men who have been trained to the particular class of work which they are required to perform rather than to have to change his workmen every now and again. This, I submit, is one of the chief difficulties private employers of labour have to contend with. May I come to him who have had previous experience, and the employers are compelled, as it were, to train men, who, very probably as soon as they have been trained, move off to other employers. So that I say this is one of the chief difficulties with which a private employer has to contend; and whatever advantage it may be to the workman to be continually employed in one firm to maintain it is an equally great advantage to the employer to have such workmen rather than to be continually changing and taking on those who have had no previous knowledge of the duties they have to perform. Now, the question my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar has pointed out, has been taken up very seriously and energetically by many other bodies besides the London County Council and the London School Board, and I am very happy to say that all the information that reaches me with regard to the working of their scheme is of the most satisfactory character. On the other day I was told by my friend that the Chairman of the Committee of Works of the London School Board had declared that since the adoption of this principle the most satisfactory results had accrued to the Board. With respect to sub-letting, undoubtedly a subject of very great importance—I recently had my attention called to it by a letter from a correspondent at Woolwich. The Government had a contract to give out for the painting, I think, of Woolwich Barracks, and this contract was let to a gentleman who had previously done similar work at Portsmouth. At the latter place the rate of payment for painting was something like 5½d. or 6d. per hour, but when he commenced the work at Woolwich the rate of wages for painters was 2d. per hour. The contractor, however, immediately began to pay his workmen at Woolwich at the same rate he had been paying his workmen at Portsmouth, although that was 2d. or 2½d. below the ordinary rate of wages paid in Woolwich. What was the effect of this upon the minds of employers of labour in the town of Woolwich? Naturally, they said to themselves, "If the Government can have the work done for 2d. or 2½d. per hour below the rate at which we are con-to pay why should we not take steps in order to reduce the paid to our workmen to the of that paid by the contractor for a contract from Government?" A strong agitation was got up in town of Woolwich over this question, maintain that to allow this state of to go on is both detrimental to Government Department, inasmuch they get inferior work done, and owing to the workmen whose wages are "sweated" or kept down below the market rate. Some of the contractors get a portion of the work to their own men, who are induced to undertake such a low price that they cannot get the lowest rate of wages out of the market they do. It will be seen, I think, that this question of sub-letting is a matter of very grave and serious importance to the workmen, and I sincerely hope the Government will offer no strong objection to the Motion of my hon. Friend. I believe the First Commissioner of Works has already undertaken to make certain concessions. I was glad to hear him say, in answer to a question, that in future contracts there is to be no deduction from wages, especially as regards the cleaners about this House. I hope he will carry the principle some further. I am told—I hope it is true—that, previous to entering into contracts, a contractor is asked what he is prepared to give from the profit of the contract, and at the present time I am told the rebate is about 10 per cent. on the original price. Well, I told me that if a contractor is asked, for the sake of getting a contract from Government, to give a rebate of a fair estimate of something like 16 per cent., that he will only be able to give himself by deducting that from the cost of the materials he will put into the work or from the wages of the workmen who supply the labour under the contract. I sincerely hope that what I have said is not true, that the First Commissioner of Works will be able to deny such a request is made from the contractor as to the amount of rebate he is prepared to make from his profit price. I have to thank the hon. Friend for the courtesy with which these representations of mine have been listened to, and I sincerely hope the Government will see their way, if not to accept the Motion of my hon. Friend, to offer what may be a satisfactory compromise. I beg to second the Motion.

*(6.8.) MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): My hon. Friend the Member for Poplar was good enough a few days ago to place in my hand the Resolution before us to-day, asking me for my sympathy and support. I am pleased indeed to be able to say that, on reflection and after talking with many persons who understand this subject, I have great pleasure in giving him my sympathy to a large amount. But I am sorry I cannot gratify him by supporting his Motion in its integrity, for the reason that there are difficulties which my hon. Friend has not foreseen. I am pleased he eliminated from his speech, and a most interesting speech it was, all question of Unionism or non-Unionism, but I am not disposed to think that those whom he represents on this occasion, and who have looked forward to his speech, will be quite of that opinion. In relation to this subject my hon. Friend suggested that he should introduce me to a deputation. I assented with pleasure, and he did introduce me to a very intelligent and respectable deputation of tailors. The members of this deputation looked me up and down, examined my dress, and put the question to me, "Are you a sweater, sir," or did I approve of the system? I replied, "Certainly not," and, in reply to further questions as to insanitary workshops, I stated that four years ago I had the honour of speaking to the Home Secretary, and pressing upon him the importance of some salutary regulations which would have the effect of improving the wretched condition under which work was carried on. Then the next point was, "Of course, you agree with Unionism or having a Schedule of prices?" To this I rejoined, "I am very sorry indeed to differ from you on that point," and I looked round to see if my hon. Friend supported me there, but—

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend, but the House should know that the deputation to which I introduced him had no reference to the Resolution I have submitted to the House, but to a Factory Bill which is before the House, and to which I hope I may have his support when it comes on for discussion.

MR. NORRIS: I am quite sure my hon. Friend is not responsible for what the deputation said to me, but I am bound to say that though the remark was not addressed to the question now at issue they said they hoped that in all Bills or Resolutions the hon. Member brought forward I would always support him. Well, I was not prepared to fall in with their views, though we had an interesting conversation. The difficulty I find, and which prevents me from supporting the Motion is that my hon. Friend goes too far, and does not define the principle on which he advocates that penalties should be laid on contractors. He cut the ground very much from under his own feet when he complimented my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works for inserting in an invitation for contractors' tenders a Schedule of prices to be observed by the firm in payment of their men. I quite approve of that—that is not Unionism or non-Unionism, but a question of justice to the men. I think he also referred to the fact that the heads of the great Government Departments were very careful to express in the tenders that no form of unfair sub-letting would be submitted to. But I think it would be much better to go a step further and insert a clause that no intermediate agent, no middleman, shall be employed. I was struck with a remark of the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division (Mr. Fenwick) on that point. I am not aware, of course, if the contractor who was employed to carry out the painting he spoke of was an agent, or if he was really engaged in the trade; but, at any rate, what I am particularly struck with is this that many Government contracts get into the hands of men not brought up to the trade they assume. That is a great evil in these contracts. Competition is keen for Government contracts, and workmen of all others are ready to advocate that their employers should take these with a view to employment when other trade is slack. I think a step in the right direction would be to insist that in all Government contracts the Departments should invite and receive tenders from manufacturers only, and then that contracts should only be given to firms known to be of such position that they are capable of carrying out the contract with which they are entrusted. Contracts would then get into the hands of men of standing and position who would be above all those usages we all deplore and deplore. But my hon. Friend would, under penalty, require a contractor to observe the recognised customs and conditions that prevail in the trade, while he omits to tell us what penalties he would have inflicted, and who is to judge of observance or the non-observance of customs and conditions. Is this to be done by a committee of inquiry, is it to be the duty of the head of the Department? Who is to define the recognised customs and conditions? Is a definition to be arrived at by the head of the Department, by a system of unionism, or by some means of which we know nothing? There are great difficulties in the way. Then, as to piecework, I may say that I entirely differ from the conclusions of my hon. Friend, and this from my own knowledge derived from representation of a riverside constituency contiguous to his own. A system of sub-letting is often of great advantage to a poor community. In regard to sub-letting in building, for instance, and contracts for such work, only recently I was in conversation with a shipbuilder on the subject, and he tells me the difficulties of this. If a contractor takes an order for a large ship, he has to confer with the heads of each trade who will have to assist in the execution of the contract. He has to have to confer with the carpenters, the smiths, the shipwrights, anchor smiths, the platers for steel or iron plates, the chain makers, the riggers, the cabinet makers for cabin fittings, and others. There is not a man who can have knowledge of all these matters, and what is a contractor to do? He must make such arrangements with the men of the different trades as to prices as to enable him to undertake the work. It will be seen how difficult it will be for him to fix a price unless he is enabled to sub-let parts of the work. So also in regard to the supply of accoutrements, the same difficulty occurs. In saddles, for instance; it is possible for a contractor to undertake a large order without consideration or discussion with the men as to fixing a price. A manufacturer finds that it will be an advantage to him and to the workman when the latter represents that he has a large family at home growing up, and he would like to take some work home, where different members of the family under his superintendence occupy themselves in different parts of the work. What evil is there in letting parts of this wholesome

It is within my own knowledge during the Franco-German War, coats for haversacks came to this country, and these were sub-let to the classes. The work was well done and although, perhaps, the people did long hours, still they were getting money, while of other work there was none to be had, and there were no other of the work upon which women and children were occupied. The Secretary for War could tell us how much of leather work, fitting of straps, and so on, there is upon which boys and girls may be engaged. Would my friend, under regulations, prevent smaller portions of a contract from being let out in the way I describe? I do not think that some fault may be found with the Motion, that it is not framed with acquaintance with the facts. I well remember how Mr. Samuda warned the members of the Thames shipbuilding trade that it would be the result of their going on in standing out for higher wages.

Mr. Samuda's warning was unnecessary, and where now is what used to be the great shipbuilding trade on the Thames? The men have suffered much from the war and some of them have gone to the West Indies, where trade has gone. There is no doubt that although I am anxious to provide a remedy against anything in the nature of sub-letting, against anything in the nature of an impoverishing grinding of the workmen, and against the warning given to the contractors to-night may be useful, yet I cannot support the Resolution. I do not think it is not open to me to move for amendment, but I would suggest to my friend that if he finds it necessary to impose any conditions at all he should strike out his reference to penalty for sub-letting and add to his Resolution the words—that will be quite sufficient to ensure that only principal contractors be employed, and all that my hon. friend needs or requires will be gained.

"that if these conditions be not faithfully fulfilled such contractor shall not be allowed to contract for a period of three years."

(Mr. CREMER (Shoreditch, London): I sincerely hope that the hon. Member for Poplar will not accept the advice which has just been tendered him, but that he will adhere to the terms of the Resolution he has submitted to the House. To those of us who for several years have been "pegging away" on this subject it is a matter for congratulation that the question had been pushed almost to the edge of victory, before the hon. Member for Poplar at the eleventh hour brought forward his Motion, to which, however, I hope the Government will agree. None of us will grudge him his success, but it is only right that we should pay a tribute to the efforts of those who for six years have striven for this result. Tribute is also due to the Departmental Committee appointed by the Government. It fell to my lot upon several occasions to bring this same question in another form under the notice of the First Commissioner of Works, and we were met with the spirit of courtesy and fair play, which is characteristic of the right hon. Gentleman. I think some two years since, when after an important Division had taken place in the House, he promised an inquiry by a Departmental Committee, and that Committee has since had the subject under consideration. Personally I have to thank these gentlemen for the serious consideration they have given to this important subject and the practical admission of the justice of our views. Having said so much in recognition of the efforts of the men who have for the past six years interested themselves in the matter and to which I can bear testimony, and having tendered my thanks to the Committee for concessions made, I venture to express the hope that the Government will see their way to go still further and accept the Motion of the hon. Member for Poplar. Reference has been made to the evils of the contract system, and two or three years ago the scandals, as they were termed, of our Board Schools in London exemplified the evil. I do not know that I can adduce any better illustration in support of the Motion of the hon. Member for Poplar than by allusion to the scandals connected with the buildings erected for the School Board in the Metropolis. It is now some 12 or 14 years ago that I felt it my duty to bring this to the notice of members of the School Board of London. I pointed out the faulty nature of the materials used in building, and I told members of the Board that unless the Board stopped the system of scamping the work, before long the ratepayers would be called upon to rebuild the schools then being erected. We tried in vain to induce the School Board to insert in their contracts some such clause as that they have since, fortunately for themselves and the ratepayers of the Metropolis, seen that it is absolutely necessary should be inserted in such contracts—a clause similar in character to that the hon. Member for Poplar desires to see introduced into Government contracts. I venture to say that the absence of such a clause for School Board contracts has caused to the ratepayers of the Metropolis a loss of £200,000 or £300,000 in the last few years. On grounds of economy this Motion should therefore be adopted, for though a little more money may be expended in materials and good labour, in the end a great saving will be effected to the nation. Therefore, if from no higher considerations, the Motion should be accepted. I would, however, urge that the Government should go a little further in the direction indicated. I have frequently expressed the opinion that the contract system should, as far as possible, be done away with, and that the Government should engage and pay its own servants every farthing of the wages this House votes from time to time. I regret that this Departmental Committee has not seen its way to recommend that this contract system should be got rid of altogether. The necessity for making this further concession will be manifest when I cite an instance of how Government work has been done at Buckingham Palace, where two contractors are employed. Messrs. Mowlem, Burt, and Freeman is one, and they pay their workmen the fair price for their labour suggested by the Union, 9d. per hour. But there is another contractor employed—and for the life of me I cannot understand why two contractors are engaged—and this other firm, Messrs. Brass, instead of paying their carpenters and bricklayers 9d. per hour, paid 7d. and 7½d., and their labourers instead of 6d. from 4½d. to 4½d. an hour. So there you have two contractors, the one paying their men at full rate, the other at a rate from 1½d. to 2d. an hour less. This state of things the workmen brought to my notice, and asked me to do what I could by appealing to that sense of justice which the right hon. Gentleman opposite has ever evinced when attention has been called to such matters. This state of things obtains in other Government Offices, and it is to put an end to these anomalies and to give the workmen a fair rate of wages, so that the inequalities to which I have referred will no longer be allowed, that this Motion is made. The system which obtains at the British Museum, is, I believe, still more anomalous—the contractor in the bookbinding Department deducting from 3s. to 4s. a week from the wages of the boy workmen. The only objection I have ever heard to the adoption of such a Motion as this is, that employers will not be compelled to pay the rate of wages to bad as to good men. There is, however, unfortunately always a redundancy of labour in the market, and if the employer finds himself with inferior workmen, the rate is always at hand. He can discharge the inferior workmen and engage better workmen in their stead. I suppose it is known to many Members of this House that one of the conditions of a man joining a Trades Union is that he shall give a guarantee that he is a skilled workman. That is indispensable, so that an employer who engages a man through that guarantee has always a guarantee that the man is a good and efficient workman, and not likely to scamp his work. I have made myself clear—for I am labouring under a severe indisposition which makes it almost impossible for me to articulate. But I thought it right to publicly thank in the House the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Department of Works and the Departmental Committee for the generous support they have always given us when we have appealed to them to remedy grievances. I would appeal to them now in my own interest, as well as in ours, to go still farther, and accept the Motion of the hon. Member for Poplar.

*(6.35.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, University): I am sure every Member of this House will agree that the decision which has taken place this evening most interesting and useful. But it turned mainly on Government contracts and contractors in the abstract. I thank the hon. Member who has sat down for the very generous way in which he has spoken of the Department over which I have the honour to preside, and I have thought it as well to say a few words in the Debate at this point, in order that I may be able to clear up a great deal of misapprehension which prevails on this subject, judging from the remarks we have heard in regard to the conditions of Government contracts. I desire to explain what the view of Government is with regard to the question which has been brought forward by the hon. Member for Poplar, and what I have to say in that respect conduces to the shortening of the Debate. Before I deal with the Resolution moved by the hon. Member for Poplar, I like to comment a little upon the manner in which he introduced it. His speech, I must admit, was on the whole a fair and temperate one, but I think the House will agree with me that he sketched his subject in somewhat gloomy colours. He described vividly what he called bad contracting. He sketched the sweating system and the attendant train of evils for workmen who suffer under those bad contractors, and of foreign labourers brought in to affect the London labour market. A number of such circumstances he detailed, assuming that the kind of contracting he had sketched must necessarily be the case with Government contractors, he proceeded to complain that the workmen employed under such men must be so worse treated than those who are employed by private individuals. He said, to say, however, he declared, at the same time, that Government contractors were the most popular of all contractors, and when the hon. Member proceeded to particularise his charges he only cited two instances, namely, the contract for general works and repairs in the City of London, and three exceptional instances of bad contracting brought before the House of Commons Committee; and he admitted that in regard to the latter the evil has been remedied, while, as regards the former, the new contract which will shortly be introduced goes even further in the direction he desired than he could have hoped. So much, then, for the speech of the hon. Member who moved the Resolution. That speech we listened to with great interest, but like all other speeches in the House it will pass away. Not so the Resolution. If we adopt it it will remain in the Records of Parliament. If its object and effect were only to declare the opinion of the House that every care shall be taken in Government contracts that the workmen employed under them shall receive for a fair day's work a fair day's wage, and that everything shall be done to render impossible, as far as may be practicable, the recurrence in future of such lamentable instances — exceptional though they were — of sweating as were brought before the Committee of the House of Lords, then the Government would most heartily have accepted it. But whatever may have been the intention of the hon. Member when he framed his Resolution it goes much further than that. I think I shall be able to satisfy the House that if the Resolution were adopted in its terms the effect would be to lay down regulations which, as regards many of the Government contracts, would be wholly unnecessary, but which might, if applied to others, lead to great inconvenience — which might land the Government who adopted such contracts in a difficult and even dangerous position, and which would cause mischief to the great industries of the country. Perhaps the House will allow me to explain, very shortly, what has been done in regard to the triennial contract for maintenance and repairs in London, which has many times been the subject of discussion in this House. The hon. Member who has just sat down has said that we have made at all events a step in the right direction in the changes we propose in future contracts for repairs in London, but I think some of the observations that have been made on this subject would mislead the House were I not to explain exactly how the case really stands. The contracts under the Office of Works are of two kinds. There is first the particular contract I am now speaking of, which has to do with the works and repairs of the public buildings in the Metropolis. There are, besides, a great number of contracts entered into from time to time by the Office of Works for the erection of special buildings such as the Post Office and the new Admiralty Offices.

These contracts are wholly different in their character. For many years the principle on which the contract for works and repairs in the London district was framed was an invitation to contractors to tender on a schedule of prices. These prices were formerly filled in by the contractor, but in 1884 a new system was adopted, the prices were then filled in by the Office of Works. Whatever may have been the disadvantages of that system, it certainly had one great advantage—it was extremely economical. The work was done, and done fairly well, and very cheaply to the taxpayer. I would mention a few figures. The money paid on this account during the triennial period from 1884 to 1887 was about £130,000. After the change was made it fell to £100,000, and the present contract is being worked at an annual expenditure of about £90,000, a great reduction. I say, therefore, that as far as London goes the change, from the point of view of economy, was a success. But I cannot say that, so far as efficiency goes, it was so great a success, and there were frequent complaints as to the wages of the men. In consequence, the whole subject of the rate of wages under Government contracts was considered by a Departmental Committee, composed of Sir Charles Fremantle, Mr. Giffen, of the Board of Trade, Mr. Spring Rice, of the Treasury, and my own most able and excellent secretary at the Office of Works, Mr. Primrose. I think it will be agreed that a better Departmental Committee could not well have been appointed. They examined a great number of witnesses, including officers of the Office of Works, of the War Office, and of the Admiralty, a great and popular employer of labour, and, most important of all, a deputation from the Amalgamated Trades Society of London. I have had the advantage of seeing most of their evidence, and nothing could be more fair and practical than the way in which the case of the Deputation of the Amalgamated Trades Society was stated and argued. As the result of that inquiry, the Committee submitted a scheme, which has been sanctioned by the Government and when put into operation the effect of it will be that in future the contractor will submit a schedule of prices as a fair exemplification of the range of wages accepted as current in each particular trade. Whoever the contractor is who succeeds in getting a contract, the money for wages will be paid not to him, for his benefit, really only through him. The wages paid by the contractor will be reimbursed in full by the Government. There will be no more discount taken off by the contractor, and, therefore, in the future, no more temptation to make a job out of the work and the wages. In all such future contracts the Government will do their best to ascertain the rate of wages generally accepted as current in the various trades. Now, Sir, it has been said of the kind of contracts I have referred to, such, for instance, as the contract for the new Post Office—that the wages are so low that it is impossible for Union men to work under them. I need hardly say that the House I am not going to say a word against Trade Unions. I know well the great services they have rendered not only to their members but to the community at large. I will say, however, that whoever has a Trades Union man would not work under those Government contracts cannot know what he was talking about. I will venture to read to the House the answer that was made by one of our representatives—Mr. Turner—of the Amalgamated Trades, examined before the Departmental Committee. He described how private employers paid full wage and retained the services of Union workmen, and he was asked by Mr. Primrose whether there would be anything to prevent Union men working under the Government contractors for the new Post Office. He said there would not; and further speaking of Mr. Chapple, who is doing the remaining work on this Post Office for the Government, he added—

“I know full well by long experience they never think of employing any but private men. By having cheap labour they are at a loss at the finish, and therefore there is no credit given to the foreman.”

Now, this was one of the very contracts that we were told nothing would induce the Trade Union men to work under.

*MR. CREMER: May I ask what was that made that statement?

*MR. PLUNKET: It was Mr. Turner. I may go further and say that we know as a matter of fact, that in almost all these great contracts—I am not speaking of the triennial contracts—I is no dissatisfaction with the wages the contractors pay. And why should there be? The great contractors who know their own business will employ the best men, and these may or may not be Trade Union men. There may, of course, be exceptions to the rule, but there is no general dissatisfaction with the wages paid by the contractors who undertake the great Government contracts. As to sub-letting, we do not allow in these contracts any sub-letting, except with the written consent of the Office of Works; but, of course, that consent is given in certain cases in which the sub-letting is not of a vicious kind at all—that is to say, in which the transfer of the work from one man to another is not made in order that the middleman may make a profit, but in order that the contract may be properly carried out. Our rule is not to sanction any devolution of a contract of the evil kind to which reference has been made. It is done on the economical principle of the sub-division of labour. Then as to overtime, we do our best to discourage it in every way we can, but on this point the Resolution is of so broad a character that it would impose upon us a duty that really in certain cases it would be impossible for us to discharge. I will only say further that with regard to the future triennial contracts of the Office of Works the Resolution is unnecessary, and as regards the other contracts it is really beside the mark, and would often cause inconvenience and embarrassment. No doubt, if we had endless servants, and could squander as much money as we liked, we could carry it out, but under existing conditions everybody knows that business could not be done on the hard and fast lines laid down by the hon. Member. Could you apply the Resolution to one of the great Admiralty contracts? The thing is impossible. Imagine attempting to apply it to a contract for the construction of an ironclad! The first thing a contractor who undertakes to build an ironclad has to do is to employ a dozen or score of people to assist him in carrying out the contract. Yet that would undoubtedly be sub-contracting contrary to the strict language of the Resolution. I could point to many similar cases in that and other Departments of the State; but though I say this, I am not in the least arguing against the spirit or the main object of the Resolution. Sir, I will not dwell further upon this subject, but I will endeavour to state in a few words what it is the Government propose to do with regard to this Resolution. Of course I am well aware that cases of sweating have been proved in the evidence given before the Committee in the House of Lords on the sweating system, and the Government admit that in these instances the evil did require a remedy; but, at the same time, if this Resolution were carried as it now stands although in some sense it might tend to assist the object it has in view, it would on the other hand be absolutely obstructive to the carrying out of the great contracts undertaken by contracting firms for the Government to the great disadvantage of the Public Service. Again, with regard to what has been said about sub-letting it is not the use but the abuse of sub-letting, that is objected to, and if this were all that is covered by the Resolution of the hon. Member for Poplar I should not object to it. But this is not all, and, therefore, I shall propose, should the Motion of the hon. Member become a substantive Resolution to vary it in the following manner. I propose to strike out the whole of the hon. Member's Resolution after the word "that," and to substitute for them the following Resolution—

"That in the opinion of this House it is the duty of the Government in all Government contracts to make provision against the evils which have recently been disclosed before the House of Lords' Sweating Committee, and to insert such conditions as may prevent the abuses arising from sub-letting, and make every effort to secure the payment of the rate of wages generally accepted as current for a competent workman in his trade."

*(7.10.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I think my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar will agree with me that the Resolution suggested by the right hon. Gentleman is a great improvement on that which he has proposed—for this reason, that it not only commits the Government to take care that for the future none of the evils which have been found to prevail under the sweating system shall be allowed to continue; but it goes even beyond this and commits the Government in all the future works in which it may engage, to undertake that the wages generally are such as may be customary among the men engaged in the different trades. At the same time it puts the action to be taken with regard to the rate of wages in a more definite form than under the wording of my hon. Friend, and does not leave that question as one to be regulated by the Trades Unions. I think the hon. Member for Poplar would be well advised in accepting the Resolution offered by the Government, because I believe it would fulfil the object he has in view in a better way than the more restricted Resolution he has moved.

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: With the permission of the House I may be allowed to say a word or two in reply to the right hon. Gentleman. I am happy to say that I on my own part and my hon. Friend, who seconded the Resolution on his part gladly accept the words proposed on the part of Her Majesty's Government. We could have wished that the question of hours had not been excluded. But we are not only anxious that the House should come if possible to a unanimous conclusion on this important labour question, but we recognise the fact that the words suggested by the right hon. Gentleman would have almost as wide an operation as those of the Resolution which we have proposed. We therefore accept the terms of the Government proposal, and thank them for having met us in such a friendly and cordial spirit.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed,

After the word "That," to add the words "in the opinion of this House it is the duty of the Government in all Government contracts to make provision against the evils recently disclosed before the Sweating Committee, to insert such conditions as may prevent the abuse arising from sub-letting, and to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen."—(Mr. Plunket.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*(7.15.) MR. J. SPENCER BALFOUR (Burnley): As the representative of a large constituency which is deeply interested in a practical solution of the question now before the House, I shall give my cordial support to the Amendment which has just been suggested from the Treasury Bench, because I think it embodies a proposal that will meet the views not only of the working classes in general, but of those who represent them in this House. I think it would be a misfortune if this question were regarded simply as a Metropolitan question, or as one affecting only the Metropolis and the Dockyard towns. I doubt the question of Government contracts is one that more especially affects the working classes of London and the dockyard towns, but at the same time it is throughout the length and breadth of the country, and particularly in the cashire districts a strongly expressed feeling that some change should be made in the method of giving out the work required to be done under contract by the Government, which has been long adopted. As we seem on this occasion to be practically unanimous in regard to this question, I will not detain the House by answering the arguments of the hon. Member opposite, who referred to the difficulties which beset the original Resolution in reference to sub-letting. It should be remembered that there are many kinds of sub-letting, and the hon. Member for Poplar never proposed to do away with that form of sub-letting, which is inherent in all great contracts. It is obvious to anyone who understands the subject, that no great public building could be erected in any part of the country if the contractor were not allowed to sublet some portions of the work. There must be subsidiary contracts for painting, carpentering, and things of that kind; but, with reservation as to these, it must be insisted upon, as the main condition of the contract, that the chief portions of the work should be run on all fours with the principal conditions of the contract. With regard to the objection that has been made to the insertion of the words "under payment," contained in the Resolution, the hon. Member can hardly be aware that in a few contracts do not include a payment clause. But underlying all these technicalities, I venture to submit that the real object of the Resolution is to endeavour to urge on Her Majesty's Government that in all these matters they should take up a position which only the Government can assume, because it is the largest individual employer of labour in this country, and its relations with its operatives and its contractors.

and be such as should form a sort of relationship between itself and its employees—a relationship such as every master in the country would endeavour to emulate, and a relationship, moreover, which would constitute at a warning and a reproach to every master in the community. If such a relationship as this were once established, every operative in the Kingdom would be able to point to Her Majesty's Government and say of the Government's system of contracts, and the Government method of carrying out its work, "That is the standard set by the State—a standard by which all other masters in their relations with their workpeople will be judged, whether they attain or to fall below that standard."

20) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I desire to add one word to what has already said. Having come down to the House for the purpose of supporting the Resolution I am very glad to find that in the general opinion of the House the words proposed by the right Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works are regarded as an improvement on the Resolution which appears in the Paper. The words pledging the Government to "make every effort to secure the payment of the rate of wages generally accepted as current for a competent workman in his trade" are a distinct improvement on the words of the Member for Poplar. But I think the question of the hours of labour should also be included, and that it should be here set forth that the hours should, as a general rule, and subject to exceptional cases of emergency, be such as to be accepted by the trade. If this were done I think it would be satisfactory to all classes, and beyond this I think it would further tend to make the Resolution generally acceptable to the House.

LONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I would remind the House that in consequence of a Debate which took place in August, a careful inquiry was instituted by the Government into the wages paid to those who are in the Government employ. I suppose we shall soon know what has been the result of that inquiry; but I think we should to congratulate the Government if they not only deem it their duty to inquire into the question of wages and of the hours worked by their employees, but that they feel it necessary to go still further, and to institute some real control and supervision over the wages of those employed by their contractors. I am sure we must all be delighted to know that the Government are prepared to go to the extent they have announced. I accept the Government's Amendment, because I consider it a decided improvement on the original Resolution, and I trust it will be the means of providing a solution of this important question.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I only wish to express my thanks to the Government for the attitude they have taken in this matter, and to assure them of the satisfaction experienced in this part of the House at the fact that, in being enabled to pass this Resolution as amended by the Government, the House of Commons has washed its hands of all complicity with the sweating system. It has been generally supposed that for a long time there has been complicity of this kind hanging about the action of the Government, and the Resolution they have now proposed furnishes them with a sufficient defence against that suggestion, and marks a distinct progress in the cause of anti-sweating in this country. The time was when men bought their goods at the lowest price, without any other thought; but now there are many who never thought of it before who, when buying cheap articles, are led to consider whether the low price is legitimate, or has merely been obtained out of the misery of those employed in its manufacture. The encouragement of this sentiment will do more than anything else to put down sweating in this country. The Government, however, like all public bodies, are not amenable to sentiment; they can only be influenced in these matters by the representative opinions expressed in this House. I am glad the Government have recognised this position, and I accept their proposal not only as a pledge for their future action, but as an example to all other employers in this matter.

to express a hope that this arrangement which seems to be of such a happy character, will be extended to Government contracts in Ireland. I have reason to believe that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with regard to the Government printing in that country. At the same time, I am sure that the working-men of Ireland fully sympathise with the working-men of Great Britain in regard to this question. Those who represent labour in Ireland will, as far as possible, co-operate in all projects which have for their object the improvement of the condition of the working-men of Great Britain, as well as of those of their own country. The Amendment proposed by the First Commissioner of Works is eminently satisfactory, provided it will be thoroughly and honestly carried out. I sincerely hope the right hon. Gentleman will recognise the claims of Ireland for carrying out this Resolution.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the Government in all Government Contracts to make provision against the evils recently disclosed before the Sweating Committee, to insert such conditions as may prevent the abuse arising from sub-letting, and to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen.

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON (SUPER- ANNUATION BILL.—(No. 49).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [10th February],

"That Mr. Bartley be a Member of the Select Committee on the School Board for London (Superannuation) Bill."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*(7.28.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I am placed in a position of some difficulty with regard to this Bill, because my hon. Friend proposes to refer it to a Committee on which my name is suggested, and upon which, if the Committee be appointed, I shall have pleasure in serving; but seeing that my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford has obtained, on a Resolution of this House, a reference of the whole question respecting both London and the provinces, both School Board teachers and teachers in Voluntary Schools, Select Committee, I presume my hon. Friend (Sir Richard Temple) will consent to allow the Bill to lie over until that Select Committee is reported. I, therefore, trust that my hon. Friend will not press his Motion to-night, but will confer with the Government, with a view of carrying out, in its most effective manner, the Resolution already passed by the House. The question is one of great importance, affecting as it does not only the School Boards of London, but the whole of the School Boards throughout the country.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I shall be glad to listen to any suggestion from the Government as to the best manner in which the scheme proposed by the Bill can be carried out; but if the Motion is to be proceeded with now, as I think it may, I should like to obtain the sanction of the House to a proposal for appointing a Committee at once. The proposal is as to the School Board for London, is that the Superannuation should be provided entirely by the contributions of the teachers, without the possibility that at starting it may need some grant from the School Board. This proposal, which has been submitted upon us within the last few days, regards the superannuation of teachers throughout the country—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is travelling beyond the limits of the question.

COLONEL HUGHES: Perhaps I am going a little too far, but I merely want to point out that the Committee proposed by the hon. Baronet with regard to London is on the principle of guarantee by rates; whereas the principle of the other Committee, which is for the whole of England, is that of guarantee by taxes. I see, therefore, no reason why the two questions should be so amalgamated that—

(No. 35.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount CROSS): I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill, the object of which is to allow certain high Officers of State in India, when it is absolutely necessary on public grounds that they should do so, to come home to England for the purpose of consultation without incurring the penalty which at the present moment is cast upon them of losing their commissions or appointments if they leave India for the purpose of coming home. Your Lordships will remember at the time of the Jubilee, in 1887, it was suggested that the Duke of Connaught should come over from India for the purpose of being present at the Jubilee, and it was found necessary to introduce a short Act of Parliament to enable him to come, because by the provisions of the old Act, 53 Geo. III, which are now to be found in the Act 3 & 4 Will. IV., it is enacted that the return to Europe or the departure from India with the intent to return to Europe of any Governor-General of India, Governor or Member of Council or Commander-in-Chief, should be deemed in law a resignation or avoidance of his office or employment. In my opinion, it is perfectly right that that Act should have been passed at the time it was passed. Your Lordships know as well as I that a journey to India was in those days by no means as easy as it is at the present moment, when passengers from India had to return to England round the Cape, and their absence from their duties must have been necessarily prolonged. It was then necessary to point out to officials that if they meant to keep their appointments they must not leave the duties of their office for the purpose of coming home for their own pleasure in any way. But now the time for which they must be necessarily absent from their duties during their return to England is so greatly reduced that no inconvenience of that kind can take place. The Bill will only confer upon the India Office powers similar to those now enjoyed by the War Office, the Colonial Office, and the Admiralty, with reference to persons holding appointments under those Departments. I would remind your Lordships that there is no objection to the Governor of any of the Colonies, or any Commander-in-Chief of forces, either in Canada or elsewhere, returning home; and that the Foreign Office is entitled to call back its officers or Ministers of State for conference. In fact, that has been done by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. As Mr. Childers said in the other House when the Bill in reference to the Duke of Connaught was before it, he had called back the chief naval commander from the China station, and also the chief naval commander from the Pacific station, for the purpose of consultation with him. When the Bill which enabled the Duke of Connaught to come home was before the other House of Parliament, Mr. Childers, who then spoke upon the matter, said he saw no objection to his coming over, and that he would offer no opposition to the Bill provided Government would give a pledge to bring in a General Bill to accomplish his purpose in case of necessity. The Leader of the House gave that undertaking, and in pursuance of it, a Bill was brought in during last Session of Parliament, but could not be proceeded with further on account of the state of business. It is that identical Bill to which I am now asking your Lordships to give a Second Reading. I think your Lordships will see, upon looking at the provisions of the Bill, that there are ample safeguards to prevent abuse. In the first place it says that, "It shall be lawful for the Governor General of India in Council" to consent. It would, therefore, be necessary for the request to pass through the Council in India; and it could not come before the Council in India, unless at the request of the Secretary of State for India at home. Then the request can only be made on public grounds; if it is required on public grounds, any of the said officers specified in the Schedule may leave India for the purpose of proceeding to Europe. Therefore, I think your Lordships will see there is ample security against abuse; in the first place, the request rests upon the responsibility of the Secretary of State for India here; then it has to pass before the Council of the Governor General in India; and lastly, it can only be made on public grounds. For those reasons, I venture to ask your Lordships to give the Bill a Second Reading.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF) BILL [H.L.]—(No. 33.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, last year I ventured to lay before your Lordships' House a Bill to the same effect on this subject. A Commission sat for a long period inquiring into the wants of the deaf and dumb and of the blind. That Commission was presided over by a noble Lord who is now in the House (which he was not last year); and I am very glad that he is here, for I think the House will derive great advantage from any remarks he may make upon the Bill. The object of the Bill is to insure that these unfortunate children, whenever they are capable of being educated, should receive an education, like all other children in the country, and that the distance of the schools from their homes should no longer be made an excuse for their not being educated; because, of course, the best way of educating these poor children is not to send them to ordinary day schools, where they would be lost among hearing and seeing children, but to send them to existing institutions for that purpose, of which there are considerable numbers throughout the country. I believe the day schools set up by the School Board for London have not been found efficient for the purpose of educating children of this description, and therefore it is very desirable that power should be given to the School Authorities to contribute to such institutions, or, if necessary, by means of subscriptions, to combine together for the purpose of establishing such institutions specially devoted to the education of the blind or of the deaf and dumb. This measure provides that may be done. It is not, as people have supposed, a measure introduced with the view of interfering with existing institutions, but rather to firm them in their position where they receive grants from the State or from local rates. Of course, they would be subject to inspection and to the same liability to control by the Government as in the case of ordinary schools for other children under the present system of elementary education. I do not think I need go into more than the main points of the Bill. I believe it depends mainly on the points to which I have referred. On one point there may be some criticism from my noble Friend behind me, but I believe I shall find general support from your Lordships for this Bill, which is to enable School Boards and School Authorities to act in places where unhappy children exist, and also to enable a Parliamentary Grant to be given to schools where such afflicted little ones are educated, so that they may receive similar benefits and educational advantages to those enjoyed by their more fortunate companions who are seeing and hearing children. I will now present confine myself to merely moving the Second Reading of this Bill, leaving its details for further consideration.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I am not going at all to say anything in opposition to the Bill of the noble Lord, which I entirely approve of. I rise only to call his attention to a matter which is connected with the subject of the Bill, because it will be observed by the proviso at the end of Clause 1 that the duty of the School Authorities does not extend to children who are imbecile. The noble Viscount will recollect that last year a deputation waited upon me for the purpose of calling his attention to the case of idiots. For the parents of such children the circumstances are very hard in comparison with others, because the parents of children not thus afflicted are assisted largely at present by the State in the education of their children. Owing to the large amount of the E

Grants and to the cost thrown on the education of children who are afflicted is largely afforded at the expense of the public. But if a parent is unable to have the misfortune to have a child who is an idiot, the State is not absolved from taking any part in giving assistance as regards the education of that child. Very often it is not that the parent is by reason of misfortune of having an idiot child unable to provide for its education, as it is able to receive education, but that he would be as regards other children. Its education especially involves greater expense, and towards that expense no assistance is afforded by the State. No doubt the truth is that in a vast number of cases the burden is entirely taken up by a benevolent public who subscribe largely to institutions for this purpose. Experience, however, has shown that these institutions, aided as they are largely by public benevolence, are unable nevertheless to cope with the increasing number of children who could probably be received into them and be largely benefited thereby. It seems to me there is a good claim in this respect, in the first place because to give assistance to the parent of a child in regard to its education when the child is afflicted, and also because very often owing to the burden upon the parents of such children, and to the want of assistance from the State in educating them, they are unable to do anything for themselves in after years. Probably in a great number of cases the child cannot from their unfortunate condition be taught a handicraft, yet they can be instructed to some extent, and can do a great deal towards helping themselves, and can sometimes even support themselves without any burden upon the rest of the community. This being so, not only does it seem right and fair but it is in the interest of the State that some special provision should be taken in the case of these particularly afflicted children to do at least as much for their education, as far as possible, as is done in the case of children who are differently situated. The Viscount is not, of course, unacquainted with the object for which the Bill is introduced, to which I have referred, and upon him, and I trust that he will be able to say that the matter will be taken into consideration, and whether assistance might not be afforded in these very distressing cases.

LORD NORTON : My Lords, I fancy there can be no possible objection on the part of anybody to the principle of this Bill. I have some little misgiving as to one or two points of detail rather in the contrary direction to the remarks which have just fallen from the noble and learned Lord opposite, who seems to seek indiscriminate aid from the State in cases, no doubt, of a very distressing nature, but which may yet be cases of children whose parents are perfectly able to provide for them, and who, therefore, ought not to be relieved of the responsibility of providing for their own children, under any circumstances, however distressing, by having that responsibility thrown upon the public. I should fancy that the case of the idiots and imbeciles of whom the noble and learned Lord has just spoken is amply provided for by the institutions relating to that class of persons of all ages, from infants upwards. They are not educational objects. The general principle of this Bill, that is to say, the inclusion of deaf and blind children in the national system of education, is clearly right in principle. There is no reason in the world why blind and deaf children should be excluded from our national educational system; but they should be carefully kept within its purview. This class of children really require to have far more provision made for them than is necessary for ordinary children as recognised in the national system of education. The Bill provides for including them in all the general provisions of the Education Acts—for the establishment of a sufficiency of schools. Clause 11 stipulates that for the expenses of education only the ordinary weekly fee payable in a public elementary school shall be charged. This is an eleemosynary principle, payment for more costly education at ordinary charge, in consideration of painful circumstances, whatever the parents' condition. It may be of the greatest possible mischief to the country if capable parental responsibilities are undertaken by the State. It would not only strike at the spirit of independence of the people throughout the country, but would convert our whole system of national education into an eleemosynary provision. Besides that, we see already that it has become a system of training by which the interests of the poor are postponed to those of the tradesmen class, will get apprentices trained at the public expense. I am sure the people of this country are shutting their eyes to this great fault and to the wasteful expenditure it incurs. I do not suppose many of your Lordships were aware, until a Return was made last year for which I moved, what is the total expense to which this country goes for national education at the present moment. We often hear in speeches upon the subject that we are spending £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 a year, but I was certain when the statement was made of the whole expense borne by Treasury Grants and by rates, not only for what are called elementary schools, but for reformatory, industrial, and all the other schools which are similarly paid for, that the amount would be more like £10,000,000. But I venture to say that if that great amount is run up by undertaking responsibilities which should fall upon capable parents, the excess is doing harm instead of good, and I think we ought to stop such misapplication. I am anxious to promote education in the healthiest way. I would make the compulsory clauses attach to the rich as well as to the poor—to everybody whatever their rank; for every man who does not properly educate his child is bringing him up to be a nuisance to the State, and a rich man ought to be compelled even more than a poor one, having better means and more knowledge of his duty, to educate his child. But what does this Bill do? After providing for all the ordinary expenses which are provided for by the other Acts for the education of children ordinarily admissible in the elementary schools, there are the expenses of establishing new schools, of contributing to existing schools, of maintaining the children, and of boarding them out, it only makes the parent liable in the early clauses for whatever sum may have been agreed upon between the parents and the School Board. That I think in the first place is a dangerous thing. There ought to be some scale fixed or some system adopted with regard to the liability of parents in the Bill it should not be left as a matter of agreement. Some parents may have an influence with the School Board and may get better terms than others ought to get. But the point I speak of is upon the 11th clause which only makes a parent liable in the case of a blind or deaf child to pay the same fee as in the case of ordinary children in public elementary schools. The cost of the education of blind and deaf children is much larger than the cost of educating ordinary children. Should the fee be limited to the same amount which is payable for ordinary education in the case of parents who are capable of paying the actual cost? Why should they be allowed to receive this expensive education at the same rate as that at which the ordinary education is publicly paid for? I should like to hear from the noble Lord who presided over the Commission the reasons that induced the Commission to introduce into its Report that limitation of payment. Consider, my Lords, how very much greater the expense is in the case of blind and deaf children. It is a much more expensive education. And it is not only that, but you are going to establish district schools for these children, and those who live at a distance are to be carried to these schools and must be boarded at them. I hope the noble Lord will also be able to give your Lordships a little statistical information in regard to the number of these cases. It would be useful to know how many of the dependent blind and deaf children there are. The number of the cases is not large, I think. The Bill makes no discrimination. We ought to obtain some information from the Census as to the number of blind and deaf children in the country. We ought also to learn the number of schools which are already provided for them. I believe there are a large number of very good schools, in all parts of the country. I am conversant with the amount of such school accommodation in the Midlands, and I believe it is ample. We ought to know what the deficiency is, what is really wanted, before we can judge of the cost of the task which we have undertaken by this Bill. The Bill does not of Boards to make use of private institutions. Those points I desire to particularly to the attention of the noble Lord, but with the great principle of the Bill for including these unfortunate children under the operation of the Education Act I most heartily agree.

LORD EGERTON or TATTON: Perhaps your Lordships will allow me to say a few words respecting this Bill, as it alludes to a great extent the Report of the Royal Commission, upon which I have the honour to serve. I hope I may be allowed to thank the Government, though late, as I was unable to be present on account of illness during the Session last year—and all those who are interested in the education of this class of blind and deaf children will, I am sure, join with me—for the very apt manner in which the noble Lord represents the Education Department, and those who have also interested themselves in the question, have taken and embodied the principle desired to be carried out in the Bill. A Bill of the same description has been passed in Scotland, which in some respects appears to be an improvement on the Bill which is now before your Lordships, to which I should like to allude. My noble Friend's Bill was the first in the field, and for that I give him due credit. The noble Lord near me has alluded to the Report of the Royal Commission, but I am afraid the question he has asked me shows he has not studied the Report with that care which anyone who considers the question would properly think necessary. We are now on the eve of a Census, and I should be sorry to pledge myself as to the figures with regard to the number of blind and deaf children in the country at the present time until we have further knowledge from that source. My noble Friend near me also wished to know whether the Royal Commission recommended that parents should not pay more than they could be reasonably expected to pay, and more than they would have to pay for the education of ordinary children. The Royal Commission was of opinion unanimously that parents should not be taxed in any way because they happen to have the misfortune to have children suffering under these infirmities of blindness and deafness, but that the position and means of the parent should be taken into consideration—that the School Boards and the parents were the right persons to come together for the purpose of making an agreement in the matter. We thought it would be more advantageous that that course should be adopted, rather than that we should fix any specific or definite sum which the parents should pay. There is another point also which I should like to allude to: there does not appear in this English Bill any reference to the technical instruction which the Royal Commission recommended should be given in the case of both the blind and deaf.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: If my noble Friend will look at the interpretation clause he will see it is referred to.

LORD EGERTON or TATTON: It is not put so clearly as it is in the Scotch Bill. It includes industrial training, but it is not put forward so prominently as it is in the Scotch Bill; and I think it would be very desirable that the noble Viscount should, if possible, make that more clear. I think it will hardly be understood by those who read this Bill throughout the country that it is intended to assist these poor persons to acquire industrial handicrafts. For that purpose it is of great importance that their education should be continued up to the age of 16. The Royal Commission recommended that they should have eight years of schooling, beginning at the age of seven, which would bring the child up to 15 or 16, and that after the age of 13 technical instruction should be given in the schools in handicrafts. But the point upon which there appears to me to be a want of clearness in the Bill is with regard to compulsory powers between the ages of 14 and 16. If there was one point more than another upon which the Commissioners were entirely unanimous it was that there should be compulsory powers between 14 and 16, and especially with regard to the industrial training of the blind and deaf, which the Commission thought they should have between those ages. I trust that that point may be made more clear, and that the noble Viscount will kindly state the objections which the Department have to that recommendation of the Royal Commission. I have no doubt that under the Bill as it stands the children may be kept in the schools up to the age of 16, and that a sufficient education will be given to them; but I think that those interested in the education of the deaf and blind children would prefer to see compulsory powers put in the Bill rather than leave it to the parents, because the State, having determined that education shall be given to this class of children, ought to see that that education shall be sound and thorough, and one which will enable them to earn their living in after life rather than that they should be allowed to become, as in many cases happens now, a burden on the community. It was, therefore, the opinion of the Royal Commission that those compulsory powers should be given up to the age of 16. At the same time, if there was any question raised as to the year, I should not object to the age of 15, because then eight years would be left for the instruction of the children after the age of seven. That is of great importance. That was the opinion not only of the Royal Commission, but of the deputation from all the schools in the Kingdom which the noble Lord received the other day. They were unanimous on that point. I am glad to see that there has been an improvement made upon last year's Bill by giving greater powers to the School Authorities either to assist existing institutions or to found new ones where necessary. I am sure that would only be done where it was absolutely necessary. There is no intention by this Bill to interfere with existing institutions, which have done so much good through private benevolence in the country. I do not know that there is any other matter in explanation with which I need trouble the House.

*THE EARL OF POWIS: My Lords, I would ask my noble Friend why he objects to special assistance being given to private institutions. At the top of page 6 it is provided that the children are to be brought from their residences to the boarding houses, and by analogy the provision as to boarding out children from their homes might apply to children being boarded out by parish authorities. It must be recollected that with regard to blind and deaf and dumb children, moving them backwards and forwards is a troublesome and expensive thing; and I think it would be desirable that where possible they should be sent to school within reach of parents' residences or of the parish authorities who send them, I think it would be an advantage to private institutions if they were allowed to fill vacancies with these children. I presume the guardians will have an authority under this Bill for paying for maintenance in these public or private institutions. Private institutions might be allowed to receive them, being given a subvention, in order to prevent the necessity for the erection of numerous schools which would have to be supported, and would be an expensive mode of contribution by school authorities towards dealing with these cases.

*VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, I do not quite understand the objection of my noble Friend. There is a provision in the Bill by which the school authorities are allowed to board out a child in the neighbourhood of the school or institution to which it is sent. With regard to private institutions being made use of, of course any institution to which children are sent which receive grants from the State or rates must be open to inspection, and in that way be on a par with public elementary schools in the ordinary sense of the word. I think there is provision made for employing the School Board rate for the purpose of providing for these children. My noble Lord seems to forget that I have nothing to do with Guardians. The Bill has reference to pauper children, and the Guardians will deal with them. The Bill is to deal with children who are in the workhouse but at their parents' homes, and who would be sent out by the different ways provided by the Bill. Then as to what was said by the noble Lord, the Chairman of the Committee, I would call his attention to the fact that the industrial training is provided for as far as it is requisite in the Bill. Of course it will be necessary for the Education Department to lay down the terms upon which they will insist upon industrial training, and in that way his objection will be met. Then with regard to age. I think my noble Friend is under a misapprehension. It is quite true that ordinary children are sent to school from 5 to 14; but my noble Lord forgets that those children are exempted by passing certain standards.

then go out into the world and their parents. In this case there is compulsory power given up to the age of 16, but provision is made by the Bill which these boys and girls are to be bound to remain children up to the age of 16, that is to say for the purpose of being eligible to receive grants both from the State and from the rates. But it seems to me unreasonable that you should tie people down to a hard and fast rule at 16, for some of these children probably be capable of taking an active part in life before that period. I met, upon the very deputation to which my noble Friend referred, one of the most eminent members of it let out for a while for most eight years' teaching absolutely necessary, many children had gone out after only four or five years' training were found to be wonderfully fitted for taking a part in life.

VISCOUNT EGERTON or TATTON: Only those.

COUNT CRANBROOK: I do not know whether they were all tailors or not, but at any rate they could earn their living. My noble Friend says they are only tailors; he seems to think a tailor is only the ninth part of a man, and in those particular instances perhaps he thinks they had only received a small part of the education which should have been given them. But whether that is so or not you cannot tie the parents to say that in these cases the children shall be absolutely taken from them until the age of 16, whereas in others they can go at 14. I can say that they will have received at that time a thoroughly finished education, but that is not the duty of the State.

If it were the duty of the State to turn out, so to speak, a thoroughly finished article, then all children would have to be kept in school until they were perfectly fitted for their positions in life. We cannot do that. In this instance we give the parents a great advantage if these boys and girls can be taught as children up to the age of 16, so that they may receive a benefit from the State or from the locality in which they live. Then with regard to what fell from the noble and learned Lord opposite in reference to imbeciles and idiots, I can point to the work that has been done in the past. Under a Bill which I brought in myself in 1867, imbeciles placed in institutions are in a very different position from what they were when mixed up with the general workhouse population. Those places are extremely well-managed, and are doing a great deal of good in cases of adults so afflicted, by means not only of assistance from the rates, but of contributions spread over large areas. The deputation to which the noble and learned Lord referred was particularly anxious that the idiot and imbeciles should not come under the Educational Department. However, it is a subject which requires a great deal of thought. I quite agree with the noble and learned Lord, that there are a great number of children who would be benefited by getting into asylums where there are persons well qualified to train them; but it is almost impossible, without the greatest exertions, to get idiot children into those institutions. There is room for much more effort on the part of benevolent people in this direction, and perhaps also for contributions on the part of the State, to which I should myself offer no objection.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I must apologise for saying a few words after the reply of the noble Viscount, but there is one question I should like to suggest, that is, are there sufficient provisions made in the case of parents who are able to provide themselves for the education of their children? I ask the question for this reason: the matter is put in the hands either of the School Board or of the School Attendance Committee, and I do not know that either of those bodies have machinery at their disposal by which they can ascertain that the parents can pay, and if that be the case, compel them to pay. It cannot, I think, be the intention of the noble Viscount that the State should provide the expense where the parent can provide it himself, but I do not see anything in the Bill upon that point.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I thought the noble Lord who spoke upon the duty of the parent had been answered by my noble Friend who presided over the Royal Commission; but my answer is, that in the case of parents who can afford it, they are compellable to have their children efficiently educated. It is quite a mistake on the part of the noble Lord who spoke of the necessity of the rich being compelled to educate their children, because, under the present law, they are so compelled. If you are not giving an efficient education to your children, there is power in the authorities to compel you to send them to the public elementary school. Happily, in this country, people of that class do educate their children, and I am sure, for the sake of the separation of classes, which as my noble Friend knows is a feeling that exercises considerable influence in this country, those who can afford it will always take care that their children are not sent to the institutions which are open to everybody, but to places where they will have special care. My noble Friend (Lord Norton) seems to have entirely mistaken the effect of the 11th clause. That clause provides for an agreement between the school authority and the parent, not for the education alone, but for education and maintenance which, of course, goes much further. In the absence of an agreement between the school authority and the parent, there is power given to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to settle the matter, not to make the parents pay only the fee which is the ordinary charge for education, but to take into consideration the means of the parent, and also taking into consideration the expense of the child's training and maintenance, beyond the ordinary cost of the education of a child in a public elementary school for children who are not blind or deaf; so that if it is the case of a parent who is in the same position as people who are sending their children to elementary schools, the mere education will not cost him more, but the cost of maintenance will be in addition. It is not absolutely fixed what sum he shall pay, but a summary jurisdiction is provided to fix what he shall pay, considering his position in life, what his means are, and parents are ordinarily paying for their children in the neighbourhood. I think that meets the point which my noble Friend raised.

LORD NORTON: Will your Lordships allow me to say one word? I would point out that the compulsory clauses in the present Acts only extend to the age of 18, and that that is just the period at which some of the upper classes, most fatally it must be admitted, neglect the education of their children, whose education should extend to the age of 21.

Viscount Cranbrook

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2^d cordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (TRENCHARD) ACT, 1887 (ARREST OF MR. DILLON AND MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN).
MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had received the following letter relating to the arrest of Mr. Dillon and Mr. William O'Brien, Member of this House:—

"19, Bouverie Square, Folkestone, 13th February, 1891.
 Reg. v. Dillon and O'Brien.

Sir,—

I have the honour to inform you that, by virtue of Warrants of Commitment issued by Messrs. Irwin and Shannon, Resident Magistrates for the County Tipperary, in Ireland, and duly backed by me under the provisions of Act 14 and 15 Victoria, cap. 93, sect. 27 (3), I executed within the borough of Folkestone, John Dillon, M.P. for Mayo, E., and Mr. William O'Brien, M.P. for Cork County, N.E., yesterday arrested within this borough Chief Constable John Taylor, of this borough, and by him conveyed in custody to London.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

G. O. DE CASPIGNY,

Justice of the Peace for the Borough of Folkestone.

 House of Commons, Westminster, S.W."

QUESTIONS.

INDIAN MAGISTRATES—MR. FORDYCE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India is aware that Mr. Fordyce, in January, 1890, as Sub-Divisional Commissioner of Madhepur, in Bhagalore, committed one Barassur Kundu to trial at Sessions, causing him to be kept in custody for three months; that the Sessions Judge, Mr. Badcock, in acquitting the prisoner, commented on the Deputy Magistrate's "want of common sense in not discharging the accused"; whether he is aware that Mr. Fordyce, in May, 1890, sentenced a man to three months' imprisonment; that the appeal from this sentence was not heard till the original term of imprisonment had almost expired; and that the District Magistrate, Mr. Marindin, who heard the appeal, ordered the prisoner's release, censuring at the same time Mr. Fordyce's "disregard of instructions received from superior judicial authority," and commenting on his unfitness to be entrusted with judicial powers; and whether the Secretary of State will inquire if Mr. Fordyce is still in the Service, and still entrusted with judicial and magisterial powers?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has no official information on this subject, but he has reason to believe that Mr. Fordyce has no independent charge, but is under the immediate supervision of superior Magistrates.

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer this question: Is this Anglo-Indian Resident Magistrate still in the pay of the Government of India?

*SIR J. GORST: I cannot tell that.

MR. MAC NEILL: If the right hon. Gentleman is unable to say whether Mr. Fordyce, the Resident Magistrate, is still in the pay of the Indian Government, will he be able to answer the question within a specified time—say before the Indian Budget is discussed?

*SIR J. GORST: Oh yes, Sir; I can tell that. Mr. Fordyce is in the pay of the Government of India.

MR. MAC NEILL: And is it intended to continue him in the Service of the Indian Government?

*SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; that I cannot tell without knowing what the intentions of the Government may be.

MR. MAC NEILL: Then I will repeat the question to-morrow.

THE SALT INDUSTRY IN BURMA.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camboorne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he will lay upon the Table of this House particulars of the arrangements now being made in Burma in connection with the salt industry; whether the Excise rates on the local manufacture of salt have been raised to equalise them with the Customs Duty; and whether he can state the rate of the increase?

*SIR J. GORST: The particulars of the arrangements made are to be found in the Burma Annual Revenue Report, of which a copy shall be furnished to the hon. Member. The Excise rates on the local manufacture of salt have been raised to equalise them with the Customs Duty. The increase is from 3 annas to 1 rupee.

MR. CONYBEARE: Is that from 3 annas to 1 rupee per maund?

*SIR J. GORST: Yes.

BRITISH INDIAN SUBJECTS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask Under Secretary of State for India whether steps have been taken with respect to the notices served in July last on British subjects residing and trading in the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, directing them within 12 months to leave those States?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Perhaps I may be allowed to reply to the question. The question of the hon. Member refers apparently to the restrictions imposed by the laws of the Orange Free State and the South African Republic upon persons belonging to coloured races, whether British subjects or not. No information has been received as to any order that such persons are to leave either of those States; the Orange Free State Law forbids trading without a special licence, which only nine have been issued, and it was decided to withdraw these licences after a year's notice. No action was taken by Her Majesty's Government in regard to the Orange Free State, as they have no locus standi under Treaty in that State, which would justify further opposition.

SHEIKH ABDUL RASOUL.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask Under Secretary of State for India whether it is a fact that a Mohammedan Sheikh Abdul Rasoul, was apprehended on his arrival in Bombay, on 2 January, 1890, by the Police Commissioner of Bombay; whether Sheikh Abdul Rasoul was imprisoned without trial, and without any statement being made to him as to the reason of his imprisonment, in the Fort of Assirgaon, the Central Provinces, for nine months, and, at the expiration of that period, taken to Bombay, put on board a steamer bound for London against his strong protest, passage paid, and he landed in England without any means of support; whether when he was put on board the steamer bound for England, he was told, on the authority of the Government of India, that the India Office was in possession of the facts of his case, and were to arrange for him a sufficient allowance er the Secretary of State will why this man was imprisoned for months, and kept in custody all the without a trial; whether, under Penal Code, the Government have to imprison parties without trial to keep them in prison; and why Abdul Rasoul was shipped to India; what charges the Government have against him; and why communications which he addressed to the Secretary of State for India are not acknowledged or answered?

J. GORST: The Secretary of State has no information officially on the subject stated in the question. The Governor General of India is empowered by Regulation 3 of 1818 to detain persons without trial for reasons of State. Communications addressed by the Governor to the Secretary of State have been forwarded to India, and the Secretary of State will await a reply from the Government of India before taking any action thereon.

CONYBEARE: Upon that subject I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is a rule that when communications concerning complaints of personal hardship received by the India Office to which no answer is given? I am informed that this unfortunate Mohamud has several times communicated with the right hon. Gentleman and the India Office, but has not been vouchsafed an answer. Is it not desirable to inform persons making a complaint that their case will be made into the case? Is it the custom of the Viceroy or any of the authorities in India to detain men, and allow them to remain for months—in this case it was nine months—without bringing any charges against them?

J. GORST: That is not at all the case in India. With regard to the member's question as to the letters, it would have been better if they had been answered.

CONYBEARE: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that an answer shall be returned to this Medanan gentleman, and will he undertake to give a Return of all the cases who have been dealt with in a similar manner in India during the last few months?

SIR J. GORST: I must have notice of that question.

GLASGOW CATTLE MARKET.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate for Scotland whether he can give the name of the person in charge of the weighbridge in the Cattle Market, Glasgow; and whether he can state if it is part of that official's duty to be in attendance at the weighbridge during the holding of the market?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The name of the lessee of this weighbridge is Robert Buchanan, who employs responsible persons to attend to it. The market regulation is that a man is to be in attendance at the bridge when required, and this, I am informed, is always observed on market days. If by any chance the attendant may for a time be absent he can be obtained at once by applying at the house of the lessee, which is situated at a distance of about 12 or 14 yards from the weighbridge. I am further informed that it is a rare occurrence for anyone to get cattle weighed at this weighbridge.

THE TOWER OF LONDON WHARF.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, after ascertaining that only three barges were moored to the Tower of London Wharf on the Saturdays in 1890 (namely, one on each of three separate Saturdays), he will admit the public to the riverside promenade on Saturdays and Sundays under regulations which will avoid any difficulty with regard to landing stores? I also wish to ask whether the announcement which appeared in a morning journal on Friday is authentic?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Yes, Sir; I have great pleasure in stating that Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to direct that the Tower Wharf be thrown open to the public on Saturdays and Sundays as soon as the necessary arrangements are completed.

THE VACCINATION ACTS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a sentence of seven days' imprisonment, with hard labour, passed on the 4th of February by the Magistrates at Northiam, Sussex, on George Ransom, of Northiam, for non-payment of costs incurred in connection with an order under the Vaccination Acts; whether, in view of the fact that the imposition of hard labour in such cases has repeatedly been declared to be illegal, and compensation given to persons so punished in error, he will refer the case to the Treasury with a view to suitable compensation for illegal treatment in prison; and whether, having regard to the frequent recurrence of these illegal sentences, he will take steps by circular, or otherwise, to inform Magistrates and their clerks more fully of the illegality of inflicting hard labour in such cases?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have received a Report from the Justices on this case, and have also been furnished with a copy of the commitment. The man was sentenced to imprisonment, without hard labour. The occasion, therefore, for such action as is suggested in the second paragraph of the question has not arisen, nor have I any reason to believe that such illegal sentences are of frequent occurrence.

THE CURRENCY.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to his statement that the measure he had promised for the restoration of the gold coinage will be postponed pending further proposals relating to the currency, it is his intention to deal with the currency during the present Session; whether he intends to take any Parliamentary action upon the schemes in relation to bank reserves announced in his recent speech at a public dinner; and when he proposes to bring these important questions affecting the financial and commercial stability of the country under the consideration of the House of Commons?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am unable to give a precise answer to the first question of the right hon. Gentleman. All must depend on the progress of generalness, and much on a fair consensus of opinion which might be found to exist on any portion of my plans. There are parts of the subject which might be separately treated and be dealt with a few simple clauses. With regard to the second question, I am at present in communication with representatives of the large Joint Stock Banks, and it is possible that I may arrive at some agreement with them as to relieving from the necessity of Parliamentary action with regard to their reserves. With regard to the third question, I am unable to give the right hon. Gentleman any definite answer.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, before the Second Reading of the Provisional Order Bills (Railway Rates), he will lay upon the Table a Comparative Statement of existing rates and proposed maximum rates for certain typical articles carried between selected centres of trade, to enable the House to judge of the probable effect of the rates proposed by the Board of Trade?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR M. HICKS BEACH, B. W.): In consequence of representations made to me by a deputation composed of certain traders, a Return has been ordered of actual rates from a number of selected stations and in respect to a number of selected articles. This Return is in course of preparation, and I hope, be ready before the Joint Committee, to which I trust that the question will be referred, sits. I do not, however, think that the Second Reading of the Bills can usefully be deferred until the Return is circulated.

RATING OF MACHINERY.

MR. DUNCAN (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the President of the Government Board, with reference to instructions, by Circular Letter or otherwise, issued by the Poor Law Board before 1871, and the Local Government Board since 1871, to Boards of Guardians and Assessment Committees, for explanations and directions as to the method in which principles or rules of law affecting valuation for rating lied by them in practice, whether one of similar instructions explanatory of the statutory enactments and decisions relating to the assessment of the rateable value of buildings and machinery would be within powers of the Local Government.

PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Hamlets, St. George's): It has been the practice of the Local Government Board at the close of each Session to direct the attention of the Local Authorities by Circular Letter to the effect of the year which has had any reference to the matters under the jurisdiction of those authorities, and they have accordingly called the attention of Boards of Guardians to the provisions of Acts which have had reference to the question of rating. The Board, however, has no authority under which it could give instructions or directions to the authorities as to the principles on which different classes of property should be rated. It may be assumed that the authorities are themselves aware of the decisions of the High Court with regard to the principles of assessment, and they do not think it desirable that they should attempt any explanation of those decisions.

NOTTINGHAM POST OFFICE.

J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the postal and money order office in Market Street, Nottingham, was closed without notice on the 2nd February, and persons having money orders payers have been put to great inconvenience thereby; and when the office will be again open to the public?

POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. GOSWELL, Cambridge University): The office in Market Street will be re-opened for the transaction of Money Order business as soon as the necessary alterations can be made in the premises of the Receiver who has recently been nominated. No avoidable delay has occurred in the selection of a successor to the late Receiver, who was elected in the usual way by the Council.

J. E. ELLIS: I gather from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman that the delay has arisen from the old custom of nomination. Is that so?

MR. RAIKES: No, Sir; I did not say that. The delay has been unavoidable.

PETROLEUM.

MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the heads of a Bill, upon which presumably the "Inflammable Liquids Bill" is founded, formed the subject of a series of conferences between an official of the Home Office and a representative committee of the petroleum trade, and that such committee came to the unanimous conclusion that the requirements of the Home Office were unnecessary in the interests of public safety, and of so stringent a character that they could not be carried out without imperilling the existence of the trade in an illuminant largely used by the poorer classes; whether he is aware that, with a very few exceptions, the fires ascribed to petroleum have occurred with petroleum spirit, the storage, transport, and sale of which are already under ample legislative control; and whether he will undertake to afford a sufficient interval, after the Bill is printed, before taking the Second Reading?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; a series of conferences have taken place, but it is not the case that the committee of the trade came to the "unanimous conclusion" indicated in the question. On the contrary, several members of the committee expressed approval more or less decided of the principle of the Bill, and criticism was directed rather to certain matters of detail. As a matter of fact, some serious fires have occurred with petroleum, other than petroleum spirit, and strong representations have been made to me by various Public Bodies on the subject of the grave public risk which the present absence of regulation of petroleum oil entails. Moreover, I cannot allow that the existing law as to petroleum spirit is at all satisfactory. The Bill is already in print, and I will take care that a sufficient interval shall elapse before the Second Reading. It is a Bill that the House will probably refer to a Select Committee.

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR) BILL.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will assent to the Second Reading of the Railway Servants (Tenure of Houses and Hours of Labour) Bill, which proposes to confer on the Board of Trade certain powers of regulating the hours of labour of railway servants, with the view of its being referred to the Select Committee ordered on the 3rd instant?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I could not prejudge the question by assenting to the Second Reading of the Bill referred to by the hon. Member (which proposes to confer on the Board of Trade certain powers of regulating the hours of labour of Railway Servants) with the view of its being referred to the Select Committee. It would be open for any hon. Member to bring the proposals of the Bill before the Committee.

SECOND DIVISION CLERKS.

MR. BRISTOWE (Lambeth, Norwood): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to the fact that the Order in Council dated 15th August, 1890, was issued to secure greater uniformity in the rules governing officers of higher rank than the Second Division in the several Departments of the Civil Service, and that the Treasury Minute of 12th December, 1890, addressed to heads of Departments states that the Order in Council should be brought at once into operation for all Civil servants, any, and if so, what steps have been taken to retire officers in the Central Office of the Supreme Court of Judicature above the age prescribed by the said Order and Letter?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Under the Order in Council, the Treasury Minute referred to, compulsory retirement on the ground of age does not take effect until after a period of grace ending 1st January, 1892. In the interval the Lord Chancellor will consider what provisions of the Order should be applicable to officers of the administrative departments of the Supreme Court, whom he does not consider to be in a position in all respects analogous to that of other Civil Servants.

TIED BREWERS' HOUSES.

MR. JOHN KELLY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will state to the House the purport of the answer of Justice Grantham to the question which he undertook, on the 30th ultimo, to put to that learned Judge, with reference to the evidence given by the defendant manager at the hearing of the action "Keen v. Ushers & Co., Limited," the 28th ultimo; whether he is able to say if evidence was given in that case as to its being a common practice of Brewery Companies to employ persons to manage their licensed houses who are, in fact, the mere servants of such Companies, dismissable at a week's notice, but are made to sign agreements with the Brewery Companies for yearly tenancies in order that such agreements may be produced before the Licensing Justices and whether, with a view to prevent frauds being practised upon the Licensing Justices by the production before them of bogus agreements for yearly tenancies, he will call their attention to the case of "Keen v. Ushers & Co.," and the fact that their power is limited to granting or renewing a licence to a person "about to keep" the house, and they must take all necessary steps to ascertain whether applicants, who produce such agreements before them, are nevertheless only the servants of Brewery Companies to which the licensed premises belong?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the learned Judge that in the case put before him both the man put in possession and the defendants stated that the agreement was a "bogus" agreement and adopted for the purpose of deceiving the Justices. This being admitted, the Judge describes such an agreement as a fraud on the Justices, but stated that in his opinion, the London brewers, who were not guilty of it, and that it was not a universal practice. No evidence has reached me either that the requirements of a yearly tenancy are commonly made by the Justices, or when made, it is fraudulently evaded by the applicant for the licence. The case of "Keen v. Ushers & Co." establishes no new principle of Licensing Law to which attention need be called.

Mr. KELLY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Magistrates have any power to give or transfer a licence to any person except the person who is to keep the premises?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The hon. Gentleman is now interrogating me on the Licensing Laws. I must refer him to the Courts.

THE BACARAT SCANDAL.

Mr. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any attempt has been or is to be made to enforce the provision contained in the Queen's Regulations and Orders for the Army that "the commanding officer is to discountenance any disposition in his officers to gamble?"

Mr. E. STANHOPE: I have every reason to believe that Commanding Officers do use every endeavour to discountenance gambling in their Regiments, and with very satisfactory results.

Mr. SUMMERS: Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that, by Section 5, of the Regulations, the commanding officer is called upon to discountenance any disposition in his officers to gamble?

Mr. E. STANHOPE: Yes, Sir; I perfectly understand that.

Mr. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any communication has been received at the War Office from any officer in the Army, or from any other source, which enables him to connect the statements which have been published in the Press, concerning the names of a Field Marshal, a Major-General, and a Lieutenant Colonel in the Grenadier Guards with a case of gambling and alleged cheating in Yorkshire in November last; whether he is aware of any legal proceedings having been commenced by one of such officers relating to certain allegations which have been connected with his conduct at the gaming table; and whether, pending the proceedings, he will take steps to prevent any officer connected with them from being retired? I also wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman has personally seen either of the three officers upon this subject?

Mr. E. STANHOPE: No communication has been received which enables me to contradict the statement published in the Press. I understand that legal proceedings have been commenced by one of the officers alluded to. It is, therefore, not proposed to allow any officer connected with the case at present to retire. With regard to the further question of the hon. Member, I must reserve within my own discretion to see anyone whom I may think necessary upon any subject in regard to which I have to answer in Parliament.

*Mr. COBB: Am I to gather from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman that he has not personally seen any officer concerned?

*Mr. E. STANHOPE: The hon. Gentleman is certainly not to gather anything of the sort from my answer.

POACHING.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a report in the Cromer and North Walsham Post of the 31st January last, of the prosecution before the Hon. H. Harbord and Mr. J. Shephard of one William Laycock, on a charge of poaching in a plantation belonging to Lord Suffield at North Walsham, from which it appears that evidence was given by two witnesses proving that Laycock was not at the time alleged in the plantation, and that the Bench found the prisoner guilty, and inflicted a fine of £10 and £1 5s. costs; can he explain why, although the prisoner expressed his unwillingness to have the case settled by the Bench, and asked for a remand in order to bring further evidence to prove his innocence, the Bench refused his application; whether he is aware that there has been of late a considerable difficulty in getting the necessary quorum of Magistrates on the North Walsham Bench, resulting in delay and inconvenience to suitors and others concerned; and whether he will interfere to obtain the remission of the heavy fine inflicted upon Laycock?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I have obtained a Report from the Justices on this case. Two witnesses were called to prove an alibi, but the Justices considered their evidence not inconsistent with the presence of the man in the plantation at the time of the offence. The defendant expressed no unwillingness to have the case settled by the Bench. After it had been decided he asked for an adjournment; but, according to the law, it was not then possible to grant it. I am informed that, as a rule, there has been no difficulty in obtaining a quorum of Justices at these Sessions. On two recent occasions, owing to the illness of two of the Justices and the absence of another, a delay of a few minutes occurred; but no public inconvenience has resulted. The case seems to me to have been clearly proved; and I cannot advise any interference with the sentence.

NATAL.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Bill granting responsible Government to the Colony of Natal has received the Governor's assent; whether the Bill, which provides only one Chamber, contains provisions enabling the Colony to create a second Chamber in the future; whether any opportunity will be given to this House to discuss the details of the Bill; and whether special agreement has yet been come to by which the Colony undertakes, on the commencement of responsible Government, to provide for the defence of its own territories?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The answer to the first paragraph of my hon. Friend's question is, No. The Bill will be reserved for the signification of the Queen's pleasure. Until the Bill has been received here, it will not be possible to make any definite statement as to its details. The details of the Bill cannot properly be discussed in this House, as the intervention of Parliament is not required. No final conclusion has been come to respecting the arrangements for the future defence of Natal.

THE LIMPOPO RIVER.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have received any proposals to permanently improve the navigation of the Limpopo River; whether the right of free passage to the sea by that river has been reserved for the States or Colonies situated on its inland waters; and whether the Government are in possession of any recent surveys of the mouth of that river?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. Lubbock, Manchester, N.E.): It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to receive proposals for the improvement of navigation of this river, as they have complete control over its navigable waters. If the Convention of the 20th of August, 1890, had been ratified, the freedom of navigation would have been secured by the 11th Article. The question whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any recent surveys should be addressed to the Admiralty.

IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. MAHONY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will grant a Return showing, as regards the National Schools in Ireland for the year ending March 1890, the number of children on the rolls in each district on whose account no school fees were paid?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it is necessary to supply a Return.

IRISH MAILS.

MR. MAHONY: I beg to ask the Master General whether he can state how many occasions since Nov. 1st, 1889, the mail train timed to leave Kingsbride, Dublin, at 7.40 a.m., has missed the train leaving Limerick Junction for Limerick at 10.20 a.m.; whether the result on such occasions is to delay the delivery of letters and newspapers in Newmarket, West, Abbeyfeale, Listowel, Tralee, Ennis, and other towns beyond Limerick by from five to seven hours; and whether he will consider the advisability of requiring the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company to keep their train waiting at the Limerick Junction the same period as that the Great Southern and Western Railway is bound to keep their train at Kingsbride for the arrival of the cross Channel Mails?

MR. RAIKES: I find that the failure referred to have occurred on eight occasions since the 1st November, with the result correctly described by the hon. Member. The Waterford and Limerick Railway Company do, when necessary, detain their train at Limerick Junction for the Mails from Dublin, but the detention is limited; and, in view of encies of their traffic, the Company refrained from binding themselves under all circumstances the collision between the two trains in on at Limerick Junction. I shall look into the question again if hon. Member desires.

CASE OF THOMAS BLACK.

MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to draw the Secretary of State for War's attention has been directed to the Fermanagh Times of 24th January, in which it is stated that Thomas Black, who is at present an inmate of the Enniskillen Workhouse, was in the 21st Regiment (N. B. Dragoons) all through the Crimean campaign; that, being frostbitten and wounded before Sebastopol, he was removed to Chatham Hospital, and was subsequently discharged on a gratuity of £100 per day, which was to last only for a year and a half; and that he subsequently re-joined the Army, and served all through the Indian Mutiny; and whether he will make inquiries into the accuracy of the statements, and will, if satisfied of their truth, take some steps to make adequate provision for this veteran, and prevent him from the humiliation of spending his closing years in a workhouse?

E. STANHOPE: Thomas Black was in the 21st Fusiliers in the Crimea for a period of seven months. He was discharged as unfit for service, owing to paralysis following on his wounds, and was allowed a pension of 6d. pending recovery. On the 22nd of January 1857, his health being apparently completely restored, he enlisted in the 1st Artillery, and denied that he had served in the Army before. After a short time he was discharged with a bad leg. He was not eligible for a pension either on the ground of service or character, and the Commissioners of the Chelsea Hospital had repeatedly refused that no pension could be granted.

MICHAN'S CHURCH, DUBLIN.

MAC NEILL: I had intended to draw the Secretary to the Treasury's attention has been directed to a notice of the Rev. Thomas Long, M.A., of St. Michan's Church, Dublin, appearing in the Irish Times of 16th January.

January, 1891, stating that the tower of St. Michan's Church is in a dangerous condition and fast going to decay, but that the Ancient Monuments Board will do nothing for its repair unless the Church Body will consent to give up the use of this tower to them; whether he has seen a letter in the Spectator of the 29th November from Mr. W. G. S. Bagot, commenting on the defects of the administration of "The Ancient Monuments Protection Act, 1882," and stating that out of a sum of £150 voted by Parliament for the year 1889-90, for the preservation of ancient monuments in Ireland, only £1 7s. 6d. was actually spent on them, the balance going back to the Treasury; and whether he will take some step, either by the amendment of the law or otherwise, so as to prevent the tower of St. Michan's Church, which was built in 1036, and is from its historical associations one of the most interesting structures in Ireland, from falling into ruin from want of funds for its repair, when moneys voted by Parliament for the preservation of ancient buildings are actually paid back to the Treasury? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman, I will postpone the question.

NOTE ISSUES IN IRELAND.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the contemplated alteration of note issues in England, he will consider the question of note issues in Ireland, and endeavour to remedy the inequalities which prevail there between the banks by extending the issuing power of those banks of issue whose business has outgrown the limit of their original authorisation; and whether he will confer upon those banks of non-issue such powers of issue as their capital and reserve would warrant?

MR. GOSCHEN: In reply to the question of the hon. Gentleman, I do not propose to take in hand the question of note issues in Ireland; but I am bound, in frankness, to add that I do not think that I should in any case be disposed to increase the issuing power of the existing banks of issue, or to confer powers of issue on non-issuing banks, unless, indeed, the whole system of these note-issues by private banks were re-cast and placed under new conditions.

MR. FLYNN: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the National Bank of Ireland and the northern banks issue twice the amount they are authorised to issue, while the Bank of Ireland issues more than one million pounds less?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am prepared to receive any information on the subject; but I must repeat that I am against the principle of extending the issuing powers of private banks except under new conditions.

IRISH DISTRESS.

MR. MORROGH (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the great distress at present existing in the districts surrounding Tracton, County Cork, he could see his way to give relief by issuing instructions to the Board of Works or the Local Authorities to immediately proceed to complete the road from Minane Bridge, through Gurtgrynane, to Glownroe; and is he aware that this work will be rendered necessary on account of the new bridge about to be erected over the Minane River at Ringabella, and therefore may be classed as a useful and reproductive work?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am unable to give any directions of the kind required.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps have been taken for the relief of distress along the seaboard from Cahirciveen to Kenmare; whether he is aware that a deputation of 300 labourers from the Ballinskelligs district, a locality remote from the facilities of the railway works, waited on the Cahirciveen Board of Guardians to demand work or relief; and whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the advisability of constructing a pier at Ballinskelligs which would give employment to the starving people of the district, and tend to develop the local fishery?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Careful attention is being given to the condition of the district referred to. The hon. Member is not, perhaps, aware that relief works are in progress in the district.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has recollections of the resolutions passed by a large and representative meeting held in Bandon on the 10th instant, which meeting was presided over by the Chairman of the Commissioners, and attended by the Dean of Cork and several clergymen of different denominations; and whether, in view of the present and further anticipated distress, as set forth in the resolutions, he will give immediate attention to the requests contained in the resolutions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must refer the hon. Gentleman to defer the question until to-morrow.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what works under the Relief of Distress Act are now proceeding in the County of Galway particularly, can he state if any are in progress in the baronies of Dunmore, and Ballymoe?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Relief works are in progress in the following Electoral Divisions of Clifden Union:—Ballykill, Renoyle, Innishboffin, Burren Roundstone, Skannive, and Knocknacree. About 950 labourers were employed on the various works in these Divisions on the 7th inst. In the Outerarade Electoral Divisions of Letterkenny, Glenties, and Crumppour, and on the 7th inst. about 2,450 labourers were employed on these works. In the Galway portion of Ballinrobe Union the works in the Divisions of Owenbrien, Ballinchalla, affording employment to about 250 labourers on the 7th inst. In the Galway Union work has been commenced on the Cloosh Road and Island, but the Returns are not complete as to the amount of labour. Works are about to be commenced in the Ballinacorney Union, which embraces the entire Dunmore barony and portion of the barony of Clare. The question of the necessity for works in Ballymoe is under consideration. In addition to the above works, the Galway and Clifden Railway affords employment to from 500 to 1,000 people.

IRISH CATTLE.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is the malignant epidemic which broke amongst the cattle belonging to the village of Killeeneen, Oran-County Galway, still continues threatens ruin to the people; what the nature of the remedies suggested by the veterinary surgeons who investigated the matter by order of the Local Government Board; and what further, if any, the Government purpose to stamp out the epidemic?

A. J. BALFOUR: It is the case during the second half of the year several outbreaks of disease among and other animals in the village Killeeneen, County Galway, were reported. A Government Veterinary Inspector was at once sent to investigate the matter, and to render the Local Authority (the Gortin Board of Guardians) every possible assistance. At his suggestion special regulations were made by the Local Authority restricting the movement of affected or suspected animals, and of animals in contact therewith, providing for the cleansing and disinfection of the places in which such animals had been kept, and of the houses, &c., used for or about such animals, and also for the proper disposal of the carcasses; and the Royal Irish Constabulary were communicated with, in order that they might co-operate in carrying out these provisions. These measures appear to have had the desired effect.

No information has reached the Veterinary Department of the continuance of any malignant disease amongst cattle in that district, beyond a Report received from the Royal Irish Constabulary that one cow has been reported to them by its owner as being affected with some disease. The Veterinary Department are inquiring into this case.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the tenants of Mr. James O'Connell, on the townlands of Breenagh and Meenitunny, near Letterkenny, entered into a contract with their landlord, on 20th November, 1887, to purchase their holdings at 15 years' purchase, all arrears of rent being wiped out, that the necessary contracts were signed and lodged with the Land Commission, and notification was made to the tenants that the purchase money would be advanced on 20th

June, 1890; that, in the month of November, notice was given to the tenants by the landlord, that the original contract was on account of the non-payment of the land purchase money offered by the tenants, and that the same has recently been cancelled.

Mr. A. J. Balfour: The facts are such that the first paragraph of the Commissioner's original decision in favour of the tenants that the sale will continue on the 17th inst. I am informed, is in fact against any agreement or treaty to purchase the land.

ARRESTS.

Mr. O'Connell: I beg to ask the Lord Lieutenant whether he is aware that the County Roscommon police state of late a few weeks ago that in the morning of the 17th inst. they were requested to be a next morning in the company here.

Mr. A. J. Balfour: The information contained in the original complaint was in a delicate state, and the information contained in the original complaint was not correct.

In reply to Mr. A. J. Balfour: I beg to say that I was not before me against whom a writ was issued before the writ was issued against them. I beg to say that I was not before me against whom a writ was issued before the writ was issued against them. I beg to say that I was not before me against whom a writ was issued before the writ was issued against them.

Mr. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Lord Lieutenant whether he is aware that the tenants of Mr. James O'Connell, on the townlands of Breenagh and Meenitunny, near Letterkenny, entered into a contract with their landlord, on 20th November, 1887, to purchase their holdings at 15 years' purchase, all arrears of rent being wiped out, that the necessary contracts were signed and lodged with the Land Commission, and notification was made to the tenants that the purchase money would be advanced on 20th

June, 1890; that, in the month of November, notice was given to the tenants by the landlord, that the original contract was on account of the non-payment of the land purchase money offered by the tenants, and that the same has recently been cancelled.

ENNISKILLEN BARRACKS.

Mr. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if Lord Wolseley's predecessor in Ireland, Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, also reported on the Enniskillen Military Barracks and the future disposition of troops and headquarters there; if that Report differed from that of Lord Wolseley; if so, in what respects; and will he lay the Report of Prince Edward upon the Table of the House?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The Reports of Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar and of Lord Wolseley are equally confidential, and I cannot undertake to lay them on the Table.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

Mr. LEA (Londonderry, S): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if a Return will be given with regard to the Irish Land Commission in the form now placed on the Paper?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be glad to give the Return asked for, with certain alterations. The Land Commissioners propose the following:—

Name.
Date of original appointment.
Age.
Residence.
Where educated.
Previous profession.
Acreage of land farmed.
Whether held as owner or tenant.
What other experience in agriculture.
What experience in valuing, mapping, and surveying.

THE DEBATE ON MR. MORLEY'S MOTION.

Mr. J. M'CARTHY (London, E): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to the Motion which stands in the right hon. Gentleman's name on the Paper, whether it is the intention of the Government to force to a conclusion to-night this important Debate on the Motion of the right hon. Member for Newcastle (J. Morley)? There is no desire to obstruct the Debate unduly; but I know, in case it should become apparent that a great number of Irish Members wish to take part in it, whether the Government really intend to cut the discussion into one night, and to put it on into an hour when there will be no chance of the speeches being adequately reported?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Westminster): The course which the Government propose to adopt was decided on after much endeavour had been made to ascertain the general feeling on both sides of the House. I have been informed, from sources on which I rely, and on which I think hon. Members may also rely, that it is the desire of the House that the Debate should conclude to-night, and that it would be convenient to adopt the Motion now placed upon the Paper. I should be exceedingly sorry to be supposed incapable of crushing Debate. To do so is far from being my wish. I trust that the understanding which has been come to with regard to the terms of the Debate will be observed, and that I may tend greatly to the convenience of Members who have been summoned from different parts of the Kingdom, including Ireland, to take part in the Division to-night.

Mr. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the question put to him. My hon. Friend the Member for Derry (Mr. J. M'CARTHY) wants a more definite answer. He wants to know whether, if the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury is adopted, the Government will insist upon the Debate to-night? Upon that point, given to that question depends the attitude of many Members towards the right hon. Gentleman's Motion.

answer having been given,

SEXTON repeated the question. To know, he said, whether, right hon. Gentleman's Motion adopted, the Government intend circumstances to force the Debate conclusion to-night; or whether, if reasonable time after midnight there appear to be a desire to continue Debate, they will agree to adjourn?

W. H. SMITH: It would be singularly inconvenient to depart from understanding that has been arrived at. It is the duty of the Government, as a measure the duty of the Opposition also, to arrange a Debate with a view to the convenience of hon. Members on both sides of the House; unless an understanding, such as has been arrived at in the present case, were observed—I do not ask more than the difficulties of conducting business in this House would be enormously increased. It will be the duty of the Secretary to reply on the whole, and if the discussion is protracted to-night, when would the right gentleman be able to reply? Until a reply is delivered the Debate will be in an unsatisfactory state. The understanding that has been arrived at has been mentioned more than once with a view to give full notice of it to hon. Members, and arrangements have been made to secure the attendance of Members from all parts of the country. I think it would hardly further the interests which the hon. Member has stated to prolong the Debate beyond to-

COURSE OF BUSINESS ON FRIDAY LAST.

F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, &c.) It will be in the recollection of hon. Members that on Friday night, after the resolution of the First Committee of Works had been agreed to, the Government, instead of setting up Supply again, as is usual in the circumstances of the case, proceeded at once to the Orders of the Day. On May 16, a similar occurrence took place, and the effect was to shut out a Motion brought in the name of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Colonel Hughes). The Amendment to the Motion for Supply standing second on the Paper on Friday night was a Resolution of which I had given notice, in order to call attention to the position of affairs in Armenia, and to elicit explanations as to matters disclosed in Parliamentary Papers recently presented. When the time came for me to move my Resolution I was in my place ready to rise, and the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce), the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. L. Gower), the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division of Northumberland (Sir E. Grey), and other hon. Members who intended to speak were present. The subject, however, could not be brought on in consequence of the action of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who failed to set up Supply again. In the interests of private Members I wish to ask the Speaker whether Supply ought not, in the circumstances, to have been set up?

*MR. SPEAKER: The cases mentioned by the hon. Member are not exactly similar, for on May 16, 1890, the Motion "That I do now leave the Chair" was withdrawn, whilst on Friday last the Motion was superseded by the Amendment which was carried. Having pointed out that distinction between the cases, I have to say that it is not a matter of imperative obligation on the Government to re-set up Supply when the Motion "That I do now leave the Chair" has been superseded by the acceptance of an Amendment, but it is a matter for the discretion of the Government. I am bound, however, to say that when the Government refrain from setting up Supply again they generally so exercise their discretion at a later hour than half-past 7. Of course, half-past 7 is a very early hour at which to terminate the proceedings of this House; and, I must say, I was surprised that the Motion "That I do now leave the Chair" was not set up again—so much so that the hon. Member will recollect that when the Motion was made that Supply be taken on Monday I called upon the hon. Member and said, "Is this with the hon. Member's consent?" Owing, perhaps, to some misapprehension of my question on the part of the hon. Member I did not obtain a reply, and I was therefore compelled to say again, "Supply—Monday." But the point is one which must be settled according to the discretion of the House and Government, and I could not interfere.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I think that the omission to set Supply up again was probably due to inadvertence; but I ask for an assurance from the First Lord of the Treasury that in future private Members will not be prevented, as they were on Friday night, at so early an hour as 7.30., from drawing attention to subjects in which they are interested.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Undoubtedly there was some inadvertence in the course which was taken on Friday; but if the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Stevenson) had expressed a desire to proceed with his Resolution the Financial Secretary to the Treasury would certainly have set up Supply again. My right hon. Friend, however, was under the impression that the hon. Member did not intend to persevere with his Motion. I assure the House that it is the desire of the Government to give every reasonable and fair opportunity to private Members. As has been said, however, it is not an invariable rule that Supply should be set up again; the Government can use their discretion in the matter.

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON: May I explain that I rose on Friday to ask the Speaker's opinion on the course adopted by the Government. If I had been able to bring my Resolution forward more than a quorum of Members would have remained in the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: No doubt the hon. Member did rise on Friday, but it was not until after the Orders of the Day on the Paper had already been reached.

ELECTORS REGISTRATION BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Is it intended to get Mr. Speaker out of the Chair to-night on the Electors Registration Bill?

*MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it intended to make any progress with the Bill before Easter?

*MR. RITCHIE: That must depend upon circumstances.

In reply to a question by Mr. COBB,

*MR. RITCHIE said: The Government are prepared to consider any feasible amendment of the Bill; but I do not think that a proposal to make the County Council register come into force at the same time as the Parliamentary register at present does would be a feasible one.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

PUBLIC WORKS AND REPAIRS (CONTRACTS).

Return ordered—

"Of the Conditions of the new Contract for Her Majesty's Office of Works, for Works and Repairs in the London District." — (Labouchere.)

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION FROM THE STANDING ORDERS).

Ordered, That the proceedings on the Motion relating to the Administration of Law (Ireland), if under discussion at Twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order "Sittings of the House." — (William Henry Smith.)

MOTION.

ADMINISTRATION OF LAW (IRELAND) RESOLUTION.

(5.33.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I have seen it stated in certain quarters that the Motion which I have the honour to introduce is out of date. I have the honour to introduce a Motion which events have put practically out of date. I have been ill in the House, and during that time have not been accustomed to bring forward Motions against coercion, though I have been in the habit of making tests against coercion in one form or another. But I can recall no occasion when my protest against coercion was more entirely in season than it is to-day. My Motion can hardly be considered out of date when it is remembered that three or four nights ago there passed within a few yards of this House a party of their way to an Irish prison two Members of this House, who certainly do not stand lowest either in influence or estimation either in or out of the House. I have, however, no intention to-night of going into the question of the administration of the law generally in Ireland; I propose to confine myself almost entirely to certain affairs and proceedings in connection with the prosecutions in the case of the perjury which ended in the imprisonment of two hon. Members of this House.

several other persons. I am that I shall not be able to compress my remarks into so reasonable a compass as I could desire. We were discussed this morning by the circulation of a Bill relating to the length of sittings in this House, containing a clause of a very drastic character, and, among other things, providing that when the speech of a Privy Councillor reaches a certain hour, the Clerk at the Table should sound a bell, just as is done at a Law Conference. Fortunately for the Government, perhaps, less fortunately for the Opposition, this clause has not yet become law. I shall try to compress what I have to say into the narrowest possible compass. I shall speak on the part of Members of this House who have a very considerable amount of personal knowledge with reference to the law in Tipperary. On the 17th of November last year warrants were issued, and proceedings taken against several Members of this House and eight other persons for conspiracy and obstruction in connection with the prosecution of the hon. Member for South Tipperary. The hearing of that case began on the 25th of September. On that day I happened to be in Ireland, and I, with several other hon. Members of this House and several English Members—made it our business, it was not by accident—to be present at the hearing of the case, and I do not expect that the Chief Secretary or any one else can complain that a Member of this Parliament, which passed the Criminal Coercion Law for Ireland, did not feel it within his right and duty to witness the working of that tremendous law placed in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. With regard to the conduct of the police, before I state what I have to say I be allowed to say that my opinion as to the Irish police since 1886, up to September last year, has never been in an attitude of hostile criticism? The right hon. Gentleman himself has made it the justice to say that I have been careful not to make attacks on the Irish Constabulary for what they have done in the performance of their duty. I am not in that respect the hon. Member who moves the amendment, and who, when I was arrested in 1886 for supporting the National League, made an attempt to discredit and disparage them. I have never done that. I have allowed allowances for the difficulties which the Royal Irish Constabulary are placed. But that is all I should not describe what I should consider that a great place in my own presence that account open to a discussion because hitherto I stood up for the Irish Constabulary would not on this occasion stand against them had I not been utterly forced to do so. In Tipperary opened a new pitch of demoralisation, brutality, and lawless subordinate agents of the Government. Gentleman have been a system of standing up for what they do, whether right or wrong, crediting every statement and discrediting every tradition, and of refusing to enter into their conduct, not only in the case for inquiry made but in the case of ten minutes in the experience showed me what the Chief Secretary has said a thousand times said that the boisterous crowd are regarded as agents in Ireland and a pretext for dispersing a crowd. It has been ten minutes in Tipperary perfectly harmless and a boisterous crowd was charged without any cause whatever assembled to see certain persons in charge of an escort. The law passed, and it was after Colonel Caddell, who was the person who ordered the crowd to be dispersed, began to cheer some of the persons at some other persons. Nothing else. Colonel Caddell a paroxysm of agitation and alarm. My hon. Friend for Bradford will bear me out in saying. Colonel Caddell has said that it was a most dangerous crowd, and ordered to be cleared, though the crowd was blocked. Colonel Caddell has changed his mind. In one letter which he wrote—the first letter—he said the street was nearly blocked and he said it was entirely the "entire block" was blocked. The police charged the elf hustled by a constable in a state of uncontrollable fury. I am told that I do know the dangerous nature of a merary crowd. Well, you have from Colonel Caddell's own mouth a perfectly way of estimating the exact ger to be apprehended from this rd, because he says that the rd was dispersed in two minutes five constables. Whether five or they used a violence which in land any Watch Committee would e visited by cashiering Colonel dell and every man of them. But is less material than the second Act is drama. The second act or scene : place at the entrance to the Court- se, where the trial was about to n. But that act is of much less im- ance than the defence set up by the f Secretary. There certainly were mber of persons assembled, curious, ppose, to see the proceedings against of the most popular of their heroes. re was a crowd, but only about as e as I saw this afternoon near this use when driving into its precincts— a crowd as you may see any time n there is some slack interest mani- ed in our proceedings. One would k it was a dense, vast, savage crowd, ed with blackthorns and with pockets of explosives. It was a crowd which hould number at 50, but which mel Caddell does not put down at more 100. It was as quiet, as harmless a rd as I ever saw; and you had to p them in order a large armed force of constabulary and redcoats, which not number less than two to one, and ably much more. The gates admit- to the Court-house were closed, but to me. I was admitted, but they e closed to persons who had just as ch legal right of admittance to the rt-house as I had or the police them- es. I say two things. I say, first, ; it cannot be denied that whatever urbance occurred was due to the ing of the gates contrary to the law; I say, secondly, that no Englishman was present will deny—and I do except from this even the English ers who commanded the red coat:— the assertion by the persons at the s—this handful of persons—of their ful right to go into the Court-house . resisted by the constabulary under order of their officer with a brutal, ferocious, unnecessary, and absolute unprovoked violence, of which I should expect any disciplined force in the world would be thoroughly ashamed, and which I am bound to say that some of the constabulary seemed to be ashamed of and disgusted at. I am not going to inflict on the House the details of the brutality. It has been said that I have exaggerated the brutality; that I was unnerved by the sight of broken heads. Well, I was brought up in a surgery, and the sight of broken heads has no alarm for me. I have said in public what I have to say on this point. I have been prepared ever since the incident happened to attest everything I have said in the most solemn manner in which the English law allows me to do so. The right hon. Gentleman cannot deny that ["Hear, hear!" from Mr. BALFOUR.] I have no fault of mine. ["Hear, hear!" from Mr. BALFOUR.] Does the right hon. Gentleman mean by that interruption that I did not go to Ireland in December—does he mean that I have shirked for the moment going into a Court of Justice and giving my evidence in a proper kind of way?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester E.): No, Sir; what I meant was that—that the trial to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, and upon which he did go to Ireland to give evidence, was postponed, not at the instance of the Crown, but at the instance of the right hon. Gentleman's friends. The trial is to come on in March, and I am amazed that the right hon. Gentleman should refer to the question.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman forgets that the Judge was presiding in the Court, at all events, and I thought the reason for postponement was an adequate one, otherwise the Court would not have allowed a postponement. Then what is the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman's gesture and interruption? I have from the beginning been willing to take any opportunity which the law allows to make good every assertion in detail which I have made. Now the right hon. Gentleman at Newcastle attacks the issue in a way which I regard as perfectly fair. He said that the justification of the police does not turn on the degree of injuries inflicted, but on the character of the duties they had to perform, circumstances in which they had performed them. That is what the hon. Gentleman described as the case, and I accept it. Let us test the effect of the officer in charge of the constabulary by the test which the right hon. Gentleman himself has laid down. In the first place, what is the law as incorporated in the right hon. Gentleman's own Coercion Act? In that Act the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, is incorporated, and one of the clauses of that Act is this—I call the attention of the House to this, because it is "In all cases of summary proceedings the place in which any Justice or Justices shall sit and determine any complaint shall be to be an open court, to which the public may have access so far as the same conveniently contain them."

Now, are the pleas brought forward by Colonel Caddell at various times and in various places to excuse the closing of the Court-house and the exclusion of the persons who had a legal prima facie title to go in? The first plea is that we had to keep room for witnesses. I went into the Court-house twice, with an interval between my two visits to the front of the Court-house; and I say that what I said to Colonel Caddell on that occasion—that on those occasions the space appropriated to the public was absolutely empty. No witnesses or other persons were in the Court-house. The space was absolutely empty. The second plea is that stones were thrown. This was an afterthought. I can only say that I saw no stones thrown, and Colonel Caddell himself never mentioned that circumstance to me as a plea for excluding the people until he had changed his mind and admitted that a stone had been thrown. That was an afterthought. The third plea was this: "How," says Colonel Caddell, "could I admit miscellaneous persons of a mob, capable of throwing stones, into the Court-house of Tipperary?" As far as these Tipperary cases go, I have only one remark of a general kind to make, and that is, that we have heard a great deal about the constabulary and though there is a museum of explosives shown at Tipperary, as a matter of fact there is no proof at any time of those deplorable transactions or of injury done to life or limb or of injury to property which could not be met with the payment of a sovereign or two. What is to be thought of the argument that this Tipperary crowd was kept out of the Court-house because they might have explosives with them, when the effect, of course, of their throwing explosives would have been to destroy Mr. Dillon, Mr. O'Brien, and their own friends? What more irrational argument could be brought forward than that? But the Chief Secretary met this point in a very remarkable way indeed. Replying to me, he said, "Oh, well, about the explosives injuring the friends of those who were about to throw them, that was not the point. The point is that a crowd that will throw explosives is a crowd that may be trusted to do things not so bad as throwing explosives, but things which are bad enough to upset the dignity and procedure of a Court of Law, and to admit persons capable of actions like that would be a culpable breach of duty on the part of any police officer either in Ireland or England." The right hon. Gentleman does not know his own Coercion Act, because there again the Petty Sessions Act is incorporated. I should like to call attention to the 2nd sub-section, from which I have already quoted—

"If any person shall wilfully insult any Justice or Justices so sitting, or shall commit any other contempt, it shall be lawful"

—not for the constables of their own accord to keep them out of Court—

"for such Justices by verbal order to have the persons so offending removed, or to visit them with imprisonment or fine."

Let the House mark what is the attitude of this great partisan of law and order on this point. Though the statute says that if an insult is offered to the dignity and procedure of a Court of Law the Court itself shall punish it, the right hon. Gentleman says the point is this—that, in spite of the law, not the Magistrate is to punish acts which upset the dignity or interfere with the procedure, but the policeman outside is to determine before he admits any one whether he thinks the person claiming admission is likely to upset the dignity or procedure of the Court; and if he chooses, then of his own will and pleasure he may deprive that citizen of a right which is conferred by statute. First pass a Coercion Act, then your constabulary play fast and loose with the provisions of it, and then the Chief Secretary, it would have been a breach of duty if they had not infringed the provisions of his own Act. There is one remark of the Chief Secretary which goes to prove the utter worthlessness of this plea about explosives and the exclusion of the word, and that is, that the whole of the crowd were actually admitted in spite of the stone-throwing, in spite of the suspicion of explosives, within a few minutes of the cessation of charging and batoning by the police—the whole of this dangerous and formidable crowd was admitted. It may be said that the constabulary made a blunder. It may be truly said also that the Chief Secretary made a maladroit defence, and it may be said that this excess of force was a maladroit defence by Ministers to happen in any country. That is true, but when an excess of force has been exposed anywhere, except in Ireland, there is censure and there is redress. What was the redress in Ireland? The persons who were injured by the excess of the police took proceedings against them, and this charge was heard before a Court of Petty Sessions. How was the Court composed? In the ordinary way that charge would have been heard by the ordinary Justices of Peace, but on this occasion, contrary to practice, contrary to usage, no fewer than five Resident Magistrates swooped down on the Bench from Galway, Cork, Mayo, and in effect packed that Bench. One of those Resident Magistrates took the chair, I understand—I am not sure about this—irregularly. At such events, there you have a packed Bench, a deliberately packed Bench—it is to say, a charge against the constabulary and against a Resident Magistrate was to be tried before a Bench entirely composed of gentlemen who had themselves been in charge of constabulary, and who were liable to be in charge of them again; it was heard by Resident Magistrates, to whose body belonged the person accused. There is not a member in the House who will not say that the ruling of the Chairman, which is so extravagant as to justify my hon. friend the Member for Longford in kicking the dust of the Court from his eyes—that that ruling, excluding the defence of certain photographs which had been taken, though he allowed that they might themselves be put in evidence, was entirely contrary to good law and to good procedure. I believe that cannot be denied. I say that if an excess of force were proved to have been used in England, there would be redress and censure. Has there been any censure? The Police Authority took out counter summonses, against the persons whose heads they had broken, for riot and assault. They did not take out summonses out in the ordinary way before ordinary Justices, under the ordinary law. They were charges under the Coercion Act by the police, with Colonel Caddell at their head, to be tried by the Resident Magistrates, who were their brother officers in the same service. I hope that the House will realize that that in itself is a very remarkable thing. It has always been our boast in this country that we could not endure that abomination of centralization of Governments—the bureau administratif—that is to say, a law by which an official of the State is always more responsible to the administrators of the State. But what is the difference between the bureau administratif in France and a case of this kind? There is no difference at all. But there was an extraordinary circumstance which prevented the hearing of these cases before a Coercion Court. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary went to the City of Newcastle, where he devoted a long speech to this subject. Of that long speech I do not complain, and I hope he will not make such speeches in Newcastle. He had advised the people to whom he was speaking to suspend their judgment if he had warned them not to take my story for gospel, and that of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, I should have had no kind of complaint to make against him. But he was not content himself with that. The right hon. Gentleman, though he was not an eyewitness, though he could only form his judgment upon the unsifted and untested reports of his own agents and officers, though the case was pending before two Resident Magistrates dependent upon him, yet thought it worthy of himself to tell the public, and to come to the two Resident Magistrates in his speech, that Colonel Caddell was the person who was to be believed.

that I and my friends were unworthy, partial and passionate, not witnesses of good credence. True that he prefaced all this with a cautionary remark to the effect that he believed we were incapable of deliberately misleading; but after this cautionary compliment he proceeded to abuse me—and this is the only personal attack which I wish to intrude upon the House—with garbling, with deliberately suppressing passages of fact vital to the argument, with grossly misrepresenting what I had seen, with calumny, with impudences, and with misrepresentation and misquotation. I garbled nothing; I misrepresented nothing; I suppressed nothing; there was no calumny; there was no misquotation. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to-day to make good one single of the injurious charges, and if he cannot make them good, I respectfully invite him for his own sake, not for mine—only to withdraw them. Two or three days afterwards the right hon. Gentleman, either himself awakened, or perhaps awakened by the acute criticism of a Member who sits behind him—the Member for Dover (Mr. G. Ham)—to the fact that he had perpetrated a most disastrous inaccuracy, to give it a mild name. He was roused to a sense of the scandal of the case which he had so publicly and ostentatiously prejudged in the presence of two Resident Magistrates; and was stricken with some sort of conviction, or remorse, or shame. After two or five days he altered the mode of procedure. He withdrew the charges against the police from the Coercion Bill, and it was determined to send the case for trial, although even here it is noticeable that the whole Bench consisted of five Resident Magistrates. I do not say more about what happened on that occasion. I have a good deal to say on the conspiracy prosecution on the matter of the police I have no more to say on the present occasion. But there is one extraneous incident which occurred when I was in Ireland which I have brought publicly to the notice of the right hon. Gentleman—and which also illustrates the spirit with which the police seem to be animated, but to which the right hon. Gentleman has as yet attempted to make no answer. On the Sunday preceding the event which I have referred to, Mr. Dillon addressed his constituents at Swinford, in the County Mayo. The platform was surrounded by a force of troops and constabulary, and the fact that a Member of Parliament in Ireland should not be trusted to address his constituents without this great force is not a very satisfactory evidence of the efficacy of coercion in securing perfect tranquillity in Ireland. What happened? I have Mr. Dillon's own authority for this, which he told me two or three days afterwards in Ireland. Mr. Byrne, I think, the provisional Commissioner, went to Mr. Dillon, before or at the beginning of the meeting, and said to him, "If you say in your speech anything illegal, I shall use force to disperse the meeting." Will the House realise what that comes to? It amounts to this: A police officer is at liberty to go on to a platform and tell an Irish Member of Parliament that if he says anything which he, the police officer, chooses then and there to think illegal, he will disperse a perfectly innocent crowd with batons and, if necessary, with bullets. I invite the right hon. Gentleman to tell us whether he justifies and defends what the provisional Commissioner did, or whether he will pursue the easy, short, and usual way with us and say that there is not a word of truth in it. I will pass on to the great State trial—for it was really no less—which these prosecutions at Tipperary constituted. This was no ordinary case. It took the Crown three days to open the case, they had just upon 90 witnesses to prove it; the whole hearing—mostly occupied, I believe, by the Crown—took up 33 days; and the words and acts of a great number of persons extending, I think, over a year and a-half, were brought into question and into evidence. I remember very well, and I have no doubt that hon. Members also remember, the proceedings in "The Queen v. Parnell and others" in 1880. It exceeded those proceedings, I do not hesitate to say, both in scope and in magnitude. What happened then? If my memory serves me aright, that case was tried at the Bar of the Queen's Bench, which means that it was heard before a full Court of Judges. In order to secure fair play the jury were struck under the old system by special ballot. Most important of all, Chief Justice May refused to preside at the trial merely because he had used words on some previous occasion which might lead the public to suppose that he had a bias and was partial. Contrast that with the action of the right hon. Gentleman in putting Mr. Shannon on the Bench. What I say now is that the case of the prosecutions at Tipperary in September, covering such ground, involving such issues, and involving so many nice, delicate and difficult points of law and evidence, was handed over, not to the Queen's Bench, or to a full Court, but to a couple of Resident Magistrates, one of them an ex-police officer—[an IRISH MEMBER: "Both"]—and the other a man who had qualified himself as an expert in the law sufficient to satisfy the Lord Lieutenant by eating dinners and being nominally called to the Bar. I will say this to the House—and I am speaking in the presence of those who passed the Coercion Act. When you passed that Act, even Gentlemen opposite, and even those on this side who helped them, never contemplated the withdrawal of a case of this immense importance and scope from the jury. The Coercion Act itself contains presumptive evidence that really important cases were to go to a jury; because provision is made for changing the venue, and for the composition of special juries. I say it was not the intention of Parliament that these important cases should be intrusted to a couple of Resident Magistrates, who should unite in themselves the functions of Judge and jury. I will do Gentlemen opposite the justice to say that when they realise all these things, they will admit, if party spirit will allow them to do it, that the sending of these cases to a Court of Resident Magistrates, without a jury, was contrary to the spirit even of that bad Act, and contrary to the intention even of this not very perfect House of Commons. I am not to-day going into any general criticism of the doctrine of the law of conspiracy. We have heard something of that in this Session already; and we shall hear a great deal more. I am not going into the question whether common action, even though it be inspired by common motives, is a criminal conspiracy. I will not question whether because you condemn boycotting ethically and politically, you ought to punish

it even when the case charged is itself legally in the right. To-day it is enough for my purpose to found my case on the sound principle that the only protection against the doctrine of conspiracy becoming an instrument of intolerable tyranny is the intervention of a jury. Conspiracy is one of those matters where the mode of trial goes to the root of the offence, where the finding of a jury is the essence of proof whether the offences charged were criminal in their character and deserve punishment. Conspiracy only becomes a punishable offence when a jury finds that, under the circumstances of a given case, the acts proved were criminal and constituted a conspiracy. Because this is a sound and unchallenged doctrine in England, and because this has been set aside in Ireland, hon. Gentlemen opposite will find that there are tens of thousands of electors in England and Scotland, themselves law-abiding and law-respecting, who will laugh when they are asked to regard Mr. Dillon and Mr. O'Brien as criminals, and who will follow them to their gaols with undiminished esteem and undiminished respect. I dare say that the mover of the Amendment will refer me or make reference to some observations of the Chief Baron the other day in connection with an application for habeas corpus in the case of one of the persons convicted under these proceedings, and refer also to a Return moved for by myself. I am sure that an attempt will be made on the strength of those remarks of the Chief Baron to show that in his opinion substantial justice was done, though in an unconstitutional manner. I for one distrust and hate that expression "substantial justice;" it is a most slippery and hazardous phrase; it was always in the mouth of the Grand Inquisitor, I feel sure. No despot, no tribunal of public safety, was ever at a loss to cover over its violent and lawless acts by talking about "substantial justice." The law of England is substantial justice enough for me, and I say that it is an absurd contention, and strikes at the very foundation of our whole criminal procedure, that, because it is said by a Chief Baron that a jury might have come to the same conclusion and found the same verdict as the Resident Magistrates, therefore, forsooth, that is a good on for depriving the person charged the protection of a jury. But I want to make one other remark on that. I want the House to remember this in the course of this Debate, that the Chief Secretary in his remarks expressly declared that he would say nothing about Mr. Dillon and Mr. O'Brien, who were present, and whose case it might possibly be necessary to pronounce an opinion upon at some future time. I am supposing that it is contended, as it has been so often in Ireland, that you do not trust a jury, then I submit this to many hon. Members opposite must be with me—when you were framing the coercion system, and imposing that upon Ireland for all time, not only to meet an emergency, but as a permanent instrument of Government, it was your duty, when you took powers to suspend jury trials at the good will and pleasure of the Executive Government, to supply some tolerable substitute.

In Ireland, it is well-known, the courts are not overworked. There are public officers and no Judges in any other country so little over-worked. Upon your theory you were at least bound to provide some decently competent person to carry out these functions. I would like to remark secondly, to remark that you ought not only to have put these functions in the hands of Judges, but also to have regulated the performance of the duties of those Judges by some system. There ought to have been some rota. What is the case now? I do not believe that a more dangerous invasion of constitutional rights is possible than what was done by the Chief Secretary himself in this very case.

What is this invasion of right? In Ireland it appears that the Executive Government is allowed to choose the person who shall in a particular case exercise judicial function, and that the right hon. Gentleman does exercise that right, and did it in this case. The right hon. Gentleman does not deny that he exercised that right himself on his own responsibility in appointing the two Resident Magistrates, because in his speech at Newcastle the right hon. Gentleman says he had been attacked because he had specially selected Mr. Dillon and Mr. Shannon to try this case. I think that selection is one of the monstrous acts that even the right hon. Gentleman has been guilty of.

Remember that it has not been denied that Mr. Shannon was mixed up with affairs that were pertinent to the prosecution; it is not denied that he was in charge of the police on the 25th of May last year at Tipperary, and that there was a sharp, angry conflict between him and Mr. Dillon and Mr. O'Brien and others; nor is it denied that he was in charge of the police again on the 27th of May at Cashel, when, I think, there was a personal collision, and that he presided at the trial in July, last year, in connection with the Tipperary business. On the 19th of June last Mr. Dillon moved the adjournment of the House, challenged in a direct way the conduct of Mr. Shannon in these matters, and invited the House to record its censure upon Mr. Shannon for what he had done at Cashel and at Tipperary. Now, let the House realise the facts. The right hon. Gentleman had the whole Bench of Resident Magistrates, some 70 or 80 in number, to choose from. There are in that body at least three or four gentlemen who do know something about law. But what does he do? The right hon. Gentleman chooses the one man in all Ireland who, I do not scruple to say—and if the voice of Party spirit were silenced in this House many hon. Members opposite would say the same—was the man who ought on no account to have adjudicated in this matter. I know that they will set up the trumpety plea that these matters of conflict were not produced in evidence. Yes, you might keep these matters out of the evidence, but how can you banish from the mind of Mr. Shannon the prepossession which these matters has introduced into his mind? How can you make him capable of a preternatural separation of the Mr. Shannon on the Bench and the Mr. Shannon in the field? Are you to pay no attention to the impression that is made upon the population by these things? I have never said a word against Mr. Shannon. Very likely it is true that Mr. Shannon did the best he could to do justice to the parties. But let us suppose my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), and the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) were Resident Magistrates, what would be thought of the Chief Secretary appointing these two Gentlemen to try, say the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), though I am sure that the Members would do their best to decide fairly any judicial matter in which the hon. Member for North Longford was concerned? I say deliberately that the selection of Mr. Shannon was nothing better than the prostitution of a tribunal. Then the right hon. Gentleman will resort—if I may judge from the line he has taken elsewhere—to his favourite implement the tu quoque. I am a tolerably old controversialist, and I have never myself thought that a tu quoque was illegitimate if you had no better argument. The right hon. Gentleman has never hitherto been able to transfix me with this particular missile. He thought that on this occasion he had done so, and displayed an amount of exultation, which I thought rather exuberant, but, considering the novelty and the surprise, I did not grudge it to him. What is the charge against the Chief Secretary? The charge is that he, on his own responsibility, deliberately selected a particular officer, having the whole Bench to choose from, to try individuals who had been involved in direct personal conflict with that officer in the discharge of his executive duty, who had carried on irritating altercations with him, and who had made themselves individually and personally obnoxious to him by inviting this House to censure his conduct. Is that on all fours with anything I did at Belfast? The Resident Magistrates at Belfast during the time of the riot did, no doubt, sit on the Bench, with the ordinary Justices of the Peace when persons were brought up before them who had been disturbers, and on some occasions when these two Resident Magistrates themselves had taken part in suppressing the disturbances. But did I tell these Resident Magistrates to try these rioters? No. The Resident Magistrates who were quartered in Belfast in the ordinary way sat on the Bench along with the ordinary Justices who administer the ordinary law, not because I told them, but in conformity with a fixed and invariable practice—a bad practice I admit—but in conformity, at all events, with a fixed and invariable practice, and in conformity with the jurisdiction and authority which are expressly conferred upon them by statute. There is another point of difference, a very remarkable one, that these two Resident Magistrates who sat along with the ordinary Justices, performing the duty of Petty Sessions Magistrates at Belfast, did not give the men six months' imprisonment in every case. Every serious case, if my memory is right—if my information is good—was sent for trial before the Assizes and a jury at Petty Sessions. Is there anybody in the House who can pretend not to see the difference in respect to impartiality of mind between a Magistrate towards a promiscuous batch of rioters with whom he might have been brought into collision, and the feeling towards particular and well known individuals against whom a Magistrate has a private grievance and a feeling of personal resentment? The worst that can be said in this matter is, that I did not go out of my way to interfere with the ordinary law for carrying on the proceedings at Petty Sessions. That being so, the right hon. Gentleman's tu quoque is misapplied and falls to the ground. The Mover of the Amendment asks the House to declare that—

"The action of the Executive has been rendered imperative by the existence and activity of an illegal conspiracy directed against the civil rights of a large section of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland, who have been subjected to cruel persecution and great loss in following their lawful callings."

No doubt the hon. Gentleman will tell us one of his usually long and anecdotal—but I admit interesting—stories; the same tale, no doubt, which he has told with brilliant success at Eccles, at Hartlepool, and for all I know, at Northampton. Well, not at Northampton. I invite the House to consider first what sort of evidence there is of the success of the policy of the Government. The Coercion Act has been in full, free, and active operation for over three years, yet the Government have still to cope with what the hon. Gentleman will describe and what the Government will contend is a conspiracy of unexampled audacity and intolerable wrong. But what is the use of hon. Gentlemen opposite trotting out figures as to the decline of boycotting, and as to the diminution in the Returns of outrages, in face of such an alleged fact as this? The more the mind of the House is affected by the sensational narrative with which the hon. Gentleman will regale us, the more you magnify the extent, the power, the deadly effect of this conspiracy, more clearly you set the stamp of on your policy. But a more remarkable question people will ask you is this: were these prosecutions, if they were to be instituted at all, so unaccountably long deferred? I invite the particular attention of the House to this. A conspiracy is alleged to have begun in May, 1889. The Crown Counsel, in giving the case, said the fire was kindled in June, 1889, by the arrival of Mr. O'Brien. Speeches, described by the Government as in the highest degree inflammatory and inflammatory, were made all through the summer of 1889. The foundation, according to their own case, of alleged conspiracy was laid and strengthened all through the summer of 1889. All the evils and mischiefs of which the hon. Gentleman will presently tell us—boy-boycotting, threatening notices, alleged shoot-alleged resort to explosives—all these things were in full swing in November and December, 1889, and if, as he says, it was not at last, in September, the "imperative" duty of the Crown to protect Her Majesty's subjects against cruel persecution and great loss in losing their lawful callings," why did they not their imperative duty before? Did they regard it as their duty in November, 1890, if they neglected it all through 1889 and the first part of 1890? In December, 1889, Mr. O'Brien made a boast of the peaceableness and quietude of the movement. If the movement was not legal why did not the right hon. Gentleman at once proceed against Mr. O'Brien? Why was no attempt made all these six months to prosecute—to prosecute all those engaged in these matters for conspiracy? Why was there no inquiry made under the Contempt of Chamber clause? Why was there no prosecution for boycotting? I hope the House in listening to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman will be careful to mark his dates. The only excuse I have ever heard made or suggested for the action of the right hon. Gentleman after closing his eyes to all that was going on which he thought so innocuous and atrocious—the only excuse for opening his eyes in September, 1890, was that he then found out that Mr. O'Brien and Mr. O'Brien were going to set on foot a campaign which would probably be very inconvenient for himself. If any hon. Member, or if the Government have any other explanation to offer, I shall be only too glad to hear it. In Ireland this was the only explanation that was suggested to my untutored mind. Another circumstance that may have influenced the Government was that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. W. Russell) went round Tipperary, more or less under the auspices of Mr. Shannon, and by his communications to the Times newspaper he spurred on the Government to action. If that is not so perhaps he will give us some explanation. This I suppose is probably the last occasion on which it will be my fortune to make a Motion against the coercive system of government in Ireland in the present Parliament. The noiseless foot of time is rapidly bringing the day near when Members of this Parliament will be called to a national account. In spite of pledges, freely and abundantly given, you pass a perpetual Coercion Act, and you passed most of its clauses without Debate, and I think even without Amendments being discussed in this House. Perhaps you hoped that the inherent badness of the Act would be partially, at any rate, redeemed by common sense, by prudence, by moderation, perhaps by some humanity, perhaps by scrupulous regard to justice and equity in its administration. That illusion, I think, must have vanished. Not the least astounding exhibition of the right hon. Gentleman's spirit we had the last time he addressed the House, when he menaced with his indignation and scorn any landlord who should make peace with his mutinous tenants.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Indeed, I did nothing of the sort.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman did not say that in the words I have used, but he said something which was more violent. He said that he would rather beg his bread—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, go on.

MR. J. MORLEY:—than give in to the Plan of Campaign. ["Hear, hear!" from Mr. BALFOUR, and cheers.] Yes, you cheer that; you defend the attitude of the Chief Secretary; but the words I used in no respect differ—[Cries of "Oh!"] What is refusal to give way to the Plan of Campaign but a refusal to make peace with the tenants? ["Oh, oh!"] The right hon. Gentleman will, perhaps, explain the difference to the House when he speaks. But even though you cheer that defiant statement of the right hon. Gentleman, you well know that he was giving you a most unwelcome test of the wisdom, of the statesmanship, and of the conciliatoriness with which he has worked the tremendous engine that you have placed in his hands. I say I have shown you that this Act, which was passed, as I have said before, by a fraud on the constituencies, is being administered in a spirit which is a fraud upon Parliament. You may vote to-night—you will vote to-night—that you “rejoice,” as the hon. Member will ask you to do, “in the successful vindication of the law,” but your rejoicing will be brought in good time to a stern and prompt end when you have to explain to the constituencies of this country, who have the old love of freedom, yes, freedom according to law, freedom with juries—to explain to those constituencies that by vindication of the law you mean proceedings which would not be endured for a day nor an hour in England or in Scotland, and which are a hundred times more foolish and more intolerable in a country like Ireland, where the paramount object of policy by universal consent—I do not care whether you are for Home Rule or against Home Rule—where the paramount object of policy is by a rigorous impartiality gradually to efface that inveterate distrust of law and of the administration of the law which the corrupt and cruel partiality of ascendancy government for all these long ages has burnt deep, and rightly burnt deep, into the soul of the Irish people.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, the action of the Irish Executive in connection with the recent prosecutions at Tipperary, and other proceedings, is calculated to bring the administration of the Law into contempt, and violates the civil and constitutional rights of Irish citizens.”—(Mr. J. Morley.)

(547.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, South): The right hon. Gentleman commenced his speech by announcing that, in order to save the time of the House, he would assume that a great deal was known about Tipperary. That was a very convenient assumption for the right hon. Gentleman, because it enabled him to commence in the month in which he arrived in Tipperary, as if the proceedings actually commenced with his arrival. Every hon. Member must, however, be aware that the proceedings did not commence with the right hon. Gentleman's arrival, and I will lay before the House a plain record of what was the cause of the prosecution at which the right hon. Gentleman assisted on the first day. Two years ago the town of Tipperary, with its 6,000 or 7,000 inhabitants, was one of the most prosperous towns in Ireland. It is the centre of a large and prosperous agricultural district; it is the centre for a great butter trade; the shops in the town are exceptionally good; the farms in the neighbourhood exceptionally large for Ireland. That was the state of the town when Mr. W. O'Brien invaded the place, and if anyone visits the town of Tipperary to-day he will come away with the impression that an avenging army has marched across it, leaving nothing but desolation behind. To use Mr. O'Brien's own words, in September, 1890, this combination has made of that prosperous town and district “a Sahara desert;” and in the Holborn Restaurant, on August 6, 1890, Mr. O'Brien declared that the estates in Tipperary were as “a wilderness sown with salt.” Now I have told the House the condition in which Mr. W. O'Brien found the town, and I have given in his own words the condition to which he and his combination reduced the town, but I absolutely decline to waste the time of the House in discussing the cause of the quarrel. I will tell the House why. There is no person in Tipperary who has publicly declared that he has a grievance against Mr. Smith-Barry, his landlord. Mr. Smith-Barry has passed through the troublous years from 1879 to 1889 without having had a single dispute with his tenantry, and to appreciate this, look at what those troublous times were. If I wanted testimony to this I find it in the statement of Mr. Jeremiah O'Leary, the Chairman of the Town Commissioners of Clonakilty, one of Mr. Smith-Barry's tenants, and a member of the deputation which waited upon him here in London. Mr. O'Leary said that the “tenants considered Mr. Smith-Barry one of the kindest of landlords.” There could be little complaint against Mr. Smith-Barry in the town, for the reason as hon.

ers below the Gangway know, much of the town of Tipperary is middlemen at mere ground rents, the rents are high it is the men who exact them, and not Mr. Barry. I say no man in Tipperary this quarrel commenced ever and he had a grievance against his landlord. But called upon by Mr. W. to do so, the tenants on the proposed to help the Ponsonby by a money subscription. They did to give the Ponsonby tenants a option, and to keep it out of Mr. Barry's rents. That was no to Mr. Smith-Barry's tenants, and their rents were high that plan of did not reduce them. The very operandi showed that these people had a grievance, and their charity was of an easy and vicarious character I have described. Now, I refuse to give the reasons why the town has declined. Mr. Smith-Barry had an absolute legal and moral right to come for the assistance of Mr. Ponsonby, his agent in Cork. How did Mr. W. and the other gentlemen proceed to carry out their conspiracy and to do their behests, reducing this once a prosperous place, as it was in 1849, to the condition of a Sahara? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Barry) has said the House will hear the harrowing details of boycotting; I am not going to give these details, but boycotting cannot be entirely explained of the case, because the Chief Baron alluded to it in his judgment. The House will bear in mind that these gentlemen except Messrs. O'Brien and Dillon were convicted of conspiracy to induce, and incitement, to intimidation. The Chief Baron said there was clear evidence that boycotting was in fact carried out by the parties to the conspiracy to prevent the payment of rents and to punish those who had paid their rents—resorted to on the instructions of the parties to this conspiracy. The right hon. Gentleman was entitled to go to Tipperary to see the carrying out of the work of the machine which this House placed in the hands of the Chief Secretary. But the right hon. Gentleman had also the right to inquire into the work of this conspiracy. I do not deny the right of the right hon. Gentleman's right to go to Tipperary.

L. OCOL. [THIRD SERIES.]

perary and to demean himself by taking part in a faction fight. But when the right hon. Gentleman exercised that right he ought to have inquired into the work of this conspiracy, which was about to be placed on its trial. The right hon. Gentleman stood outside the doors of boycotted shops, on which the ban had been placed, and the owners of which were nearly ruined, and this Privy Councillor of the Queen, this man who has been Chief Secretary for Ireland, this great officer of State, never once crossed the threshold of a house to inquire what the effect of this foul conspiracy had been. The Chief Baron, in his judgment, tells us that this boycotting was carried out upon shopkeepers and farmers. These persons were surrounded by a cordon of pickets, were not allowed intercourse with others, and would-be customers were assailed. I take the case of Miss Hume, the daughter of the Presbyterian minister. That young lady came down from the Presbyterian Manse and ventured to cross the threshold of Mr. Rutherford, a member of her father's congregation. On coming out she was assailed. I put a question on the subject to the Chief Secretary, who said it was true. That young lady was assaulted on her way home, and that Presbyterian Manse has been under police protection ever since. Mr. Hume, a man who has gone in and out amongst his people in the town and neighbourhood for 25 years, walks the roads as I have seen him with a six-chambered revolver in his pocket. [A laugh.] Yes, hon. Members laugh at that, and I suppose the Nonconformist conscience will even tolerate it. I maintain that this was a conspiracy to induce people not to pay the rents they were entitled to pay and, taking the Chief Baron as my first witness, that this conspiracy was enforced by boycotting of the most cowardly character. The Chief Baron goes further. He declares in the second place that this conspiracy was carried out not alone by boycotting, but by violence, and I shall again read the Chief Baron's words. He said—

"It is proved that violence was resorted to towards persons who had rendered themselves obnoxious, either by paying rent or by working for Mr. Smith-Barry."

Then two pages of the Judgment are occupied with distinct cases that were proved, cases of assaults upon Mr. James Godfrey, Mr. J. Ryan, and Mr. O'Neil—two pages of the judgment of the Chief Baron, and he is not a Removable Magistrate. The Chief Baron is your favourite Judge whose judgments, when he decides in your favour, you hurl at the Treasury Bench. If the right hon. Gentleman asks me why these prosecutions were not undertaken earlier, I ask the same question. The only objection I have to the whole proceedings is that they were delayed so long. But I will give him a sample of the violence, and will give judicial authority for it. The right hon. Gentleman talks about these explosives in a way Mr. Dillon and Mr. W. O'Brien are in the habit of talking about them; but in November last a man named Thomas Kirwan was tried before Mr. Justice O'Brien and a Tipperary jury, and convicted of having thrown an explosive substance at the house of Mr. J. F. Duggan, in Tipperary. Mr. Justice O'Brien, after alluding to the offence of which the prisoner had been found guilty, said that—"A meeting had been held in the town a short time before, and the proximity of the two occurrences left no doubt on his mind as to their connection. That meeting was the cause of the prisoner's crime, but still more remarkable were its consequences. It appeared from the informations that immediately after the crime Mr. Duggan, the person against whose house the explosive was directed, served a notice to give up his land, for which, according to his own statement, in his information, he paid no less a sum than £1,500—a most extraordinary and eloquent example of the effect of crime upon public property. In no other part of the civilised world but that in which they were now living—a person would ask whether the man who pursued that course was a madman, or whether he possessed the ordinary courage and spirit of a madman—could a man be intimidated or persuaded to sacrifice his own interests and throw away his own property and that of his family for such a reason. Mr. Duggan, it appeared, had been subjected on various occasions to intimidation, and yet it appeared to him incredible that a person could, under the influence of any kind of terror, make such an extraordinary sacrifice of his own interest . . . and what was the extraordinary state of things that had resulted from that? A town destroyed—a town that was a model of prosperity and success. That prosperity and success were arrested as if smitten by the hand of God. The people passed that town as if it were a place of plague," and the right hon. Gentleman tried to pass it to-night—

Mr. T. W. Russell

"people passed that town as if it were a place of plague, in order not to expose themselves to the violence and misconduct of men like the prisoner. All the prosperity of that town was destroyed, and the inhabitants leaving their homes as if after a siege. People were now transplanted from their lands as if by the power of a Cromwellian settlement, and all this state of strife and confusion was followed, as usual, by crime in its train. Crime brought up the train of public confusion and mischief, and behind crime were arranged the grim form of the law, the prison bars, and the dock in which the prisoner stood, where he was left naked and defenceless to meet the sword of justice."

And yet I am told there was no boycotting and no violence. I think the House of Commons will accept the testimony of Chief Baron Palles and Mr. Justice O'Brien on these questions rather than the testimony of the right hon. Gentleman who spent his three hours in Tipperary and then bolted by the first train. Now, I come to the question of the prosecutions. I know perfectly well there were politicians on both sides who thought these Tipperary prosecutions a mistake. That may be all very well from the standpoint of the Parliamentary game, but the Irish Executive have nothing to do, and ought to have nothing to do, with the Parliamentary game. The Irish Executive have no right to allow these people to be boycotted and ruined; they have no right to see this property destroyed; and they have no right to allow the offenders to go unpunished. My only fault with the prosecutions is that they were undertaken a little too late. I come to the riot, and I have been really astonished at what the right hon. Gentleman has left out with regard to the riot. When he delivered his vigorous speeches in the country, we heard a great deal about one Member of this House. I hope the hon. Member for Mid Tipperary (Mr. Harrison) is present. Speaking at Swindon, the right hon. Gentleman waxed eloquent in regard to the injury done the hon. Member. We have not heard a word about it to-night. We have heard nothing here about the gentleman described at Swindon as a "stripling." The right hon. Gentleman said at Swindon—

"The third reason for this resort to batoning is that a certain Mr. Harrison, who is a young Oxford man just returned to Parliament for an Irish constituency, and whom, if he will not take offence at it, I should call a stripling, that this Harrison was, so says Colonel Caddell, with his single arm defying three strong Irish constables to mortal combat. Truly the most wonderful thing in its way since David and Goliath."

We have an advantage which the right hon. Gentleman's Swindon audience had not; we can have the hon. Member for Mid Tipperary under view. The hon. Member had been to Tipperary before, and I want the House to listen to a very brief extract from a speech he delivered at a banquet on the 26th of May, 1890, in Tipperary. He said—

"He came to that demonstration in Tipperary not exactly for ornamental purposes, and he had hoped that if there was a tussle he would have a place in the scrimmage."

A nice peaceful disposition, Mr. Speaker.

"However, for some wise purpose," he continued, "that pleasure had been denied him."

I will tell him why it had been denied him. There was not a Privy Councillor present, or a fight would have been got up in his honour. Mr. Harrison went on to say that he "Hoped other opportunities would arise when he would not have to play the inglorious part he had played that day as a decoy duck."

The right hon. Gentleman has described what he saw in the Court-yard of Tipperary. Far be it from me to question one word of the right hon. Gentleman's description. I have not had much experience of rows, but I have seen several good rows at public meetings, and I have noticed that it is very hard for any single individual to carry away any fair idea of the whole transaction. One's mind gets intent upon a particular part of the battlefield at a particular moment, and no single man is in a position to give an accurate account of any row that ever took place. Whilst what the right hon. Gentleman said may be true, and no doubt is true from his standpoint, other witnesses are diametrically opposed to him. I will not summon the reporter of the Scotsman newspaper for example. The Scotsman is one of the greatest organs of public opinion in the world, and I am perfectly certain that the Scotsman sent one of its ablest men to Tipperary, and I am quite sure that the instructions he got were these: "Give us the facts; we can reason upon them for ourselves in Scotland." I will not quote the evidence of the Scotsman, but I will quote that of the Cork Examiner. I do not know on which side that paper is now. I do not know which Party its supports, or whether it supports any. [An hon. MEMBER: It does not support you.] That I am sure of; but at the time these events occurred in Tipperary it was one of the most influential organs of the hon. Member for Cork. Describing the fight in the Court-yard, about which the right hon. Gentleman was miraculously silent, so far as the hon. Member for Mid Tipperary was concerned, and, after all, he was the only man who was seriously injured—the Cork Examiner said—

"Mr. Gill now went outside the gate, and was cuffed by a whole squad of policemen. They surrounded him, and were almost tearing the clothes off him, when Mr. Harrison came to his assistance. The hon. Gentleman was to his friend's aid in a second, and succeeded in warding off a blow by turning the policeman's wrist. Another who went for the young Member was made to feel the force of Mr. Harrison's left on his jaw. The policeman retired for a moment, and when the hon. Member was engaged with other policemen, the constable who had first attacked him struck him from behind and knocked him to the ground."

With all this the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly convinced of the innocence of the hon. Member for Tipperary. But in addition to being at Tipperary, the hon. Member for Mid Tipperary has been at Kilkenny, and at the famous meeting at Rathdowney the hon. Member for Cork introduced this innocent stripling, who was as David going out to meet Goliath, in these words:—

"Now, my friends, let me introduce to you the Member for Mid Tipperary, Mr. Harrison, the only man who is able to fight the police, the only man who fought the police single-handed at New Tipperary, and choked three of them."

Mr. Speaker, I begin to understand now why Hamlet was left out of the play. I begin to understand—and the House will understand—why, when the right hon. Gentleman was giving his succinct narrative of the row in the Court-yard, the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Harrison) and his doings were left discreetly out of sight. I now come to the proceedings themselves. The right hon. Gentleman has made a great case of the fact that these prisoners who were tried were deprived of a jury. That is a good charge against Parliament. It is not a good charge against the Irish Executive. If the Irish Executive find an Act of Parliament passed by this House capable of dealing with this conspiracy, they have no right to wait until Parliament assents to a jury. It is their business to put the law into operation as it stands. All the right hon. Gentleman said about a jury would have been relevant if he had been assailing the action of this House, but not a word of it was relevant to a Resolution assailing the action of the Executive. As to the crowd outside, the right hon. Gentleman said there might have been 50 or 100 persons, but it was a small crowd. But that gets the right hon. Gentleman and his friends into a somewhat awkward position. Here was a great hero landing in Tipperary, and was this all the hubbub that could be got up? Does the right hon. Gentleman ask the House to believe that? It may be true; but, if so, it is the most wonderful thing that ever occurred in the history of Tipperary. From what the right hon. Gentleman said you would imagine that when the crowd arrived the Court had not been opened; but the fact is, that it was absolutely sitting in Petty Sessions hearing other cases, and I say that Court has as much right to protect itself as the Court of Queen's Bench has. Surely it is not against the law for the Magistrates and the Executive officer to take steps for the proper conduct of the Court-house? I maintain that it would be impossible to pack 200 people into the Court-house. You have 10 or 12 defendants, about 90 witnesses, the constables who maintain order, the two galleries, one filled by ladies and the other by the Press—

MR. J. REDMOND (Wexford, N.): I saw you among the ladies.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Yes, and what is more, the hon. Member tried to keep me there and failed.

MR. J. REDMOND: You ran away when I asked for a summons.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Colonel Caddell was responsible for order, and, in my opinion, had a perfect right to take into account the capabilities of the Court-house. He was the Executive officer in charge, and had a right to see that those who had business in the Court got in first of all. It was not fair of the right hon. Gentleman, with his great position, the master of these policemen in days gone by, who said to Resident Magistrates "Go," and they went, and "Do this," and they did it; it was not fair of the right hon. Gentleman to go down to this place and fling the influence of his great position into the scale in favour, as I hold, of disorder and uproar. I now come to the case of the Magistrates themselves. Who are they and what are they? You sneer at the law of these men and call them ex-police officers. Since the Crimes Act was passed Mr. Irwin has had a large share in its administration, and not one of his decisions has been reversed. That is a character for him in itself. As to Mr. Shannon, from all that is said of him, one would imagine he had been picked off the streets and sent to this work. The fact is, that he is the son of a most respectable citizen of Dublin. He had a brilliant University career, after which he entered the police, and greatly distinguished himself in that service in the most trying work. He is a man who has forgotten more law than many men below the Gangway who are posing as trained lawyers have ever learnt. It is said that he had previously come into conflict with Messrs. O'Brien and Dillon. But what Magistrate has not come in conflict with them? If that test is to be set up those two gentlemen cannot be tried at all. Mr. Shannon was judicial officer in Tipperary at the time, and the Government must have deliberately passed him over if they had appointed another man. Nothing in Mr. Shannon's past record would have entitled the Government to take any such step. The right hon. Gentleman hinted that another reason why Mr. Shannon should not have heard the case was that he had kept company with myself in Tipperary. Gentlemen below the Gangway were not ashamed to put that statement into an affidavit, sworn before Mr. Justice Holmes, scarcely a word of which was true. My connection with Mr. Shannon was of the simplest character. I went down to Tipperary on the 28th August on a tour with my family. I spent the whole day in Tipperary without speaking to a single human being connected with the administration of the law. I went there for the purpose of finding out the facts for myself. I went through your market and your new town, and I spoke to the boycotting people and those who were boycotted by them, but I never went near a single officer of the law. I stopped at the Limerick Junction Hotel, where Mr. Shannon also happened to be staying. Mr. Shannon arrived at 10 o'clock. At a quarter past 10 I and Mr. Shannon parted, although in the affidavit that was subsequently made it was sworn that we were closeted together for hours. It is true that I arranged with Mr. Shannon to introduce me to Colonel Caddell, and that accordingly the next day Mr. Shannon met me and took me to Colonel Caddell. I did not want to go away without getting at the official statement of facts. Colonel Caddell—not Mr. Shannon—it was who introduced me to the boycotted persons. The whole of my connection with Mr. Shannon consisted of a quarter of an hour's conversation at the hotel and being introduced by him to Colonel Caddell the next morning; yet out of this small matter an affidavit half a yard in length has been drawn up as to my relations with Mr. Shannon. Then as to the attack on the Magistrates who heard this case, never did two men display more patience, and, as Chief Baron Palles pointed out, they absolutely, in their extreme anxiety to be just, shut out evidence against the prisoners which they ought to have received. These are the men now charged with being one-sided and incapable of doing their duty. They gave the prisoners the benefit of the doubt, as they were bound to do, and yet they had been assailed as no "corner-boy" ought to be. What, according to the Judgment of Chief Baron Palles, is proved? First, that there was a conspiracy to ruin Mr. Smith-Barry (that was not denied by the right hon. Gentleman); secondly, that there were attempts to coerce, intimidate, and ruin, and otherwise injure those who refused to join in that conspiracy. On what ground does the right hon. Gentleman attempt to defend such proceedings? I am going to quote the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian; the quotation is an old one, and I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman will disavow it. In 1866, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was supporting the Government, not in sending men before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, but in suspending the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland—I quote from Hansard, volume 184 (Third Series), p. 1941—he said—

"The maintenance of the peace and order of a country, the taking of due security for the tranquillity of those who desire only to obey the laws and to pursue their avocations in peace, is the first duty of the Government."

What Her Majesty's Government are now doing is nothing more nor less than securing "the tranquillity of those who desire only to obey the laws and to pursue their avocations in peace."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle has sat at the feet of the great master, John Stuart Mill, whose words he would scarcely repudiate, and what did Mill say?—

"The only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilised community against his will is to prevent them doing harm to others."

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with his master? That is what Her Majesty's Government are doing—endeavouring to prevent harm to others who would not join this illegal conspiracy. Her Majesty's Government said to the Irish tenants—"You have a right to combine, but you must combine within the law; you can refuse to pay rent, but you must not persecute other people who do so." Now, what is the result of this action on the part of the Irish Government? During the year 1888 there were 1,558 prosecutions under the Crimes Act. In 1890 that number had fallen to 530—a reduction of two-thirds. But that is not the extraordinary part of this Return. There are eight counties which have a population of 1,600,000, or something like one-third of the whole population of Ireland, which have an absolutely clean bill—they are Dublin, Kilkenny, King's, Westmeath, Wicklow, Antrim, Armagh, and Down. In this great population there was not a single prosecution during the year 1890. There are two other counties which have only one prosecution each, namely, Kildare and Meath. Five others have only five prosecutions each, namely, Louth, Queen's, Tyrone, Londonderry, and Sligo; but, unhappily, there are five other counties with a very different record. Tipperary, where this conspiracy is rife, has 80 prosecutions out of the 530; Cork, where the Plan of Campaign is in operation, in one corner of the county, there are 108; in Clare, which is in the hands of a Secret Society, there are 26; in Wexford, with the Plan of Campaign in operation, there are 20; and in Galway, with Lord Clauricarde's estate, there are 56. Those five counties contribute more than half of the total number of cases tried under the Coercion Act in Ireland in 1890. Now, let us take January, to which month the Return has been brought down. In that month in Leinster only one county is affected, the County of Longford. Munster is clean; Ulster would be clean but for Donegal, and Connaught has an entirely clean bill of health for that month. If the House wants to see the progress that has been made, let us take the year 1888. In the East Riding of Cork in that year there were 33 Crimes Courts held. In 1890 there were 29. In the West Riding there were 34 in 1888 and 9 in 1890; in Clare in 1888 there were 46 Crimes Courts, in 1890 only 8. In Kerry there were 41 of the Courts in 1888 and only 2 in 1890. In Limerick there were 27 Crimes Courts in 1888, and in 1890 only 5. I say that these figures are more eloquent as to the action of the Irish Executive than all the vituperation of the right hon. Gentleman against them. If I were to give another fact it would be as to what occurred at the last Winter Assizes. The House will hardly realise it, but it is nevertheless a fact that although agrarian cases and cases of murder were among those brought to justice, there was not during the whole of last Winter's Assize a single miscarriage of justice—not a single case in which the juries refused to do their duty; and why is this? It is because the jurors are rejoicing in something like freedom. It is because the tyranny of the village ruffian has been taken by the throat and strangled. It is because honest men now have a chance of doing their business in safety, and because juries are now enabled to do what they take an oath to do on behalf of the State. What, now, is the state of Tipperary? and I put this to hon. Members below the Gangway who have supported the crusade which has gone on in that county. The victims were formerly marked down for ruin; but they have not been left to their fate, and they are not ruined. A glorious sight was witnessed in that town yesterday fortnight—but I should say, first, that the first meeting of this conspiracy was held under the presidency of Father Power, Mr. O'Brien being present. Now, yesterday fortnight a Father Power—I suppose the same Father Power—officiated at Mass in one of the Tipperary chapels, and what did he say? He delivered a lecture to his people upon the Divine Law of love to one's neighbour as being the Supreme Law. He denounced boycotting in all its moods and tenses, and in these words, which I beg to quote, he closed his address to his people—

“If the fight cannot be kept on unless by the wicked means of boycotting, punishment, and persecution of their neighbour, he asked them not to co-operate any longer in the work of the destruction of their town. Let them cease from causing pain and misery to their fellow-townsmen and townswomen by boycotting all those who meant to carry out their own opinions and feelings in this fight. If they continued to destroy their town, or rather what still remained of it to be destroyed, they would yet find leisure to repent their conduct: let them even now save the salvage from further wreck.”

Boycotting has brought down that prosperous town, and the man who introduced it first, who has hounded on the people for months, now urges them to secure the salvage of the town. I find no fault with the words. I am sorry they are so late. Canon Cahill has used much the same language, and yet he and Father Power are, perhaps, more responsible for what has occurred in Tipperary than any other two men. When did these rev. gentlemen find out that it was the first Christian duty to love one's neighbour? Canon Cahill all through the troubles has behaved less like a minister of the Gospel of peace than like an ecclesiastical corner-boy. These rev. gentlemen now plead for peace and for “salvage.” They have sought to ruin the hon. Member for South Hunts, but they have not ruined him; they have ruined their town and its merchants. They have made their religion a byword and scoff throughout the country. Ministers of religion who for 18 months hounded on the people to boycott and to engage in a conspiracy now turn round and ask them to give it up.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Canon Cahill and Father Power never did anything of the kind.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: By their conduct they had exposed their religion to scorn and obloquy. I believe that I have proved that the action of the Irish Executive is imperatively demanded to protect innocent people in the exercise of their rights as subjects of the Queen, and that the action of the Executive has been exercised in the interests of, and not against, real freedom. Why have I put my Amendment on the Paper? It would have been open to the House to negative the Resolution of the right hon. Member for Newcastle as it has negatived many of his Resolutions already; but I thought that the time had come for a different course of action, and that the House ought to make an actual affirmation in support of the Irish Executive. I am not here to deny the legitimate right of combination. The Irish farmers have as good a right to combine to secure a reduction of their rents as English labourers have to combine to secure an increase of wages. The Irish farmers, as a matter of fact, enjoy an infinitely better position, because practically they are partners in a going concern; but, whatever their rights are, they are rights within the law, not outside it. What is the issue to-night? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle attacked the Irish Executive, but for what? For sending men to stand their trial, before a justly-constituted tribunal, for the offence of boycotting and conspiracy to promote the Plan of Campaign. What does the Resolution ask the House to do? To paralyse the arm of the law in its conflict with these evils, and to tie the hands of the Chief Secretary in this deadly encounter with the forces of disorder. Members of the Liberal Party may forget the history of that Party and its victories in the cause of freedom and of minorities. They may vote to-night against liberty because the liberty at stake is only that of a handful of boycotted citizens, but to them I do not appeal; I appeal to the House, and I ask the House not to forget the traditions of the English Parliament, and not to refuse for the first time to help those engaged in the struggle between law and lawlessness, between order and disorder.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all the words after the word "proceedings," in line 3, in order to insert the words "has been rendered imperative by the existence and activity of an illegal conspiracy directed against the civil rights of a large section of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland who have been subjected to cruel persecution and great loss in following their lawful callings, and this House rejoices in the successful vindication of the Law at Tipperary and elsewhere, which has gone far to restore freedom to the individual in every part of Ireland,"—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

—instead thereof.

(6.54.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Mr. Speaker, as no Member of the Government has risen to address the House, I am anxious not to lose a moment after the speech of the hon. Member behind me in calling the attention of the House to the peculiar position in which it has been placed. It is a peculiar, and, as far as I know, an unexampled position. A Motion has been made of the gravest character. My right hon. Friend, who himself has held Cabinet Office in connection with the Government of Ireland, brings forward against Her Majesty's Government, and of course against the Secretary for Ireland in particular, a series of charges of at once the most formidable and the most definite character. The hon. Member behind me, acting either at the suggestion of the Government or with its evident approval, endeavours by an Amendment of which he gives notice entirely to prevent the discussion of the Motion of my right hon. Friend. [Mr. T. W. RUSSELL indicated dissent.] The hon. Member shakes his head, but I do not appeal to him for assent, but to the language of his Amendment, and I will support that appeal to the language of his Amendment by reference to the character of his speech. It is true, is it not, that the head and front of the speech of my right hon. Friend was the advancing of certain charges against Her Majesty's Government in regard to a particular set of proceedings in Ireland? It is true also that the Amendment which has been proposed sets aside entirely the whole subject of those charges, and it is true that the hon. Gentleman in the lengthened speech which he has delivered has not said one single word in relation to the accusations of my right hon. Friend. What I contend is this: that we are entitled to a discussion of those charges. Am I giving an untrue description of the speech of the hon. Member? What did it consist of? With his usual ability and his usual decision he made attacks upon the Nationalist Members from Ireland and upon certain Roman Catholic priests; he contended that the Plan of Campaign in general, and in particular as it had been exhibited at Tipperary, was illegal and was pernicious. [Ministerial cheers.] Just so; pray observe that this is entirely in support of my allegation. He contended that my right hon. Friend near me ought to have made inquiry into the origin of the difficulties of Tipperary instead of doing what he has done to-night. He said that he would find fault with the speech of my right hon. Friend for its omissions, and then he proceeded to descant upon certain portions of the proceedings in Tipperary which have not been touched by my right hon. Friend. And why were they not touched by him? I should be surprised if the same motive which governed my right hon. Friend did not occur to the acute mind of the hon. Member. My right hon. Friend refrained from touching upon these subjects because they are subjects which are still liable to become matters of judicial consideration.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg pardon; the whole case is sub judice.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: But the question is not whether my right hon. Friend was right in the matters which he omitted; the question is, was he right in the matters which he adduced? This is the first time in my recollection that when, by a gentleman occupying a position like that of my right hon. Friend, grave charges are brought against the Government, countenance is given by them to an Amendment which completely shifts the issue and evades a contest in which apparently they do not wish to engage. With respect to the Plan of Campaign, it is a most fit subject for discussion in the House. With respect to other matters the hon. Member has mentioned, he may be perfectly justified in bringing them forward; but he is not justified in bringing them forward for the purposes of giving the go-by to the Motion of my right hon. Friend, and preventing the discussion of a legitimate and constitutional Motion. What were the charges brought by my right hon.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

Friend? They bear upon most important questions connected with the rights of the subject in Ireland. It is necessary I should refer to them, after the deliberate attempt that has been made to shut them out from the view of the House. The first of these charges was that the act of cheering and booing was treated by the officers of the Executive Government, when it occurred alone, without any illegal or violent act, as justifying the use of violence and force against the people who indulged in it. Is that so, or is it not? The issue is not whether the matters introduced by the hon. Member in the Amendment are right or not; the issue is whether my right hon. Friend's Motion, which has been brought legitimately and in due form before the House, and the arguments by which it was supported are just? That they are has often been denied with indignation; and now we shall hear what is to be said on the other side when it pleases Her Majesty's Government to condescend to put up one of its Members to enter into these grave matters. The next of these charges is one of a still more grave character. It is that the people were shut out from the statutory right of entering a Court of Justice by the arbitrary action of Colonel Caddell. Is that a serious matter, or is it not? Do not tell me that he was acting under the orders of the Chief Secretary; that may be perfectly true; but his conduct has been adopted and justified by Her Majesty's Government; they have identified themselves with his proceedings. The hon. Member has referred to something in the nature of a disturbance which took place in Tipperary; but that was not at the time to which my right hon. Friend referred. The movement of the limited number of people whom he called a crowd—of course, you may apply that term to 50 or 100, and I believe 100 was the estimate of Colonel Caddell—towards the door of the Court-house was an orderly movement—a movement of pressure, of course—but a movement the character of which the hon. Gentleman has avoided the discussion of by referring to what took place among other people at a totally different time and in connection with totally different circumstances. Is that question—the access of the people of this country to the proceedings in a Court of Justice—a serious matter, or is it not? What amount of violence on the part of the people could justify their being excluded? The hon. Gentleman said that Colonel Caddell was bound to have regard to the capacity of the Court and the number of the people. Yes, Sir; but that was no argument for excluding them all. But when Colonel Caddell, apparently changing his mind, admitted them all, we have it on the evidence of my right hon. Friend, I think, delivered on a former occasion, that the number was not sufficient to fill the Court. Then we have the story of the explosives. The hon. Member justifies the exclusion of an orderly crowd, behaving legally, from an open Court of Justice by referring to the case in which a man was tried for throwing an explosive upon a former occasion, and, being tried, was found guilty.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I never referred to the case in connection with the hearing at Tipperary.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I beg pardon; I was going to give the hon. Gentleman some credit. I was going to say it was the only reference of a tangible and intelligible kind. My right hon. Friend had pointed out that Colonel Caddell justified this arbitrary exclusion of the people from the Court-house by the allegation that they were the sort of people who might make use of explosives. When the hon. Gentleman used the word “explosives,” why did he introduce it except in direct connection with the previous speech of my right hon. Friend? Are we to be told that because in a crowd somebody or other may use explosives, that crowd exhibiting at the time legal and peaceful behaviour, therefore it is in the power of an Executive officer, protected by Her Majesty’s Government and by a majority of this House—is it to be in the power of a majority of this House to defeat the exercise of the statutory right of the people to have free access to a Court of Justice? What was the second charge of my right hon. Friend? I now refer to another proceeding, which, if it had occurred elsewhere, would shock the public mind and conscience. When charges were made against the police the Bench was packed with Resident Magistrates. Five Resident Magistrates, contrary to custom and to propriety—and, in the absence of precedent, I should be disposed to say contrary to decency—were brought together in a manner quite unusual to form a majority, as we are told, of the tribunal that was to try the charges against the police, these Resident Magistrates themselves being officers of the police and members of the body whose conduct was impugned. Is that a proceeding which will be approved by a majority of this House? It may be so; but whether it is to be affirmed or not, we have the right to demand that it be discussed when it is properly introduced into this House, and for that discussion I now plead and press. My right hon. Friend further said that the counter-charges of riot were brought under the Coercion Act. By being brought under that Act they could be summarily dealt with, while under the ordinary law they would have gone before a jury. What we complain of is that it appears to be the practice of the Government to bring everything that can possibly be drawn into it into the net of the Coercion Act? Why were not these charges to go before a jury? It was not because juries are not trustworthy, because the hon. Gentleman has told us, with creditable exultation, that during the late Winter Assizes in Ireland there was not a single jury in the country that failed to do its duty. Therefore, this is a charge against the Executive Government in Ireland which deserves to be met and discussed—that they by preference try under the Coercion Act accusations which, under the ordinary law, are tried in a different form; and the natural inference is that their action is animated by hatred of juries in Ireland, and, therefore, they resort to the summary jurisdiction of persons depending upon themselves. The charge is one that can be dealt with properly only by the Chief Secretary. He is in the habit of meeting the allegations of Irish Representatives by accepting wholesale the statements he receives from officials in Ireland. I admit it is his duty to set out with a disposition to accept what they tell him; but it is a very serious matter indeed to apply that principle, without sifting and inquiry, to allegations made by Members of this House and by an ex-Minister of the Crown, eye-witnesses of the facts, and such conduct is not likely to commend itself to the people of England and

Scotland. My right hon. Friend stakes his honour, his capacity, his precision upon what he says in his place in the House of Commons; and it is a novelty in our administration that because Colonel Caddell, or some other police officer, has given a different account, that is to be accepted as being true, and my right hon. Friend's declarations are to be treated as null and void. The hon. Member for South Tyrone did make one other reference to the speech of my right hon. Friend; he said he had made some definite statements, and there were other witnesses who had made other statements in newspapers quite incompatible with his; but the hon. Member went on to say he would not quote the evidence. I never heard a more futile remark than that the evidence of other witnesses was in conflict with the statement of my right hon. Friend, because he did not adduce a single rag or shred of evidence contradicting my right hon. Friend. It is strictly true; no contradiction whatever has been given to my right hon. Friend; and it was exceedingly indecorous of the Chief Secretary to charge my right hon. Friend, as it appears he did, with deliberate suppression, with garbling, with casuistry, and with misrepresentation. The right hon. Gentleman should be called upon to defend these statements in this House. With regard to the treatment of the subjects of the Queen in regard to access to the Court-house, and in relation to the right of public meeting, it is very important to remember that this is not the first time that Her Majesty's Government have been charged with invading and practically endeavouring to nullify and destroy the rights of public meeting. In a manner the most temperate and careful, the Member for East Mayo, during the last Session of Parliament, referred to three points, with respect to which he was a personal witness, in the treatment of public meetings in Ireland, and he put three distinct and definite questions to the Government with regard to them. One of those questions was, whether it was right or wrong that public meetings should be dispersed by charges of the constabulary without any previous notice or the commission of violence by those attending the meetings? The second was, whether it was right or wrong that in a place where there was a public meeting a group of gentlemen totally distinct from that public meeting should be made the subject of an order to the police to charge them and break up the group by violence? And the third was whether, after a meeting had been violently and illegally charged by the police acting under the orders of the Government, the persons constituting the meeting, while dispersing themselves in every direction, should be pursued by the police and punished with blows, after having committed no act of violence whatever, and while they were fugitives. These questions, when put formally by the Member for East Mayo, I endeavoured to press home; and I contend that in not one of them were we able to extract an answer from the Government, and therefore we must believe that these three forms of action are regarded by them as lawful and proper, and such as they intend to employ in carrying on the government of Ireland. Whether the hon. Member for South Tyrone is right or wrong in defending the proceedings in Tipperary—upon which I give no opinion—the rights of the people with regard to the proceedings in the Courts of Justice and public meetings are proper matter for discussion in this House, and it is our business to do our best to maintain and defend them. These matters, it appears to me, are serious enough, but that is not all. Here, again, we raise very fairly the question of trial by jury. My right hon. Friend contended that the proceedings taken by the right hon. Gentleman against the Member for East Mayo and several other parties were analogous in their legal character and scope to the proceedings taken by the Government with which I was associated in 1880 against the Member for Cork and others. We never dreamt at that time of bringing the Member for Cork within the sweep of summary jurisdiction; and it appears to me a matter of the gravest public mischief that questions of such difficulty should be habitually referred by the present Executive of Ireland to the lowest class of judicial officers without any extended legal knowledge, and generally wholly dependent on the right hon. Gentleman for the tenure of their offices, for promotion, and for the selection of duties. My right hon. Friend's charge against the Government is that here, again, we find a disposition to shut out, wherever it can, the action of the jury, which we know to be invaluable for the protection of the subject. And now I come to the last of the charges of my right hon. Friend, which, by the way, was not noticed, or hardly noticed, by the hon. Gentleman behind me. It was partially noticed by the hon. Gentleman, but he passed by the gravamen of the charge; he kept out of view the point to which my right hon. Friend addressed his censure. The broad statement is that the Chief Secretary for Ireland selected Mr. Irwin and Mr. Shannon for the trial of the case of the Member for East Mayo and others. The hon. Member entered into a defence of Mr. Irwin, and said that no judgment of Mr. Irwin under the Coercion Act had ever been reversed. I am very glad of that. I am not going to say a word against Mr. Irwin, and not a syllable was said against him by my right hon. Friend. Then the hon. Gentleman set forth in a moving manner the merits of Mr. Shannon. But the charge of my right hon. Friend was not against Mr. Shannon but against the Government for choosing him. I believe I heard the hon. Gentleman say that Mr. Shannon was unwilling to accept the office. I should be glad if that were so, but I confess it is very difficult to conceive how a man who holds a judicial as well as an executive office could enter into the trial of a case such as that against the Member for East Mayo. The charge distinctly lies against Her Majesty's Government that they selected out of the usual course for this particular purpose a gentleman with whom the Member for East Mayo had been a short time before engaged in sharp personal altercation. The gravamen of the charge is that there was absolutely no indisposition on the part of the Government to appoint a person whose appointment could not be viewed favourably with regard to the general administration of justice in Ireland. It would not be too much to say that it was an act essentially unfair in regard to the administration of justice to appoint such a person. In the course of time, notwithstanding the well-meant endeavour of the hon. Member to shut out these questions, I hope we shall hear what Her Majesty's Government have to say upon each and all of them. The hon. Member based the strength of his case upon the success of Her Majesty's Government. I do not think I should be doing justice to my right hon. Friend and the important allegations he has made against the Government were I to enter at large upon that question. The hon. Gentleman thinks it is a matter for immense congratulation that there were only 500 and odd proceedings under the Coercion Act.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Compared with another year.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: He thinks he mends the matter by showing that those who were content with this 500 and odd, two or three years ago, instituted 1,500 proceedings. What a great proof of success! One thing I must note—there has been a success; there has been a compulsory exclusion from this House of two of the ablest and most honourable of the Irish Members at a period when undoubtedly it will be felt that their country stood in special need of their services. That, I suppose, is held to be a great, a noble, and a superlative stroke—the closing of the prison-doors upon the Member for East Mayo and the Member for North-East Cork, and if the hon. Member had limited his Amendment to commending the ingenuity with which that had been arranged there might have been something to say for the argument. With respect to the general purposes of the right hon. Gentleman—and I refer to him not individually, but as a Member of the Government—for the Government are of course responsible for these proceedings, the whole of the Government are identified with the proceedings of the right hon. Gentleman—with regard to the right hon. Gentleman's general purposes, for my part I do not see the signs of the success that is alleged. The purpose of the Coercion Act, as we were told, was to put an end to agrarian combinations. The success of those agrarian combinations depends entirely upon whether the farms from which the tenants have been evicted are occupied by responsible tenants or not. It is quite evident that for four years it has been in the power of the Government, if there were this success, to prove it to us by the production of Returns which they could produce with far greater ease, certainty, and credit than those elastic Returns with regard to the number of boycotted persons, into the composition of which individual preferences might largely enter. All particulars have been carefully avoided by the Government on the subject, and the only conclusion at which we can arrive is that these farms are either entirely derelict, with possibly an exception here and there, or else simply used for pasturage. Her Majesty's Government will, no doubt, be remembered in Ireland; but they will be remembered, in my opinion, for causes that are not desirable. They have done their best to aggravate the sentiments of jealousy, mistrust, and even hatred, which in former times have existed in Ireland, and which it has been our desire for many years past to mitigate and subdue. They have placed Resident Magistrates and the Constabulary in an attitude, as towards the Irish people, more unfortunate with respect to the permanent strength and administration of justice than they have ever occupied before. In the year 1835, when Lieutenant Drummond became Permanent Under-Secretary for Ireland, the Resident Magistrates and the Constabulary were institutions which had the confidence of the people, and were regarded as affording the people security for justice which they had never before enjoyed. I do not think the most sanguine man on the opposite side of the House or on the Treasury Bench will allege that any such thing can now be said of the Resident Magistrates. And what I fear is this: that whereas I do not doubt that the vast majority of the Magistrates have been labouring, perhaps under difficult circumstances, to thoroughly discharge their duty, the proceedings of a few so outrageous, so remarkable, and so at variance with all the principles both of law and of justice, cast, unfortunately, discredit upon the whole, and the efficiency of that form of Magistracy has been most gravely compromised. And so with regard to the Constabulary. The Constabulary are themselves drawn, in the strictest sense, from the people of Ireland. They are a Force that have done great service for Ireland; their duties have often been painful; but if in the discharge of those duties they find that a reckless, an unscrupulous approval is given not only to rashness, but to positive illegality, against the people, it is absolutely impossible but that the spirit which flourishes at headquarters should distil itself also into some members of that Force, and that the proceedings of the Force itself should be more or less compromised in consequence of the anti-popular, and, I may say, anti-legal spirit which governs the instructions proceeding from the Government. No, Sir; in my opinion these are most unfortunate results. And there is another result which has been produced by the action of the Government, which I do not think the hon. Gentlemen behind me will quote as a proof of their success. The last three or four years has been the first time within my recollection when not Irish only, but British opinion, has regarded with comparative favour infractions of the law in Ireland—infractions, that is to say, of the Coercion Act. For the first time by your policy you have forced—I will not say the whole British people, but a great portion of the British people—into what we feel to be a false position with regard to resistance to the law. It is a deplorable fact when any resistance or infraction of the law is looked upon with toleration and applause; but if you chose to pass laws which are in violation of reason and decency, you cannot help feeling this: that whatever doubt or discredit may attach to the infractions of those laws, far greater blame attaches to the makers of them, and to those who, administering them in Ireland, endeavour to aggravate their spirit and to make their operation still more severe than of necessity it would be to the people of the country. That is what Her Majesty's Government has brought about. It is easy to exalt it in this House. There is a phalanx diminishing—and pretty steadily diminishing—but still numerically superior, who, no doubt, will rally to the call of the hon. Member to-night; and this Parliament will distinguish itself by passing a Vote of Confidence in itself, by inscribing on its Journals a glowing eulogy on the legislation it has adopted, upon the truly congenial spirit in which that legislation has been carried out in Ireland. Within these walls that may be a very easy, a very comfortable, a very satisfactory proceeding. But,

Sir, it is not so beyond these walls. You must, yourselves, have become conscious that these commendations on your conduct in Ireland are gradually more and more estranging from you the support of the people. Election after election testifies to that. You have before you a term rapidly expiring, rapidly drawing to its close. Of that term you may make use. You may please yourselves with the cheers that reward every effusion of the hon. Member for South Tyrone against the Nationalists of Ireland. That may be, so far as it goes, agreeable and satisfactory, but it cannot avert the coming doom. It cannot avert the ever-growing evidence of the fact that the people of this country are not only inclined but determined that their fellow-subjects in Ireland shall in every respect and particular enjoy the same precious, imperishable, invaluable liberties as they themselves enjoy.

*(7.40.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I should not have risen but for the observations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman at the opening of his speech. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the position in which the House is placed, and commented on the fact that the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, which involves a Vote of Censure on the Government, has been met by an Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Tyrone. The right hon. Gentleman, who has had great experience of the business of this House, must surely be aware that this is not the first time in the history of this House that a Resolution of Want of Confidence has been met by an Amendment moved by a private Member. Both the Resolution and the Amendment are now before the House, and the right hon. Member for Newcastle, in supporting his Resolution, has made singular charges, not only against Her Majesty's Government, but also against those who are entrusted with the administration of the law in Ireland and the police, who, in the exercise of their ordinary duty, carried it out. He has spoken of the proceedings of these persons as outrageous and unscrupulous. I must say that no language has ever been used in this House which is more reckless, or more unscrupulous, or more dangerous to the system of government than that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. The right hon. Gentleman goes on to charge Her Majesty's Government with an approval of illegality. Well, we are prepared to stand our trial upon that charge before this House and before the country, and I can only say that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will not fail to grapple with the charges that have been brought against him—he is not the man to fail to do so. Complaint has been made that my right hon. Friend did not rise at once to reply to the right hon. Member for Newcastle, but I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman opposite is not the one who would make such a complaint as that. My right hon. Friend is the person against whom these charges have been principally brought, although undoubtedly Her Majesty's Government is equally responsible with my right hon. Friend for the policy he has pursued, and it is only fair and right that he should wait until a somewhat advanced period of the Debate, in order that he may ascertain what are the whole of the charges that are to be brought against him before he replies to them. The right hon. Member has referred to the unfortunate exclusion of two hon. Members from this House. I cannot help reminding the House that if those two hon. Members had thought fit to remain in Ireland, instead of going elsewhere, a large portion of the sentence which they are now undergoing would have been passed. The right hon. Gentleman, in an eloquent peroration, expressed the confident hope that the time will come when the people of Ireland will enjoy the same rights and the same liberty as the people of this country now enjoy. There is not a man sitting on this side of the House, there is not a Member of Her Majesty's Government who does not entertain that same hope that the time will soon come when freedom will be restored to every individual in Ireland, when the powers of the boycotter, the intimidator, and the agitator will cease to be exercised, and when every man will go his own way, and when the same absolute personal security will prevail there as in England and Scotland. Utter destruction will attend any Political Party which neglects to secure for every individual in the Empire that perfect freedom and that perfect liberty which we claim on behalf of the boycotted tenants of Tipperary.

(7.49.) Mr. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Let me remind the First Lord of the Treasury that when a popular Government rises up, a Government having the interest of the Irish people at heart and responsible to the people, the hardest part of the Government's task will be to bring the people into harmony with the law and teach them that the law is their protector and not their enemy and oppressor, as it has been under the present Administration. We shall endeavour to counteract the evil work of this Government, whereby law has been made a simple machine for the exaction of rent. There are only two questions I shall bring before the attention of the House; the first relates to the method of selecting the Resident Magistrates, and the second to the objects and motives by which the Government are animated. There are 72 Resident Magistrates to select from. If it had been the object of the Government to select Magistrates who were notorious for their dependence on the Executive, the right hon. Gentleman would have had a very wide choice indeed. He could have selected such persons as Colonel Forbes, who is up to the very eyes in debt, or as Mr. M'Sheehy, whose name appears time after time in the "black list" as a defaulter and debtor. He did not select these men because, however well qualified they might have been to try their political opponents, they wanted one qualification which the men Irwin and Shannon undoubtedly had. The necessary qualification in a case in which the great bulk of the Crown's evidence was the evidence of policemen was that the two Magistrates should both of them be ex-police officers. Let us see how matters stand in a constitutional and legal aspect. My right hon. Friend the Attorney-General for Ireland knows very well that the most precious privilege a prisoner can have is the right of challenging his jury. We must remember that in this case Messrs. Shannon and Irwin were both jurors and judges. Now, what were the feelings of the three defendants, who were Members of this House, in reference to the impartiality of the tribunal by which they were tried? This is what Mr. Dillon said in Court on the 25th of December:—

"I am here, and I want to say I have a strong personal objection to being tried by one of the Magistrates now sitting on the Bench. Mr. Shannon, when I last met him, was a police officer in charge of a large force of police—within the last six months, within the period covered by charges which I am to be tried for. On the occasion to which I refer I had an altercation with him in the streets of Cashel, in which I was grossly insulted by him as I consider, and I daresay he thinks I probably said some hard things to him. At all events, it is nothing short of indecent for a man who has acted as a police officer in the course of the period during which these charges are going to be made, and has mouthed me personally—or, at all events, has had an encounter with me in the streets of Cashel—that he should now sit in judgment on the Bench. I protest against it."

Mr. William O'Brien said—

"The last time I saw Mr. Shannon he was at the head of a mob of policemen, who were striking and beating the people on an occasion in reference to which I presume evidence will be offered on this prosecution. With reference to the other member of the Court also, I have to point out that this is the third time in different and distant parts of the country that Mr. Irwin has been selected as my Judge; and I would submit to himself whether there is not a certain amount of inconvenience, not to say indecency, in his turning up as my Judge, north, south, east, and west, as if there was no other Judge."

Mr. Patrick O'Brien said—

"I appear here on my own behalf, and I object to being tried by Mr. Shannon, who when I last saw him was acting as a policeman in Cashel. I suppose the incidents that occurred in Cashel that day will be put in evidence against me. Mr. Shannon says he acted as an Executive officer on that day; but I want to know where the policeman ends and the justice begins? My own experience is that the policeman we have always with us—he never disappears in the justice."

Then Mr. O'Brien again said—

"My experience is that the Magistrate never appears. When Mr. William O'Brien and myself were escorted by the Hussars into Cashel that day Mr. Shannon shouted out, 'Well done, Bruen! We have knocked the devil out of them here to-day!'"

The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) forgot to mention, when he was referring to Mr. Shannon, that that gentleman's brother is Shannon, the notorious agent of the Times, who went into a prison and suborned false evidence. If the trial at Tipperary had been an ordinary case at Common Law not only would my hon. Friends have challenged both Mr. Shannon and Mr. Irwin peremptorily, but they would have challenged them for cause shown. Any prisoner can challenge a juror for cause when he is in the pay or under the power of another person. Both these Magistrates were in the pay and under the power of the right hon. Gentleman; both of them had been up to the Castle and been entertained by the right hon. Gentleman, and both had been conciliated, as every Resident Magistrate is, especially on the eve of any political case of importance. It is a good cause of challenge if a juror has expressed love or hatred of either party in a case. These proceedings aroused at the time a great deal of attention in England, and a young English gentleman wrote to the papers in reference to what was going on. He says—

"Hitherto I have been a strong Conservative; but I protest against the monstrous state of things in vogue in this unhappy isle."

I cannot go through the whole of the letter; but I will take one part, will read one extract, which makes a specific charge against one of these Magistrates, Mr. Shannon or Mr. Irwin, and there has been ample opportunity of rebutting the charge. The writer says—

"We travelled from Mallow to Killarney with one of them (the Removables), and I must say I never in my life spent an hour with a greater or more intolerant bigot. I will give you a specimen of what he said. We were talking about Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, and Mr. O'Brien, and my father ventured the remark that since he had been in Ireland he had considerably modified his opinion of these men, and he now thought them to be honest patriots. 'Honest patriots!' roared this man. 'Dishonest, damned rogues they are, sir, and I don't care what you say, but if I had my way I'd hang up the whole lot of them.' This, sir, is one of the men that, according to the papers, is to try John Dillon and William O'Brien. I should not, therefore, like to give my opinion of the kind of trial these men will get next Thursday at Tipperary."

Now, I imagine, inasmuch as it was Mr. Shannon who used the expression at Cashel, "Well done, Bruen! we've knocked hell out of them here to-day," the language quoted from the letter appears characteristic of that gentleman. May I again mention, in this connection, a circumstance to which I have before referred in this House—that the police drafted from Waterford and placed under Mr. Shannon's orders had numbers on their uniforms when they left Waterford, but those numbers were deliberately removed, so that the men might have a free hand in carrying out Mr. Shannon's violent orders against the people? Confining myself still to the constitution of this tribunal, I will give the opinion of a gentleman whose views probably differ from mine upon this question of packing the Bench. Let us look how the Magistrates in England regard the conduct of Magistrates in Ireland. Here is how a gentleman writing on October 2nd from Elsworth Terrace, London, and who signs himself M. Kearney, expresses himself—

"I am a Magistrate of the County of Durham of 30 years' standing, for 27 of which I was Chairman of a large Petty Sessional Division. I was High Sheriff of that county in 1881. I do not put forward my antecedents from vanity, but to give some weight to my experience as to the delicacy which the Magistrates of England exercise in their administration of justice. During that long period I never knew an instance where a Magistrate who had expressed an opinion regarding the complainant or defendant, or was directly or indirectly interested in the case, sat upon the Bench either at Petty or Quarter Sessions. It seems to me, therefore, positively indecent and ungentlemanly that so prominent a partisan as Mr. Shannon should act as Magistrate and Judge in the trial of Messrs. O'Brien and Dillon in Tipperary."

But here we find that in Ireland of the whole Bench these two men are selected for packing purposes! We have heard the right hon. Gentleman make a boast that if he were an Irish landlord he would rather beg his bread than yield to the Plan of Campaign. From a gentleman of his sensitive feelings I should have thought he would have made the prouder boast that he would rather reduce himself to that necessitous condition than pack a tribunal against his colleagues in this House. He takes, however, a different view on these matters. Now, turn we for a moment to the opinion of Liberal Unionists. I appeal to the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney). He is a man who I am sure will give a conscientious vote. He was in Ireland last autumn, and I met him there casually, and though his tour had no connection with these matters he had the conscientious desire to do his best towards the alleviation of distress, and naturally when he went among his constituents he was invited to give the impression made upon his mind by his visit to Ireland. Speaking at Torpoint, on October 29, he declared himself dead against Home Rule, and honestly I have no doubt. Then he said a little upon the land question, and then he referred to the Tipperary trials.

"All parties," he said, "should co-operate for the purpose of making the Government Bill a thorough measure. One great obstacle had been raised by the unwise step taken by the Government in prosecuting Messrs. O'Brien and Dillon. There might have been ample warrant for instituting proceedings, but it was, in his opinion, most inexpedient, and he strongly advised the Government to stop the case."

Now, what have organs of Liberal Unionist opinion said? Here is what the Echo said on October 1st—

"All the circumstances of the trial are unfortunate, but especially so the selection of the Resident Magistrates who are trying the case."

Therefore, you see your Liberal Unionist friends are against you. More than that, even the Tory Party in Ireland were against the prosecutions. The Dublin Daily Express is recognised as the ably conducted organ of the Party, and its London Correspondent is particularly well informed. This is what that London Correspondent wrote on November 1st—

"Everywhere I hear it said that it was a lamentable mistake to place on the Bench the Magistrates, or one at all events, who was open even to the shadow of a suspicion that he had had previous conflicts with the accused. The English regard that as an outrage, and when I say English I mean not one party but several among them. There is nothing like truth, and I confess I am impressed by what I hear day after day, week after week, upon this point. What really arrests attention is the judicial performance in Tipperary Court-house, and after much patience the feeling here seems to be that the sooner it is ended the better. If, indeed, full expression were given to Conservative and Unionist feeling much stronger language might be used."

Mr. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): What is the date of that?

Mr. MAC NEILL: I know the date is important, for such views change rapidly.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Not mine.

Mr. MAC NEILL: I do not mean the views of the hon. Gentleman. The date is November 1st. Now, it is useful sometimes to hear the views of foreign critics. A French newspaper, the Siecle, commenting upon the "odious and ridiculous spectacle" of a Judge following the culprit about, says—

"Mr. Irwin may now emblazon on his visiting cards 'Judge attached to the person of Mr. William O'Brien,'" and the article declares the whole thing

Mr. Mac Neill

"An outrage upon common sense and common law."

The Russian officials declare that the Chief Secretary has beaten them. Bad as the Russian system is, the Irish system, especially the Tipperary prosecution, is worse. The fame of the Chief Secretary has reached Odessa. A Russian official there said—

"England is a country of free institutions and equal liberty. We have always looked upon it as such heretofore, but your present method of ruling Irishmen is a dis-illusion to a large section of liberal and patriotic Russians who have watched, admired, and envied your ever-expanding freedom and independence."

If the Chief Secretary wishes to imitate Lord Strafford, so far he has succeeded. But what does the Cabinet think of his performances? Can right hon. Gentlemen say that the actions of Mr. Dillon and Mr. O'Brien are those of ordinary criminals engaged in an ordinary criminal conspiracy? Can the Government say that, when they know that it would have been useless to make any attempt to extradite those gentlemen? No, there is no independent Government in either hemisphere which would regard my hon. Friends as having committed anything but a political offence. Only one point more. What was the motive of the prosecutors? It was to stop by these judicial proceedings the visit of Mr. Dillon and Mr. O'Brien to America, where they hoped to collect funds for the assistance of evicted Irish tenants. The Times called attention to this, then there was a long letter from the hon. Member for South Tyrone on September 15th, and two days afterwards my hon. Friends were arrested and prosecutions were instituted. The well-informed London correspondent of the Irish Times pointed to the connection between the arrests and the contemplated American tour, and said that in Unionist circles the arrests were regarded as a clever stroke of strategy. This is a fair specimen of English administration in Ireland, a fair specimen of the manner in which the name of justice is regarded, with an absence of proper feeling or of humanity. The administration of the law in Ireland has been brought into contempt. I end as I began by saying that, anticipating that in the near future the Government of Ireland will be carried on in accordance with national aspirations, I know no more difficult task than that of having to wean the people from the distrust of the law enjendered by long misrule, and to make them under an enlightened régime regard the law as alike for the probation of all classes and sections. (8.15.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(8.50.) MR. A. CAMERON CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston): As I went to Tipperary immediately after the visit of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle and heard the action brought by the hon. Member for Mid Tipperary and his friends against the constabulary, I had a good opportunity of judging as to the merits of the case. As there have been many conflicting statements between Colonel Caddell and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, I wish merely to say that those who have come personally into contact with Colonel Caddell and have discussed the subject with him must feel that he is no mean authority on matters of fact. It would be impossible to meet any one who could give you a stronger impression of an impartial and fair mind and of reluctance to use force than Colonel Caddell. When complaints are made against the Magistrates it will guide you in coming to a conclusion if you ask yourselves whether or not the individuals making complaints were eager to have the cases fully investigated, and whether the Magistrates or the mob have the most interest in securing the maintenance of order. Before the case came on at Tipperary I knew that the prosecutors had no case, and my chief object in listening at the trial was to see by what adroit and dexterous means the prosecutors would prevent the case from being fully heard and investigated. The Member for Mid Tipperary and his friends put in their appearance in the Court 20 minutes after the time fixed for the hearing of their own case. They next tried to break down the case by every form of insult to the presiding Magistrate, who responded to all their attacks and defended himself with a patient courtesy which would not be shown under similar circumstances by any Bench in Scotland or England. The prosecutors next attempted to break down the case by endeavouring to limit the cross-examination of the witnesses by the counsel for the constabulary within impossible limits; and then, finally, the hon. Member, who was counsel for the prosecutors, threw up his brief because he was not allowed to enter into a long examination with regard to certain photographs, the Magistrate alleging that the photographs had been taken so long before that they were not relevant to the case. It may be that the Magistrate made a slip in offering to allow the photographs themselves to be put in; but when a great deal is made of photographs and you are sceptical as to whether they have ever been taken at all it is perhaps not unnatural to challenge those who say they have been taken to hand them in. The right hon. Member for Newcastle made a great deal of the fact that he had twice visited the Court-house, and that on both occasions, while the people were being kept out, the portion of the building reserved for the public was almost empty. The right hon. Gentleman omitted, however, to allude to Colonel Caddell's explanation that the reason why the Court-house was empty was because the people had gone out in order to see the row, and perhaps some of them to take part in it. Having reviewed the efforts made to evade investigation of their charges, I come to the question as to whose interest it was that disturbances should take place in Tipperary. Let us examine the position of the Magistrates. I had an opportunity of conversing with Magistrates in many parts of Ireland, and I found that every one of them regarded the peace and order and quiet in his district as the seal of his success. Each Magistrate regarded disturbances in his district with the greatest regret, and always spoke of them as mitigating the satisfaction he felt in the discharge of his Magisterial duties. You might just as well expect a business man to be proud of the failure of his commercial enterprises as to find a Resident Magistrate in Ireland, who does not regard the maintenance of peace and order as the seal of his success. Again, there is no reason to expect that the Constabulary would enjoy any conflict with the people.

The Constabulary come from the peasant class, and are so chosen as to represent the different proportions of religious opinions in Ireland. Moreover, they often belong to families the members of which hold the strongest views in favour of Home Rule. These men do not form a hostile army introduced into Ireland. They are, as I say, Irish peasants chiefly of the religious opinion prevailing in Ireland, men who have every reason to sympathise with the people and every interest in avoiding entering into conflict with them. Let us turn to the other side and see why there was that interest in promoting discord among those whose sentiments were represented at that Court. We have heard a quotation from the hon. Member who figured so strongly in the riots, disclosing his love for a scrimmage. One of the hon. Members brought to the prison that day ten days afterwards made a speech which was no less suggestive of that view. He said that the battlefield was the same as that of '98, and that it was well fixed among the matchless men of Tipperary. It seems to me that those who have deliberately fixed such a battlefield in Tipperary are responsible for any disturbance that may arise, and for the ruin brought about. As between the Magistrates on the one hand and those who have declared that they will make Government in Ireland impossible, I cannot conceive how anyone can think it probable that the conflict has been brought about by the former. To believe that any Magistrate would desire disorder, you must suppose him to be not only a wicked man, but a self-sacrificingly wicked man. As to the great conspiracy trial, there was exactly the same design on the part of Irish Nationalists to avoid judicial investigation. In that great trial, there were 28 charges sworn as to having occurred on 18 separate days. One of those bombs which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle referred to so lightly, was of such a character as to smash a lamp 30 yards away. The long list of outrages included the throwing of many bombs, firing at unpopular persons, and every form of outrage against person and property. Yet not a single man among the defendants brought one witness to rebut these charges. We are driven to one of two conclusions—

either that they knew no one of these charges could be rebutted, or else they feared that the witnesses under cross-examination would make such admissions as to shed the clearest light upon what was going on in Tipperary, and so let the British public see what terrible things were being done. In Tipperary we have had one of the most tremendous examples of the character of the Irish Nationalists—that is, their want of respect for, their want of toleration for, difference of opinion. Not only have you had these outrages directed against opponents of the Nationalists, but against Nationalists themselves. If a Nationalist shows that he thinks the other Nationalists are going too far, he at once is subjected to the assaults made in the name of the Nationalists' cause. In Tipperary one of these bombs was thrown against the premises of a well-known Nationalist merely because he held rather moderate views compared with those of other Nationalists. Therefore, the front of his shop was wrecked on the very night that the right hon. Gentleman visited the City of Tipperary. The same characteristic of intolerance was shown at Kilkenny, unanimity being there sought by resort to physical violence. There was no attempt to reason about the Nationalist views. The only uniformity they seek is that which is brought about by the reign of terror. Hon. Members have spoken about the desirability of substituting trial by jury for trial by Resident Magistrates—as if that would enlarge the liberty of the Irish people. It is true that the Resident Magistrates in Ireland have been attacked, but the Parnell Commission showed the people of this country that the most eminent and respected of English judges could not escape the objections levelled against the Irish Magistrates. Even the most impartial of English Judges did not satisfy Irishmen in a case in which they were interested. As to trial by jury, I ask you to consider the nature of the boycotting cases, and you will come to the conclusion that trial by jury is out of the question in such cases. Persons in Ireland have been boycotted for years because they had done that which in England or Scotland would not have brought them a shadow of unpopularity. In one instance a man took the farm of an absentee tenant who had been evicted. The previous tenant and his family had lived away from the farm and found occupation in a town some distance off. They ceased to pay rent, and the landlord took possession. The man who took possession of a farm which had been so left vacant would not in England or Scotland fall under the shadow of a shade of unpopularity. But what has been the case in Ireland? That man who took the farm has been rigidly boycotted; no one under the powers of the League will sell to him or buy from him; he is not allowed even to visit his widowed sister, who, if he should visit her, has been threatened with the boycott and all its severe penalties. Could anyone who listens to the tale of this man and all he has suffered offer him only the protection which is to be got from a local jury? I care not for my present purpose whether the man has been boycotted spontaneously by the people or under compulsion. If they have done so spontaneously, and so hate him that they treat him as a leper, then they are not fit to sit in judgment upon anyone who commits an outrage against him. If, on the other hand—which is far more probable—the great bulk of the neighbours of that man have no ill-will against him, but are coerced into boycotting him—[“Name!”]—Michael Ryan—then, I say, they would be open to similar coercion if they were empanelled on a jury. To offer a man as protection a jury which would be bound to acquit anyone who committed an outrage against him is really to declare that such a man is an outlaw, and no longer entitled to the protection of the law, which is the first right of every citizen of a civilised country. Michael Ryan, and men like him, are keeping the lamp of liberty burning in Ireland, and for the cause of political freedom and individual liberty we can do no greater service than by supporting the Amendment of my hon. Friend behind me. I, for one, shall have the greatest pleasure in recording my vote along with him, believing that the cause of political freedom and of individual liberty is the noblest cause to which a politician can devote himself.

(9.15.) SIR T. G. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I have followed this Debate with some attention, and the only defence of the Government's policy I have heard has proceeded from Members of the Liberal Unionist Party. Seeing that the policy of Her Majesty's Government is not such as to command the approval of the majority in England, these Gentlemen are doing the best they can to give this bad case a gloss in favour of Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member (Mr. C. Corbett) was very earnest in his defence of Colonel Caddell, a Gentleman with whom I have not the honour of being acquainted. I will not follow him into that defence. But the hon. Member then went on to charge the Irish Party with being responsible for the disturbances which occurred in Tipperary. That is precisely the point on which I join issue with them. We say that the disturbances at the Court-house in Tipperary on that day, were directly due to the action of the police. The police made an attack upon an inoffensive and defenceless crowd, who were endeavouring to gain entrance to the Court-house. The hon. Member for South Tyrone said that the Court-house could not hold any more. But we have the evidence of the people that it was almost empty. So far as I can gather from the statements made, and from the newspapers, and I believe it is the fact, on that occasion the police attacked the people without any orders from their superior officers. There were numbers of sympathisers with the hon. Members for Cork and East Mayo anxious to gain admission to the Court. Suddenly the police, without warning, attacked the people. They attacked them as they always do in Ireland, with the utmost savagery. They batoned these people with very great savagery, and they refused to return to their ranks when ordered by their officers, who seemed to have lost control over their men. When we are told that the attack by the police was harmless, I am reminded of one case, that of Keefe, a reporter, whose teeth were knocked down his throat by a baton blow. But suddenly the police discovered that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle was amongst the crowd, and the change in their demeanour was simply magical. They got back to their ranks, and they tried to appear as if that had been their desire all the time. This fact of their altered demeanour because an Englishman was present ought to be laid to heart by Irishmen, because it shows the different treatment which Englishmen and Irishmen receive at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. An Irishman need expect no proper treatment, no constitutional liberty or privileges; he is simply born to be batoned, shot, imprisoned, or hanged at the goodwill of those responsible for the maintenance of law and order in Ireland. On the whole, as an Irishman, I am not all sorry that this should be the case. I rather rejoice at these object lessons in the benefits we receive from English rule. I am reminded of what occurred to an English tourist in Ireland, who attended a public meeting that was dispersed by the police. This English tourist was batoned mercilessly. He went to his hotel, and next morning an officer of police waited upon him and made all sorts of apologies, imploring him to say nothing about the occurrence, and adding that he had been mistaken for an Irish Member, the result of which mistake was that the tourist's skull was almost cracked. These are object lessons in English rule. Then, mention has been made of bombs, or whatever the explosives were, of which use was made in the town of Tipperary. I was in the town of Tipperary on the very night when an explosive was fired against the house of a Nationalist. Being anxious to ascertain the amount of damage that had been done, I visited the place. I found that the plate glass window of Dr. O'Brien's house had been broken, but that the coloured bottles, such as are usually displayed by chemists, and which were immediately behind the broken window were uninjured. That fact indicates the measure of the force of the explosive that was used. Dr. O'Brien himself wrote that the damage only amounted to 4s. Coming to the case of my hon. Friends the Members for Cork and East Mayo, I am here to say that the crime for which they have gone to prison—if it be a crime at all—would be no crime in England or Scotland. If Her Majesty's Government attempted any proceedings of the sort in connection with the Cardiff strike, or some movement of the kind in London—if they tried here, as in Ireland, to strike at the right of combination, they would not remain very long on the Treasury Benches.

Sir T. G. Esmonde

This Debate shows the value we are to place on the assurances of the Government as to their anxiety to maintain peace and order in Ireland, and to induce the Irish people to pay proper respect to the law. If the law was broken in New Tipperary it was broken by the agents of the Government, and yet not one of them has been brought to book for his misdemeanours. We have not, however seen that the Government is anxious to vindicate the law when the offender is an Irish official, although steps are taken to that end when the offender is a Nationalist. We are told that the Irish people are disloyal, and have a rooted antipathy to obeying or respecting the law, but how can anyone obey or respect the law when it is administered as the law is administered in Ireland? If a man be a Nationalist, there is no law for him, but if he is on the side of the Government, in whatever he does the law will bear him harmless. No doubt it is hard on the Irish police to keep within the law in face of the incitements daily offered by those to whom they look as their leaders and commanders. They would be more than human were they to disregard those incitements to persecute the people and to defy the law. No Irish policeman gets promotion or gets marks unless he makes himself particularly obnoxious to those among whom he lives. It is those who make themselves most obnoxious who win the favour of the Government representatives. But if to some extent we absolve the police from responsibility for the disorder they create, we cannot absolve those who are really responsible to the Irish people and to this House for the maintenance of law and order in Ireland. If the Government really want peace and order they must begin by teaching their own officials to respect the law, but all they want to do is to maintain the pretence of disturbance and disorder so that they may have an excuse for endeavouring by coercive means to put down those who are endeavouring to obtain Home Rule for Ireland. They are endeavouring to make capital out of what has occurred in Tipperary. All we can do is to endeavour to expose their proceedings, and to bring home to the English people some knowledge of the sort of misgovernment which is carried on in the Sister Island, in the hope that the day is not far distant when those things will be altered, and we shall have as good Government in Ireland as now exists in England and Scotland. We can only advise our people in the face of the provocations offered by their rulers to keep their temper, but at the same time to assert their right to live as a free people in their own country, in the hope that in spite of all attempts at coercion or to upset the movement in favour of National Government, they will yet be able to obtain the control of their own Government and the administration of the affairs of their own country.

*(9.37.) MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): I have listened to the able speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down with a considerable degree of disappointment. We have been accustomed to much larger utterances from the Members below the Gangway. I had anticipated that the hon. Member would not only have covered the whole of the ground included in the Motion before the House, but that he would have travelled far beyond it, and brought under our notice every act of the last three years on which it is possible to found an indictment against Her Majesty's Government. But if we exclude the pious aspiration with which he concluded, namely, that Ireland may soon enjoy the Government on which his Party have set their hearts, we find that he has closely followed the example of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle in confining his attention to the action of the police in one small town during a period of three days only. If we compare this Debate upon a Vote of Censure with previous Debates of a like character in this House, and if we have regard to the larger scope of the former discussions, we must perceive that in attacking the Government our opponents have set themselves the task of firing at a constantly diminishing target. I allude, of course, not to numbers, but to actions for which the Government are responsible, and in which hon. Members opposite may consider the Government to have erred. And I am bound to say that the success which has attended their efforts in the past affords no explanation of these progressive steps in political marksmanship which they have set themselves to accomplish. No one has proceeded further in this direction than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who was not content with narrowing the issue in his own speech to the action of the police, but who found fault with the hon. Member for Tyrone for taking into consideration matters of graver import which were most certainly included in the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. He accused the hon. Member for Tyrone of shifting the issue from the natural sense of that Resolution, and he did so on grounds which filled us on this side of the House with amazement. The right hon. Gentleman said that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle excluded from his purview the trial for conspiracy because it was sub judice, and that he referred to the action of the police because it was not under review of the Courts of law. The House will learn with amazement that the very reverse is the case; the cases which have formed the sole topic of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, and almost the sole topic of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian are all sub judice, whereas the matters which have constituted almost the whole speech of the hon. Member for South Tyrone have all been concluded before Courts of Law in a sense which proves that the action of the Government has been right all through. But, apart from the impropriety of the time chosen for this attack, it is noteworthy that the attack on the Government has been made in respect of matters for which they are only indirectly responsible. The Government are responsible directly for the prosecutions, but only indirectly for the conduct of the Magistrates and police. They are, I admit, technically responsible also for that, and they do not shrink from the responsibility. My point is, that while the matter of their policy has passed unchallenged, they have been attacked for the manner in which their subordinates have carried out that policy in Tipperary. The chief accusations are that a certain Resident Magistrate, Colonel Caddell, handled the police in an unwise way at Tipperary, and that the police acted violently towards the people. The Government are also charged, and for this they are more directly responsible, with having selected Mr. Shannon to adjudicate in the trial at Tipperary. That is the sum total of the offences charged against the Government, and I think such a narrow field would not have been chosen by the Opposition if they had thought that there was a better chance of victory in attacking the Irish policy of the Government in its substance instead of the manner in which it has been carried out. With regard to the accusation that the Government have confused executive and judicial functions in the selection of Mr. Shannon, what are the facts? Mr. Shannon was sent for in May, and acted executively upon two days, the 25th and the 27th of May. He had never been at Tipperary before, and left after those two days, and did not return until the 10th of July, long before this prosecution was instituted. Why did Mr. Shannon return? He was sent for in order to effect the very purpose which the Government is now blamed for neglecting—in order to discriminate between judicial and executive functions. Mr. Shannon is a Magistrate well qualified to exercise judicial functions, and was selected for that purpose in order that Colonel Caddell, and other Resident Magistrates who have the management of the police, should not sit on the Bench in a case of this kind. Was that selection absurd? Who is Mr. Shannon? He is a barrister, and has had a distinguished University career; he won a classical scholarship at Dublin, took a double-first, was a Vice-Chancellor's prizeman, and secured the gold medal for rhetoric. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, in saying that Mr. Shannon had only eaten certain dinners, apparently forgot that he defended the police when the right hon. Gentleman was responsible for them in connection with the Belfast riots. The occurrences at Belfast afforded a striking contrast to the occurrences at Tipperary. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle said he was not responsible for the executive and judicial confusion at Belfast; that two Resident Magistrates merely continued to sit in the ordinary way with the Local Justices. But in the course of the Belfast riots no less than

29 Resident Magistrates were drafted into Belfast, and sat with 60 Local Magistrates to adjudicate on the matters brought before them. They sat in rotation, and no attempt was made to prevent them from judging men whom they had arrested in the streets. I have endeavoured to defend the Government upon the merits of this selection, but really there is no need for the Government to be defended in this House for selecting Mr. Shannon to adjudicate at these trials. The matter has already been decided by a much more competent tribunal. All these charges brought against the Government were threshed out in a Court of Law before Mr. Justice Holmes, who stated that, having gone through all the facts, he had come to the conclusion that there was nothing to show that Mr. Shannon was disqualified to sit. Again, those who were tried by Mr. Shannon had an appeal, and if they disliked the tribunal by which they were convicted, why did they not seek another? It certainly seems a little hard that the Government should be censured for selecting a tribunal of which the defendants, if they are to be judged by their action, evidently approved. The two other accusations brought against the Government, namely, that the police were badly handled and that they acted with unnecessary violence and cruelty on the 25th and 26th of May, are, as I have already pointed out, still sub judice and ought not to have been discussed here to-night; but perhaps I may justifiably refer to the testimony of an hon. Member, which has already been quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone, as to the conduct of the only person we have yet heard of as having been seriously injured in these riots. We are told that the police handled the people, and especially the people's Representatives, roughly. The hon. Member for Cork has described the action of the hon. Member for Mid Tipperary in having fought the police single-handed, nearly choking three of them. That is the account of one hon. Gentleman's conduct given by another; the other day we had an account of another hon. Gentleman's conduct given by himself. The Member for East Donegal told the House what means he took to identify the police in the North of Ireland on another occasion—so that what with one hon. Gentleman chalking the police in the North and another choking them in the South of Ireland, we can hardly be surprised if this unusually familiar contact between the Representatives of the people and the police leads to rather more strained relations between these two sets of public servants than we are accustomed to on this side of the water. The hon. Member for Mid Tipperary is in the House, and I am certain that he, as an expert in these matters, will be able to estimate the insignificance of this affair by the number of killed and wounded in the Tipperary engagement. It was said at first that he alone had suffered, but afterwards we were informed that another individual was also injured; these make up the total of killed and wounded at Tipperary. At Cashel the killed and wounded numbered three; three constables who were more or less seriously injured, a list of five in all—which must appear truly despicable in the eyes of that political Pollux the Member for Mid Tipperary. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle finally said that whatever the defence of the Government was, and whatever the capital they tried to make by contrasting the occurrences at Tipperary with those at Belfast, he, at any rate, had granted an inquiry, whereas the Government in this case have refused an inquiry. But for a parallel to Tipperary I should look rather to the Wexford riots in 1883. There the same kind of conflict took place between the police and the people. There an Irish Member of Parliament was also a witness. The then Chief Secretary heard what he had to say, and refused an inquiry, stating that the only tribunals that could try such charges were the tribunals of the country, and although the hon. Member might have his suspicion of those tribunals, it was absolutely impossible to substitute any other tribunals for them. But the late Chief Secretary for Ireland may decline to be bound by the precedent of his right hon. Friend now sitting next to him (Sir G. Trevelyan). He may say that at any rate he granted an inquiry. Nobody can be surprised at that. What comparison can there be between Tipperary, where five persons in all were more or less injured, and Belfast, where in the single night of the 9th June, the police at Shanks-hill fired 201 rounds, killing seven persons, three of whom were women, and one a woman not even in the street but standing at the window of her own house? And what was the inquiry granted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle in the case of the Belfast riots, and of which he is so proud? It was an inquiry before three gentlemen who had no power to take evidence upon oath, and it was not until the right hon. Gentleman the present President of the Board of Trade came into office that such a power was conferred upon them. When I consider that the two right hon. Gentlemen who have spoken have confined their attacks to the manner in which the policy of the Government has been carried out by their subordinates, I cannot but think that these self-appointed critics are rather fastidious. We may congratulate them on the amount of delicate sensibility they have acquired since they were responsible for the Magistrates who came hot from the streets to sentence men they had arrested, and for police who fired at the people in platoons till they nearly exhausted their ammunition. The real question the House ought to decide, even according to the terms of the right hon. Gentleman's own Motion, is: Ought these prosecutions to have been undertaken, or ought they not? If the Government are right in proceeding against those whom they believe to have been guilty of a criminal conspiracy, then all the rest is but matter of detail. The question in which the country takes an interest is whether these gentlemen have been rightly or wrongly imprisoned. At any rate, this is a matter which is of more serious importance, and affects the credit of the Government more directly than any other question brought before the House to-night. The House has heard a good deal of the charge of the Chief Baron read, and there is no doubt, if the Chief Baron's law is worth anything, that these gentlemen entered into a combination to commit a private wrong. There is also no doubt that to enter into a combination to commit a private wrong is to enter into an illegal conspiracy. For those who support the Government that is enough. We who are not so ostentatiously enamoured of equal rights as some hon. Gentlemen opposite, believe that the Member for Huntingdon has a right equal to that of any man in the street to appeal for the law's protection when he is wronged. But I know hon. Gentlemen opposite do not attach much importance to criminal conspiracies, even when told by the learned Judge that they are against the law of the land. All these conspiracies are said by them to be voluntary combinations against harsh landlords. But in Tipperary was the landlord harsh, or the combination voluntary? If you read the judgment of the learned Chief Baron you will find that it was not so in either case. For seven years there were only two evictions on his estate, but immediately after this conspiracy was started the number of evictions was 122. The learned Judge attributed the conspiracy not to the exaction of excessive rents, but to the speeches of hon. Gentlemen. I suppose that those who entered the conspiracy at first may have done so of their own free will; but who can say that the rest were not forced to join it by the direst compulsion? And even those who entered into it at first were misled. They were drawn into the quarrel by being told that my hon. Friend the Member for South Hunts (Mr. Smith Barry) had gone to the assistance of a man who was exacting grossly unjust rents, whereas Mr. Ponsonby had received no rents for four years. They were told that in consequence of the interference of my hon. Friend no terms were offered to the tenants, whereas, as a matter of fact, not only were terms offered to them, but terms that were almost indistinguishable from the extreme demands of the Plan of Campaign. Whereas the Plan of Campaign, in the case of non-judicial tenants, that is, of all the tenants but 27, demanded a reduction of 35 per cent., Mr. Ponsonby offered a reduction of 32 per cent. It came to this, that in the case of a tenant with an annual rent of £20, whereas the Plan of Campaign asked him to pay £13 for ever, Mr. Ponsonby asked for £13 12s., not for ever, but for 49 years, when the tenants would get the reversion of the fee simple. Does anyone believe any person would enter into a voluntary combination against his landlord in such a fool's quarrel as that? We know perfectly well he would not. We have it on the judgment of the Chief Baron that the action of the tenants was brought about by violence, by assaults, and by boycotting. We know they themselves assert that they were entitled to use the weapons of boycotting and the Plan of Campaign not as against a harsh landlord, but as a move in the political war—a war which is conducted on the original plan of reserving their fire exclusively for those of their own side who run away. I think you can judge conclusively of the spirit in which these weapons were used by the language of a gentleman who, on the 16th September, before the Tipperary Board of Guardians, proposed a resolution approving of such weapons. Mr. Grogan, who moved the resolution, is a lover of the "good old times." He said they were poor weapons to those employed in Tipperary in old days, when they met the tyrants face to face at places which he named, and at which atrocious crimes were committed involving the deaths of four men and serious injury to three others. But we have the evidence not only of such words, but of outrages actually committed. It is the fashion to scoff at these outrages in this House, and to ask how many have been proved recently. Of course, none have been proved except those absolutely germane to the issue before the tribunals, but 16 of such cases have been proved, involving three or four of bombs and infernal machines. [Opposition cries.] I know perfectly well that hon. Gentlemen opposite prefer to call them squibs. I quarrel with no man, here or elsewhere, on a matter of definition. I have held one of them in my hands. It was an iron cylinder 10 inches long, 5 in diameter, filled with gunpowder and iron nails; and as I was unable to discover any difference in regard to the materials used and the mode of construction between it and the shrapnel shell, I call them bombs. But it is not only that bombs have been used. Men have been beaten, the windows of tradesmen have been smashed and their goods burned. Do hon. Gentlemen approve of these acts? If not, why do they not condemn them? Why do they imply by their laughter that they have never been committed? The tone that prevails in Tipperary is such that the priests there actually praise the men who would not assist the police in bringing the perpetrator of an atrocious crime to justice. But the criminal was brought to justice, and the learned Judge who tried the case I refer to laid stress on the fact that the boycotted man had surrendered wealth equal to £1,500, and said a man was mad not to resist such oppression. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) to talk of the old love of liberty that is inherent in the breasts of Englishmen. This system of intimidation has worse consequences than the depriving men of their property. Men have all the manliness ground out of them by this tyranny to such a degree that to find a parallel it is necessary to go back to the ignominious oppression our Saxon forefathers underwent at the hands of their Norman conquerors. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) at the end of his speech did indeed pass for a moment from this narrow issue to attack the Crimes Act and its administration in general terms. He spoke of the conduct of some of the Resident Magistrates as atrocious, and of the Crimes Act as against all the dictates of reason and decency. If hon. Members will turn from his eloquent denunciations to a dull matter, namely, the 84th page of the Judicial and Criminal Statistics in Ireland, they will find that in the administration this law, which we are told is against all the principles of reason and justice, and aimed against combinations which would be legal in England, during the last four years the vast majority of cases have been under Sub-section 3 of Section 2 of the Act, that is to say for riot, unlawful assembly and assault, which, whatever else they may be, can under no circumstances be regarded as coming within the category of criminal combinations. But we can proceed much further in disproof of this unfounded allegation. I went through the proceedings of last year, and out of the 530 proceedings I took the first 50 at random and found many cases which not only were not combinations of tenants, but which did not spring from combinations of tenants. Take the case of the 30 men who were proceeded against in Tyrone for religious faction fighting. Take the case of the 16 members of the O'Neil family who obtained notoriety for fighting inter se because they were unable to discover to which members of the family the furniture they had warehoused belonged. Then there is the case of a man named Allen, for concerting with whom certain people had their houses broken into. Hon. Gentlemen opposite will assume that Allen was one who betrayed the people behind their backs, that he truckled to a brutal landlord. On the contrary, Mr. Allen was the late secretary of the National League, but had become unpopular because he had closed on the accounts, and because through his instrumentality the instruments of the local band had been stolen.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): The hon. Member is misinformed; nothing of the kind ever occurred.

MR. WYNDHAM: I have gone very carefully into the matter. If the hon. Gentleman means that Allen does not now hold the money and the instruments he is quite right. Allen returned the money through Father Kennedy, and the band through the kind offices of the parish priest. I admit that amongst the cases proceeded against last year there were some which, though not cases of combination against landlords, sprang from such combination. I have in mind a case in which a man was prosecuted for firing shots at another man at a distance of 100 yards. That is only accounted as intimidation, but there are crimes closely allied to that that are far more serious. Last year 22 persons in Ireland were killed, wounded, or fired at with intent to kill, all because they belonged to the class who are held up to public execration in public speeches in Ireland. Everyone of those crimes is directly due to the teaching that a man has some other title to land than that which is recognised by the law. Not one would have occurred but for the doctrine that those who resist such claims are to be treated as lepers, and left to the mercy of the criminal classes. We are sometimes challenged to show a direct connection between violent speeches and crimes that are committed. The relation between the speeches that are delivered and the violent crimes that follow, is analogous to that between insanitary surroundings and the disease germs that thrive and propagate in them. The case of Michael Ryan has already been mentioned. He has been persecuted for years by speeches directed against him, by the Press, and by having his movements shadowed at fairs in order to prevent him making a livelihood. In 1888 persons were prosecuted for speaking against him, and the Judge said the language used by one gentleman would support an indictment for incitement for assassination. But even in such cases as that of Ryan there is some comfort. Deeply as we deplore these reiterated attacks, the very fact that they are repeated, that they have to be repeated, that in the absence of speeches and resolutions and the active interference of League agents, the persecution would die down, proves that this illegal intimidation is not a natural growth of Irish life, but the forced product of political agitation. We see that the rack will not work unless there is constant straining upon the levers. Since this is so, the last excuse for not supporting the Government is swept away. For it is clear that by striking at intimidation and striking at the conspiracies that invariably bring intimidation in their train, the Government can restore, and has restored, safety and liberty to the class from whose ranks the victims of agrarian outrage are drawn. With such a high inducement to persevere, I cannot conceive that any Government would hesitate, even before the Vote of Censure moved annually by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. It is, of course, a serious matter for us who sit behind the Government to be told with much emphasis once in every 12 months that we are supporting them in prosecuting men whose motives and intentions are pure and patriotic, and in every way incomparably superior to our own. But we are not here to judge of the intentions of any man. Happily we have no consciences to keep but our own, and in the discharge of that humble task we shall have no difficulty in deciding to-night between an Opposition whose doctrines have endangered life, and a Government whose action has saved it.

(10.17.) Mr. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid): In the speech in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle opened this Debate, he made reference to certain transactions in the town of Tipperary of which I was an eye witness, and in which I was to a certain extent a participant. Under such circumstances I crave the indulgence of the House while I refer to the transactions for a few moments. As I understand it, the Motion of the right hon. Member for Newcastle impeaches the administration of justice in Ireland, and the main allegation of those who support it is that the law is being strained and tampered with, and that justice is being prostituted for partisan ends. The only rebutting allegation on the other side appears to be that in a considerable number of cases the law has been broken by certain individuals engaged in alleged wrongful combinations. Surely the House will not fail to see that there is no connection between the defence put forward by the supporters of the Government and the offences alleged against the administrators of the law? I cannot see how the commission of certain offences, about which in many cases there may be differences of opinion, can be taken as any justification whatever for the Government going beyond the powers given them by law and straining the law in order to place their forces at the disposal of the strong and rich as opposed to the weak and poor combined in their own defence. Two or three quotations have been made from the Press to show that I approached affairs in Tipperary in a peculiar temper, a temper which might lead one to place himself unduly in hostility towards the forces of Her Majesty. Another quotation has been adduced to show that it is practically avowed on this side that I behaved in the fashion attributed to me; a third quotation, about which I feel less disposed to defend myself, has been made from the picturesque description of these transactions in Tipperary as reported by the reporter of the Cork Examiner. I believe I am reported to have said at a banquet in Tipperary that I did not go there exactly for ornamental purposes, and I hoped that if on any future occasion there was a scrimmage I should have a chief place in the fray. I delivered a speech of some length, but I am not of sufficient importance for the reporters to give me minute attention or to report me verbally. They completely misconceived my meaning and misconstrued my words, and the report neither in word nor substance represents what I said. That was the first occasion on which I had met the people of Tipperary subsequent to my election for one of the divisions of the county, and what I said was that on that occasion I had been employed in attempting, and had partially succeeded, to lead the police away in order that my hon. Friends the Members for East Mayo and North-East Cork might address the people of Tipperary. I said my part on that occasion had been somewhat inglorious, but whenever there were any difficulties as between the people and the Crown—whenever there were prosecutions to be faced, or, if necessary, whenever there was police violence to be faced, they would not find me shirking my duty as a Member for the county. If political prosecutions were to be faced, if batoning was to be faced, I hoped the Executive Government would single me out as a representative of the people, and therefore as one of the people first to be attacked. That is entirely different in substance to the report which has been alleged against me. The report in the Cork Examiner represents that I was eager to put myself forward to fight the police; but my version of the story is that if there was any inconvenience forthcoming from the Executive towards the people of Tipperary, I hoped I might be one of the people to suffer. Another quotation made purported to be one from a speech delivered by the hon. Member for Cork in introducing me to some people in Rathdowney, in Kilkenny. He is reported to have said that I must be a good man and true because I had choked three policemen. I am authorised by the hon. Member for Cork to state, and my own impression coincides with his version of the story, that what he said was this—that I must be a good man and true, because it was alleged by the Crown and by their adherents that I had choked three policemen. The House will therefore observe that the hon. Member for Cork was merely quoting the dicta of our opponents in justification of himself, and in no way casting his great authority over the statement which he then made. I am sorry to have to trouble the House with these personalities, but as they have been introduced I intend with indulgence of the House to deal with them. The hon. Member for South Tyrone talked about boycotting and intimidation, and I believe dragged in the Decalogue, which I notice is used by opponents to ruin others rather than for the better ordering of their own conduct. It is needless to quarrel with the hon. Member for South Tyrone, because it is known he holds a brief for the Ministerialists as a peripatetic special pleader to go about defending everything that is most abhorrent to the moral sense of the Irish people; he nearly retains the names of Irishman and Liberal in order the better to give assistance to those who are least Irish and least Liberal. A few vague personalities, gleaned from papers and gossip, are all the hon. Member can allege against my Tipperary colleagues. With my own personal experiences I would not have troubled the House if it were not that hon. Members are not cognizant of the evidence I gave on oath, evidence which was not shaken by cross-examination nor rebutted by any other evidence. I happened to be in Tipperary when the trial was about to come on. We approached the Court-house intending to be present and found the way leading to it heavily occupied by military and police. We made our way through the cordon of police; and here I would remark that if there was any disorderly crowd at the gates it was the fault of Colonel Caddell, who allowed the crowd to pass his lines and congregate there. Some were admitted, some were refused; but according to the law of Ireland and constitutional usage, this vast and excited multitude as it has been called had as good a right to be admitted as the right hon. Member for Newcastle or anybody else not immediately concerned in the proceedings. Some of us, however, were admitted and others refused admission. On what basis the selection was ordered I do not know, but it is now in evidence on the depositions that the Executive officers said that they would admit only those who had business as witnesses, defendants, or counsel for the defence. But we do not so much challenge the action of the Executive in excluding the people, though that is a grave charge, as in attacking a small crowd hemmed in on two sides by stone walls, and on two other sides by an armed force which attacked them, when there was no possibility of escape, with violence and unnecessary brutality. The crowd has been variously estimated as numbering from 30 to 100, but it is certain the crowd was vastly outnumbered by the armed force Colonel Caddell had on the spot. Of course, there are from the other side the customary allegations of violence against different members of the crowd. My own story has been given in evidence, and I only wish now to put the main facts. I made my way outside the Court-yard at the time when this ferocious rush of a vast and excited multitude was supposed to be taking place, and I took my stand by the hon. Member for North-East Cork in order that he might not suffer violence. I in no way assaulted the police, except in so far as I lifted up my hand to ward off a blow. I saved one blow from falling on the head of a man who was standing with his hands in his pockets. A minute or two afterwards a policeman endeavoured to strike me with the butt-end of his rifle, while several others caught me by the throat and shoulders, and at the same time a policeman struck me from behind on the head. Then, and not until then, did I strike any blow; and I consider, according to the theory of self-defence enunciated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite in the case of Hargan the other day, that I was perfectly justified. The man was endeavouring to hit me with his rifle, and I hit out. Slightly stunned as I was by the blow on the head I had received, I did not see the effect of my blow, but I have reason to believe that the precautionary measures which I adopted were such as to induce the policemen to refrain from any further attack. I was then escorted inside and seen by a doctor, and in a few minutes after I found that the gates had been thrown open and that the crowd had entered, and that there was ample room for me to get into the hall. I pass on to subsequent proceedings. We knew, or we were able to gather from the ordinary procedure of the Crown in such cases that, having been baptised in our blood, we should be subsequently confirmed by the laying on of the policemen's hands in the form of arrest. It was as expected. The Chief Secretary complained of the postponement of the legal proceedings, but I will explain the cause why they are still sub judice. Immediately on prosecuting the policeman who assaulted me, the Bench was packed by Removable Magistrates, and the action of the Crown was peculiarly illustrative of their tactics, which to any fair-minded man would show the absence of bona fides on the part of the Executive. When I prosecuted the police for assault it was open to the police to proceed against me by cross-summons, and then the whole case would have been threshed out and the merits of the case discussed. They took no such course. But the Bench was packed in such a way as to leave me no alternative but to abandon the case. Then I was served with a summons under the Coercion Act, but subsequently proceedings under this Act were dropped and we were told we were to have the full benefit of a jury. Then on the first occasion of its coming on the Crown had the case postponed for a week, and subsequently for three weeks; they postponed it so often, that at last I refused to go over except on a warrant; but though I refused, the Government have never yet had the warrant executed. In connection with this case I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what course he intends to pursue, how much of the remainder of this year will be left at my disposal for holidays, and when the matter will be brought to an issue? If the case is brought before a jury, not packed, and any capable Judge I will undertake that it will be riddled in one or two days, and that these proceedings will collapse like so many other proceedings of the Government. Some reference has been made to the amount of injury inflicted upon the crowd on the occasion, though for my part I do not think the exact amount of injury makes much difference in a constitutional matter such as this. I can only say that immediately after the police attacked the crowd a man was brought into the Court-house in a very painful condition, he having three or four wounds on his head in which a finger could be laid, and which went down to the bone, whilst the rest of his head was bruised as if it had been battered against the wall. I maintain that an unnecessary amount of inconvenience and suffering was inflicted by the police upon the persons in the crowd on the occasion referred to, and not being either a Tory or that abnormal lusus nature a budding Tory statesman, it is not open to me to estimate the amount of that inconvenience and suffering by the number of square inches of sticking-plaster which had been required. The charge we make against Her Majesty's Government is that they have introduced an unconstitutional and a reactionary law into Ireland, and that that law they have administered in an unconstitutional spirit, and in a spirit of vindictive hostility towards the popular Party and the anti-landlord Party in that country, and that they have allowed that law to be so administered by men whose political views have alienated them away from all sympathy with the people.

(10.44.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I apprehend that the House will have listened with considerable interest to two speeches which have been delivered by two comparatively young Members of this House, which give proof of the great ability which they possess. The speech of the hon. Member behind me was delivered in a thinner House than there is at present, but if the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian had listened to it, it would have satisfied even him that there are hon. Members who are ready to take up in detail and to meet on every point the accusations which the right hon. Member for Newcastle has levelled against the Irish policy of Her Majesty's Government. The speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down was imbued with all that fire of youth which seems to distinguish all his actions. I am far from quarrelling with the hon. Gentleman, for as I understand his state of mind, he seems to regard the Irish question as something after the fashion of a town and gown row on an Imperial scale, into which he flung himself with all the ardour, the fire, and the courage becoming his years and sinews. It is a matter of interest to some hon. Members to know why this Motion was brought forward at all. For my own part, when I first heard of it—I was not in England at the time—I began to think that it had been placed upon the Paper rather through an unfortunate habit than in consequence of any well-considered policy, and because right hon. Gentlemen opposite thought that no Parliamentary Session would be complete without they moved a Vote of Censure against the Government for the way in which they had administered the law in Ireland. Therefore anything, however frivolous, however trifling, is made to do duty for the purpose. But since I have listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman I have somewhat altered my view. I conceived that this was a Vote of Censure on the Government for their administration in Ireland, but I find that it appears to be a continuance on the part of the right hon. Member for Newcastle of a personal controversy between him and myself which began in September or October last, the details of which I had thoroughly forgotten, but which appear to have rankled in his mind, and to have come out this evening in a most inappropriate way. After all, for a Vote of Censure, can you conceive anything so trivial as the case put before the House by the right hon. Gentleman? The hon. Member who has just sat down had his head broken—not badly broken, because, after going to the doctor, he immediately came back and began to doctor somebody else. The incidents to which the hon. Member referred are most objectionable ones, but they are the incidents which attend any riot, however trivial. Practically, the House is asked to go through all the elaborate forms of a Vote of Censure, and men have been whipped up from the furthest ends of the earth, to decide whether Her Majesty's Government are or are not to be allowed to retain their position because three or four gentlemen in Tipperary, when a Privy Councillor and an ex-Member of the Cabinet happened to be present, had their heads broken. I call it ridiculous. It is worse than ridiculous; under the circumstances in which we stand it is indecorous in the highest degree, and I will tell you why. This is a matter the trial of which has been begun and has not been concluded, and when it comes before a Judge and a jury in March next, it will be found that the statements of two of the witnesses have been given in this House as ground for a Vote of Censure. When I first heard of this Resolution, I naturally thought that it was intended to deal with the circumstances which led up to the trial of the recent conspiracy cases, and which, having been concluded, might have formed fair matters for criticism. But the right hon. Gentleman, instead of taking that course, comes down here and, in defiance of the commonest Parliamentary practice, insists upon discussing matters which ought only to be argued out in a Court of Law. I wonder that the right hon. Gentleman should have started on that course. I wonder still more that the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, who was so anxious that I should reply to him, but who is not anxious enough to come down here and listen to that reply, and who always poses as the guardian of the purity of Parliamentary traditions, should have consented to be dragged by his colleague into a course which I think is so opposed to the true interests of Parliamentary Debate. I do not propose to follow these bad examples. There are certain topics in the speech of the right hon. Member for Newcastle, and in the speech of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian which, I apprehend, will not form part of the proceedings in the Court of Law in March, and which I will touch upon. I will not touch upon the questions of fact on which the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member who has just sat down, and other English and Irish gentlemen not less worthy of credit and not less capable of using their eyes as they are, take such diametrically opposite views. The right hon. Member for Newcastle has approached this question as if it were the subject-matter of personal controversy between himself and me. Look at it from the personal point of view, and let us consider what the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman was in this matter. Twelve persons, three of them Members of this House, were brought before a Court in Tipperary to be tried for conspiracy. The result of that trial everybody knows; but before the result of that trial was known everybody who knew anything about Ireland was perfectly well aware that all the principal persons concerned in it were guilty of the offence of which they were charged for they never made any secret of it themselves. The proudest boast of those gentlemen, the crown of honour which they would be furious if any one were to deprive them of it, is that they did combine to injure my hon. Friend the Member for South Hunts, and they did so by means which turned Tipperary into a Sahara, and which caused it to be treated as if it were one of the Cities of the Plain. That was their own boast and confession. That was made when the right hon. Gentleman went down to Tipperary. He knew it, and knew it perfectly well; and whether those men were right or wrong, the result of this criminal conspiracy was to bring untold suffering on the population of Tipperary, suffering which it may or may not have been right in the interest of the Irish people to bring upon them, but which was inflicted upon them in consequence of an illegal conspiracy. Those were the notorious facts, and the facts which the men accused would be the last to deny. The right hon. Gentleman has been responsible for the government of Ireland. Either as Irish Secretary or in some other capacity I presume he expects to share in the government of the future. I know he does. He told us that he was coming into office at the next election, and he goes down with men whom he knows to be guilty.

MR. J. MORLEY: I wish to remind the right hon. Gentleman that three of the defendants were acquitted by the Court.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; but, in the first place, not the defendants of whom I am speaking—the Members of this House.

MR. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): I am a Member of this House, and I was one of the defendants, and I was acquitted.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): I was another.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: And, in the second place, the right hon. Gentleman at this moment must know that some of those persons who were acquitted were acquitted on obviously and admittedly technical grounds, and that, if there be moral guilt attaching to this crime, that moral guilt attaches to them. The right hon. Gentleman denies that?

MR. J. MORLEY: Certainly.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Does he deny that Father Humphreys, who was acquitted, but of whom the Judge who re-tried the case and re-surveyed the evidence practically said that he was as guilty as the others—does he say that he was innocent?

MR. J. MORLEY: He was not legally guilty.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I always thought that morality had been abandoned by the Liberal Party, but I never expected to hear them confess it. The right hon. Gentleman goes down and accompanies those gentlemen whom he must have known, if he had exercised the intelligence with which he has been so largely endowed by nature, were morally guilty of this offence. He accompanies a crowd which assembles to cheer for the prisoners, and to boo at the police escorting them. A more indecorous position to place himself in cannot be conceived. He says that he went down to see how the Chief Secretary was working the tremendous instrument which Parliament had placed in his hands. He was doing nothing of the kind. He was going down by his own confession to hammer, or help to hammer another nail in the coffin of the Government. He goes down on the constitutional ground to see the liberty of the subject respected! He went down as a politician for a political purpose. He went down as a Party man for a Party purpose; he went down as a wire-puller for a wire-pulling purpose. To carry out that object he was not ashamed to pursue a course which I venture to say no Privy Councillor, no Cabinet Minister, no man who ever expected or hoped to enter office again, ever pursued before. The right hon. Gentleman's first accusation was that he obtained ocular proof that the charge which has been so constantly made against the police in Ireland, that men were attacked and batoned, and I think he said brought to justice for booing and cheering, was true. As far as I can make out, nobody was batoned at that stage of the proceedings. Did he see anybody batoned? Did he see anyone brought to justice? No, he did not, though he tells us that he had ocular proof that booing the police was regarded as a criminal offence. This was the charge, so far as I can make out, which he made in his speeches at Swindon and St. Helen's. There is booing, no doubt. A crowd is assembled to boo the escort or cheer the prisoner. The police who escort the prisoner are booed. I apprehend that that crowd, from the fact of doing these things, would be an illegal assembly. [Opposition laughter and ironical cheers.] I do not quarrel over that, because nothing was done to them. It is a mere legal dictum on which I say nothing, but I want to know this: How was it that every time that the right hon. Gentleman referred to this subject he omitted to state the fact that there was a large crowd and a relatively small escort, that the crowd booed the police and cheered the prisoners, and all this in a town which had for months been the scene of rioting and disorder, and where on legal evidence we have it that the police had to fire and had killed a man? [Loud cries of "No."]

MR. J. REDMOND rose in his place. Mr. A. J. BALFOUR refused to give way, and Mr. SPEAKER called on the Chief Secretary to proceed.

MR. J. REDMOND: The reverse is the case. The Coroner's Jury said the evidence was the other way.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member, I think, is mistaken; but, at any rate, the whole matter can be brought out before the House in question and answer.

MR. J. REDMOND: Ask the Attorney General for Ireland. He answered a question the other day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts were as I stated.

MR. J. REDMOND: They were not.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have stated the fact, I believe. Before we come to the scene at the Court-house I wish to say a word or two on another subject. I shall not say a word about the evidence, because if I did so I should myself be guilty of the crime—the Parliamentary indecorum—of which I have complained in the case of two or three hon. Members who have spoken. But there is one question which does not affect the evidence in the case to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, and on which I think he ought to be corrected. He stated in his speech that under the Crimes Act itself it must be left entirely for the Magistrates inside the Court to see that the Court is not overcrowded, and that decorum is preserved in it; and he based upon that statement or theory the astounding conclusion that Colonel Caddell was not justified in stopping the men coming in, even if he believed they would be riotous when there. That is not law or common sense in Ireland, and it is not law or common sense in England. The idea that a Magistrate must be precluded from stopping a disorderly, or noisy, or, for the sake of argument, I will say, a drunken crowd ["Oh, oh!"] — I do not say this crowd was drunken; I do not think it was — a disorderly or drunken crowd from going into a Court, is surely an outrage on the common sense of the House. Well, I leave that part of the question with only one other observation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was deeply indignant that in the conflict of testimony I pinned my faith on the evidence of others and rejected that of Privy Councillors and Members of Parliament. Privy Councillors and Members of Parliament may be better than other men, but they have not got better eyes; and if two men of equal probity give me different versions of the same matter, it is not an insult to one side to say that I prefer to believe the story of the other. But I need not pursue this. The matter will be threshed out in a few weeks, when the right hon. Gentleman will have that opportunity, of which he says he is so anxious to avail himself, of giving his evidence upon oath and under cross-examination. We shall then have all the facts before us, and I trust we shall then be able to form a final judgment on the evidence which has been accumulated in this matter. But let me again say the right hon. Gentleman had to make two speeches immediately after his visit to Tipperary, and there was nothing else to talk about in Ireland than this relatively trumpery riot, which never would have been heard of but for him, and which would have occupied the precise place in Irish history that its proportions seem to demand. Now, the right hon. Gentleman was very angry with me because, going back upon old speeches of mine, I accused him of garbling. I did do so. The expression may have been a strong one. As I do not love strong expressions — [Laughter.] Well, if I had carefully examined all my expressions I might possibly have selected a milder, though not a less expressive one. But who is the right hon. Gentleman that he should complain of strong expressions?

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Not strong, but wrong.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, if it comes to that, I have to say the expression is the right one. The right hon. Gentleman was dealing with a Magistrate in Ireland who had very limited opportunities for defending his own case, and who had written an account of that case to the Times newspaper. The right hon. Gentleman knew of that letter. The letter was written to the Editor of the Times. I believe the right hon. Gentleman perfectly accurately quoted the letter he saw, but the letter he saw was not that in the Times; and I say that a person in the position of the right hon. Gentleman attacking a man in Colonel Caddell's position should, at all events, do him the justice to look at the newspaper to the editor of which his letter was directed before he founds upon a misquotation an accusation.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman is misinformed. Colonel Caddell's letter was seen by me the day before it appeared in the Times, or was sent to the Times. It was published in three Dublin papers and in two London papers, and not in the Times till the following day. I read it on the first day it appeared.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Very well.

MR. J. MORLEY: I saw it on the Monday, so where is the garbling?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts admitted by the right hon. Gentleman are these — that Colonel Caddell wrote a letter to the Editor of the Times. ["No."] Yes. That he did write a letter to the Editor of the Times is an admitted fact. The authentic copy of that letter appears, of course, in the paper to the editor of which it is written. It appeared in that paper the day before the right hon. Gentleman made his speech.

MR. J. MORLEY: On the same day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On the same day, but before he made his speech. He made his speech, basing one of his main accusations against Colonel Caddell on the form in which the letter appeared in the newspapers to the editors of which it was not directed, but not in the form in which it appeared in the paper to the editor of which it was directed.

MR. J. MORLEY : I am sorry to be obliged to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman again. I assert this—that the letter was sent to these four or five other papers on the first occasion with the word “nearly,” and that the word “entirely,” which appeared in the Times, was a second and revised version.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The letter never purported to be anything but a letter to the Times. Is that admitted ? [A VOICE : “No.”] It appeared in that paper before the right hon. Gentleman made his speech. The right hon. Gentleman did not take the trouble to look at the form in which it appeared in the paper to the editor of which it was addressed, but used the form in which it appeared in some other paper. So far I accuse him of nothing but carelessness—a carelessness which, mark you, is serious when a person in the right hon. Gentleman’s position is dealing with a person in Colonel Caddell’s position. But I contend that when the error was pointed out he did not utter, and has never to this day, as far as I know, uttered, the slightest word of apology.

MR. J. MORLEY : Hear, hear !

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : And that I call garbling. I could wish that the right hon. Gentleman, who is so sensitive on his own account, would, at all events, recollect that it matters little what epithets he uses to those who can reply to him face to face ; but when he is dealing with persons who do not stand on an equality with himself, who cannot reply to him as I can reply to him, who are not Members of this House, but who are Magistrates, doing a difficult and laborious and, through the efforts of the right hon. Gentleman and his friends, very often an unpopular duty in Ireland—he should recollect that epithets bandied between Members of Parliament matter very little ; but when he describes a man like Colonel Caddell as incompetent, brutal, and lawless, I say it becomes very unnecessary for a politician henceforth to consider what shall be the language in which he shall describe the actions of the right hon. Gentleman.

VOL. CCCL. [THIRD SERIES.]

The right hon. Gentleman in the course of his speech made a rapid transition from Tipperary—to which he afterwards adverted—to the action of the Government in the case of the hon. Member for East Mayo, who spoke at Swinford, I think, on September 21 last. Now, the point is this. The Government did say—and I accept the whole responsibility of their action, which I myself directed—that if the hon. Member for East Mayo chose to make an illegal speech at Swinford, and that illegal speech, by the endorsement and co-operation of the crowd, constituted an unlawful assembly, that unlawful assembly should be dispersed. The real question we have to determine is this : Had the Government any ground for supposing that if the hon. Member for East Mayo went to Swinford he would, or would not, make an illegal speech ? I say we had ample grounds for believing he would. Recollect that what was done was to warn the hon. Gentleman as politely as possible that this course would be pursued, and that the meeting might be proclaimed for this reason. It was, however, not proclaimed. Every desire was shown that the hon. Member should express his views provided they were views consistent with the law. If the House will consider not merely the action which the hon. Member has taken in past times in that district, where he started the Plan of Campaign, and where he has agitated more than once against rents, and still more, if they will consider the speeches which he made as he was going down to Swinford—speeches at which no police reporter was present, and which I take from a friendly newspaper, the Freeman’s Journal, they will see that the object of the hon. Member for East Mayo in going down there was to turn the impending distress into a lever for political agitation. They were very remarkable speeches. The hon. Member for East Mayo distinctly looked back with regret to the action taken in the criminal times of 1880 and 1881. He says—

“There, now again you have distress—now again is the chance for you not to pay your rents,” and he showed the clearest desire—and I do not think this will be denied by any of his friends—to turn the difficulties in which the small farmers were likely to be put in the winter through the failure of the potato to account, not for the purpose of relieving that distress, but for the purpose of again reviving in its ancient bitterness the land war that existed in this district in 1880, 1881, and 1882. I shall not dwell further on that point, because the hon. Member for East Mayo is not present. But if any one will take the trouble to read the speeches to which I have referred he will see that I have not exaggerated by a hair's breadth the import of those speeches, and that I have done no injustice to the hon. Member of which he can complain. Having dealt with Swinford, the right hon. Gentleman reverted to Tipperary, and dealt with the question of the selection of the Magistrates who tried the case. There were two Magistrates, of course. The Chairman of the Court, Mr. Irwin, is a gentleman who, by the test which, after all, is the best possible test you can apply—the test of experience—has shown himself competent to deal with the most difficult cases under the Crimes Act. He had before dealt with such cases frequently; his decisions have constantly been reviewed by higher tribunals, and have never been reversed. But it is not against Mr. Irwin that the gravamen of the attack has been directed. The chief victim of hostile criticism has been Mr. Shannon, and, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle very justly and properly observed, the criticism, at any rate in his hands, has not been directed against Mr. Shannon, who is not responsible, but against the Government, who are responsible. Now, what justification had we for our action? Mr. Shannon, since the middle of July, had been placed in Tipperary to carry out judicial functions alone. To bring in from the outside some other Magistrate than Mr. Shannon could only have been justified if he had shown himself incompetent, or if there had been any strong reason why he should not sit on the Bench. Was there any justification for such a course? No more competent Resident Magistrate than Mr. Shannon sits in Ireland to decide questions. No more competent lawyer exists in Ireland, I believe, in the whole range of the Magistracy, from the North of Ireland to the South, and I believe no man has a more distinguished past career than Mr. Shannon. It is obvious, therefore, that unless there were strong reasons for superseding him he should have been employed. He had a controversy, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle says, with the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who attacked him seriously in this House. Well, you cannot possibly exclude from these judicial proceedings everybody whom the Members for East Mayo and North East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) have attacked. It is absolutely out of the question. I have had the records of United Ireland examined for eight years, and I find they attack everybody. With regard to the Magistrates declared by the Lord Lieutenant to be legally competent to try these cases, I find that only three out of the whole number have escaped the animadversion of that intelligent journal. What are you to do under these circumstances? If people are gifted with this wealth of vituperation, how is it possible to find Judges to try them? They have only to abuse enough and they remain untriable. The right hon. Gentleman opposite took as an illustration the case of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) and the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Johnston) trying the learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy). He said how monstrous it would be for those two Members to try the Member for Longford. But if you wanted to try the Member for Longford, whom would you get? In what quarter of the House would you find the people whom he had never attacked? Would it be gentlemen below the Gangway on this side of the House? Would it be gentlemen opposite? Would it be gentlemen below the Gangway on the opposite side? If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle had to carry out his imaginary case, and to find a jury in this House to try the Member for Longford, he positively could not do it on his own principles and by gentlemen whom the Member for Longford has never in the last ten years honoured by his abuse. The right hon. Gentleman anticipated, and anticipated truly, that I should use against him the tu quoque argument. I pointed out in one of those unfortunate speeches of mine, or in a letter which I wrote to the papers on the same subject, that the right hon. Gentleman, when Chief Secretary, had himself in Belfast on a far greater scale done ten thousand worse things of the same kind than he accused me of doing in the present case. This part of the question was fully dealt with by my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Wyndham) early this evening. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that he left the Resident Magistracy in Ireland exactly as it was before the riots, and that the whole of the management of the riots was intrusted to the ordinary local Magistrates. That is not the case.

MR. J. MORLEY: I never said that. I said the Resident Magistrates sat on the Bench with them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that not one, not two or three, but a dozen or 20 or more Resident Magistrates were drafted in from other parts of Ireland to deal with the Belfast riots. I think these riots were a very big thing. It was not the case of an hon. Gentleman having his head broken, but the case of men being day after day shot down in the streets, and of women day after day shot down at their work, of policemen firing hundreds of rounds from their barracks as they supposed, rightly or wrongly, in self-defence—of incidents compared with which Mitchelstown sinks into absolute insignificance. I do not suppose that in the history of Ireland—and it is a history of bitter faction—feeling between factions ever rose to such a point as it did in the case of the Belfast riots. Did the right hon. Gentleman then distinguish, as he now professes to do, between the Executive and the judicial functions? He did nothing of the kind. He did not, in the case of Belfast, do what I attempted to do, namely, to get a Magistrate who should not be concerned in Executive functions. No: the Magistrates were engaged in the evening in ordering about the police employed in this affair, and during the daytime they shared with the local Magistrates the work of trying the men who had taken part in the riots the evening before. I think the plan not a very good one. But the difficulty was great; the circumstances were new; and Heaven forbid that I should rake up this matter for controversial purposes! But when the right hon. Gentleman attacks me for doing on a small, I may say on an insignificant and petty, scale what he himself did on a grand and almost a sublime scale, I think it is more than human patience can well bear. At all events, I trust the right hon. Gentleman, whatever else he says of me in future, will say this—that, bad as I am, he was in his day and in his degree ten thousand times worse. After all, we have been attacked for the method in which we framed the Court. But experience is the true test. Have we any means of testing the Court which we thus framed, or of coming to any conclusion as to its fairness, and as to the bias which it had for or against the prisoners? We have an excellent test, because, by the kindness of the counsel for the defendant, the case was brought before Chief Baron Palles, who delivered a Judgment upon it which every Member of the House ought to read. It appears merely as a Return of the Court of Exchequer; and no one, probably, would guess it to be a complete, an able, and a convincing survey of the whole legal aspects of the Tipperary controversy. If they read this they will see, not merely that Court upheld in every single thing they did against the prisoners, but that the Chief Baron was of opinion that if the Court erred at all—if these gentlemen, who are “the creatures of the Crown,” who are “removables,” who are my “paid hirelings,” as an hon. Member said—

MR. MAC NEILL: I endorse that.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps the hon. Member invented the phrase. If these “corrupt Judges” erred at all, they erred against the Crown and in favour of the prisoner. And I say you cannot have a more conclusive test that, whatever the steps may have been by which this Court was arrived at, it was a fair, able, and judicious Court, and a Court, at all events, from which no Irish Member need have shrunk from being tried. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who has not yet returned to the House—

SIR W. HARCOURT: He is ill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg pardon. I was going to criticise some observations in his speech, but I will choose some other occasion. But both the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle deplore what they called the discredit before the English people into which the police and the Magistrates have fallen in Ireland. If by that they mean that on a great many English platforms attacks on Resident Magistrates and the police are greeted with jeers, I admit the fact, and I deplore it. But I want to know who is responsible for it. It used not to be so; indeed, that is the great gravamen of the charge. It was not so before 1885, and yet the Magistrates were the same as now, the police were the same, and they did the same things, and they were accused of doing the same things in the same language by the same newspapers, and by the same Members of Parliament. But in those days they were not objects of reprobation in any part of the United Kingdom. But who are right hon. Gentlemen opposite that they should deplore the change? They are the causes of the change. They have never hesitated for a Party object to make the most unfounded and unscrupulous attacks—I borrow the words from a speaker earlier in the Debate—upon these public servants. Of course, attacks made by men in their position addressed to persons who know little about Ireland, except from such orators, produce their effect. Whom does that condemn? Does it condemn the victims of the attack, or the persons who make the attack? I say it is the people who make the attack. And if the time comes when those persons have to use these officers whom, for their own Party purposes, they have so recklessly traduced, they will find then the evil consequences of the course which they have pursued. Both the right hon. Gentlemen who spoke from the Front Opposition Bench—the right hon. Member for Newcastle and the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian—made themselves very merry over their own prophecies about the next General Election. Right hon. Gentlemen always console themselves about the next General Election. They have a great gift of self-satisfied prophecy in that direction. They are assured that everything is going their own way. I am always ready to treat and argue my opponents' case on my opponents' own terms. Therefore, let us suppose what they have prophesied does come about; let us take their view; are we, then, going to have a Utopia on the other side of the Channel? You will turn out, no doubt, a brutal Government, a Government which employs Police and Magistrates, which puts down boycotting, which tries to check intimidation, which does its best, and I think not unsuccessfully, to preserve the elementary rights of individuals, a Government also which I think has struggled not unsuccessfully, if we are to compare their efforts with those of their predecessors, to ameliorate the condition of the poor and distressed all over Ireland. The principles on which we have acted are known. What are the principles of our successors going to be? Are they unknown? I do not think so. I think we all know them. We hear them spoken aloud from those Benches (below the Opposition Gangway) and sotto voce from those (the Front Opposition Benches). We know the Government is denounced for coercing those who intimidate landgrabbers, therefore I presume intimidation of landgrabbers will be the ordinary procedure in Ireland after the next General Election. We know that the Government is denounced for opposing the Plan of Campaign; I presume, therefore, the Plan of Campaign will rule Ireland after the next General Election. We know we are denounced for checking boycotting; I presume boycotting will be rampant after the next General Election. Is the next General Election so exhilarating a prospect to right hon. Gentlemen opposite under these circumstances? Do they look forward with equanimity to this new system of Irish Government—the Government of Ireland according to Nationalist ideas? I believe if you were to probe to the bottom the views of the right hon. Gentlemen who sit on that Bench you would find that there is nothing which causes them so much anxiety as that prospect. It is not this or that by-election, nor even this or that General Election. They know perfectly well that one of two things must happen—either our successors, after we are turned out, will have to follow our methods, adopt our policy, and use our instruments, in which case every speech you will have made will be branded before the face of mankind as odious hypocrisy, or else, in the other alternative, you will give up Ireland to men who have shown what they can do already and whose handiwork and signature are to be found in certain parts of Ireland. Those men who have been singled out for special eulogy this evening are those whose handiwork is to be seen in Tipperary. We know what they boasted they would do and what they did at Tipperary—they have reduced it to a desert. There is their handiwork; there is the result of their principles; and if those principles are to be carried out, then I say Ireland, after the next General Election, will become a place where civilisation will be absolutely impossible; where the very last vestige and element of individual freedom will have vanished; where every man from the North to the South will be given up to the dictation of an organisation in Dublin; and their only chance, the only hope that any one of them will have, will be that that organisation may find itself divided by internal controversies. I cannot believe the right hon. Gentleman desires that Utopia, because he knows perfectly well that the object we have striven to attain must be striven for by every civilised Government, and I believe he also knows that our methods are the only methods which are practicable or possible. And if he thinks that, holding those convictions, we are frightened by any threats of what this or that by-election may do, or that we take it to heart with any misgivings, he is under a mistake. I have known gentlemen opposite whose morals appeared to be the creatures of a General Election. I have known gentlemen whose whole view of the Ten Commandments appeared to be altered by a Parliamentary majority. Sir, I believe not only that it is wrong, but that it is stupid. There has never been a greater mistake made by any Party in this country than the mistake that was made and is being made this day by hon. Gentlemen opposite when they identify the triumph of their cause with the triumph of immoality—I mean political immorality—and it is because, at all events, I am optimistic enough to believe that morality must win in the long run that also I believe the verdict this House will pass to-night will be endorsed in the future by the constituencies of this country.

(11.46.) SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I have often listened to the right hon. Gentleman and admired his ability, but I confess to-night that I have listened to him with rather different feelings. They have been those of sympathy for a man who is compelled to speak when he knew that he had no case, and that he was not even in a position to attempt to reply to the charges brought against the Government. Now, let us see what happened in this Debate. My right hon. Friend, with all the authority that belongs to his position, to his character, and to his personal knowledge of what occurred, has come forward, and addressed to the Government five or six distinct challenges and charges of unconstitutional and illegal conduct. How did the Government attempt to meet that? They met it by one of the platform harangues with which we are so familiar, and for which we are so grateful. They mainly contribute to our success at by-elections. I have always regarded the presence of the hon. Member for South Tyrone as worth some four or five hundred votes against the cause which he represents. Does the professional defender of the Government deny the particular charges which have been made? Not at all. He says, "These were very bad men, they deserved to be punished, and it does not signify how you punish them." That is the issue on which the House is to vote to-night. It is as if we charged the Government with having hanged a man without trial, and we were told, "Oh! he is such a bad man, what does it signify whether he was tried or not." That is the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, which is adopted by Her Majesty's Government, who are not prepared to say a single word in answer to these definite charges of unconstitutional conduct. Those are the charges which are about to be tried at the next election. The charges against the Government are that, in their determination to crush their foes, they have not scrupled in the administration of Ireland over and over again, week by week, month by month, to violate every principle on which English liberty is founded. The Chief Secretary, not being able, and consequently not being willing, to meet those charges, thinks it better to denounce my right hon. Friend for conduct which he says was unworthy of a Privy Councillor. Why do you not take the course a former Tory Government took, when they struck Mr. Fox off the list of Privy Councillors? Why do you not take that course, and have the courage of your opinions? Why do you not do what George III. did when he struck the Duke of Devonshire off the roll of Privy Councillors for daring to defend the liberties of the people? That was in the days of the ancestors of my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale. But what is the use of coming down to this House, and saying that my right hon. Friend is not right and is not performing his duty when he goes to Ireland to see how you are administering the law, and comes before the House to testify against you, to challenge the opinion of this House and of the country, and to charge you with being guilty of this conduct? What are the charges, and how have you met them? First of all, reference was made to my hon. Friend the Member for Mayo, about whom you have been so anxious and whom you are so proud to imprison—it is highly convenient to you just when the discussion on the Land Bill is coming on—and much good may it do you. I have my own opinion as to why that prosecution was delayed for 12 months, and brought 12 months after the offences were committed. But what is the charge made? That you instructed your police officer to go to a man who was addressing his own constituents, and tell him that if he said anything that in the judgment of that constable was illegal, he would disperse the assembly. I should like you to send a police constable down to the town I represent, or to the town which the Chief Secretary represents—the town of Manchester—to say, “I am the judge of the language your Representative shall address to you, and if in my opinion that language is illegal, then I will disperse your assembly.”

Sir W. Harcourt

Now, I know very well what the General Election will say to such a doctrine as that. That is one of the points, and that is the manner in which Ireland is treated and in which you deal with the Representatives of the constituencies of Ireland. You do not wait till you have heard what they say. What was the defence of the Chief Secretary? He said, “Had we not good reason to believe that Mr. Dillon would say something illegal?” These are the principles of English liberty! Is a Chief Secretary to tell a police constable to form his own opinion of what a Member of Parliament is likely to say to his own constituents and order the constable to prevent his saying what he chooses to them? These are the doctrines of the Tories. The Secretary for Ireland says these are doctrines as to which we will take the opinion of the people of England at the next election. That is the first charge, that is the spirit in which the government of Ireland is conducted. Well, then, the right hon. Gentleman says this is a most trivial thing to bring forward. He says there were only a few heads broken. It does not depend upon the amount of heads broken. It depends upon the amount of law broken. It depends upon the legality of the transaction. An assault in law may consist in a simple touch, and an assault upon liberty does not depend upon the number of heads broken, but upon the spirit of the Government that makes it. If the tax demanded from Hampden had been only 6d., would it have been a trivial question whether the Government should be allowed to commit an illegal act? That is the spirit of the defence offered by the Government. Now, what have you been charged with? The right hon. Gentleman says, “Oh, I cannot discuss the conduct of the police because it is sub judice.” He discussed it on the platform before his supporters. He instructed the Removable Magistrates as to what judgment they were to come to, but when he is charged with the same thing in the House of Commons, he shelters himself under the plea that the matter is sub judice, and will not answer the charge. I do not call that a frank or a courageous way for the Government to meet a charge like this. What is the charge against the police? That they, being as numerous, or more numerous, than the crowd, as it is called, dispersed that crowd without any legal right to do so. I say that is a monstrous and unconstitutional proceeding. It is one that ought to be condemned, and we will condemn it to-night. What pretext has been offered? Every sort of excuse has been made. It is said that the crowd was interfering with the escort. There is no foundation for that. There is not a particle of proof of it, or any ground for accepting it as an excuse. Every excuse the Chief Secretary has put forward has been proved to be untrue—I do not mean to his knowledge, but to the knowledge of those who inform him. Then there was another charge, a definite charge—that of refusing admittance to the Court. What excuse is offered for that? The Chief Secretary and his constables claim the right to divine what is in the minds of the people who claim a right to go into a Court of Justice. That is not the law of England or the law of Ireland. Any man, unless you have some good ground for believing and knowing that he is about to misconduct himself, or has misconducted himself, has a right to go into an open Court of Justice, if there is room for him. The police pretended, first of all, that there was no room in the Court. There is not a particle of foundation for the allegation on which it has been attempted to defend these proceedings. The allegation has been proved to be absolutely untrue, and the attack made by the police was absolutely without any excuse or justification. The right hon. Gentleman says this is a trivial matter. If it had been an incidental matter—a case of mere misjudgment on the part of the police—I would at once admit that it would not be a ground for a Vote of Censure. But this is not the case. Our complaint is that every transaction of this kind is encouraged and sanctioned by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It is because the right hon. Gentleman has, as my right hon. Friend has said, demoralised the police, and encouraged them in illegal acts by never cautioning them to abstain from illegal acts, that this has become so grave a matter—because he has led Magistrates and police to believe that no matter what they do they are sure to meet with his approval. This is why we have thought it our duty to protest against it in the House of Commons. I venture to say that in respect of these three charges the right hon. Gentleman has not only made no answer, but he has not even attempted to make any. What is the next charge? That he departs from the regular course in the administration of justice, and selects men to sit on the Bench, just as he packs a jury in order to secure a conviction. Then there comes the case of Mr. Shannon. The right hon. Gentleman has entirely evaded the gist of the charge. We had a very able speech, which I listened to with very great pleasure from a young Member of this House, the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Wyndham)—a speech of great ability and promise. The hon. Member told us that Mr. Shannon had won all sorts of University distinctions. What has that to do with the case? The charge is that you selected a particular individual whom you knew, and must have known, to be on terms of personal enmity with the person he had to try. A more indecent, improper, and unjustifiable proceeding no Government was ever guilty of. Now, as to the tribunal, as distinguished from the individuals upon it. You might have sent these cases—grave cases, as you show by the manner in which you treat them, complicated cases for the Law of Conspiracy was involved—you might have sent them before the highest Judges of the land to be tried by juries who, the hon. Member for South Tyrone says, have not failed recently to do their duty; but instead of taking that course, you trust this trial upon the Plan of Campaign to two Magistrates selected by yourselves, men who were personally affected against the prisoners. That is the charge which we have brought against you, and to which you have made no answer at all. It is not the question whether the Plan of Campaign was right or wrong. I will admit, for the purpose of argument, that these men were the greatest offenders in the world, that the crimes which they had committed were the most heinous; but I say, whatever their crimes were, they were entitled by the law of this country to a fair trial. One of the charges against you, then, is that you packed your tribunal in order to secure a conviction against these men, whom you assert to have been guilty of heinous crimes. But if you believe that they were guilty of heinous crimes, why did not you bring them before a fitting tribunal—the Judges of the land? Why did not you give them trial by jury, to which they were entitled? I desire to bring clearly before the House the issue upon which we are going to divide. The hon. Member for South Tyrone, acting in the interests of the Government, has endeavoured to obscure that issue, but he will not obscure it in the eyes of the country. We have said that the exceptional law which you have obtained is administered in a harsh and illegal manner; we have said that you have perpetually encouraged your police and Magistrates to violate the law. That is the charge, and it has nothing whatever to do with your general policy or with the merits or demerits of the Plan of Campaign. The character of the law depends upon its administration and the spirit in which it is administered. Even a bad law well administered may operate less injuriously than a good law administered unscrupulously. You say that you have delivered Ireland by your policy. Well, Ireland must be a very ungrateful country, for I know no part of that country and no Party in that country that is willing to welcome its deliverers. We have heard of divisions amongst the Irish Party, and we had an election the other day at which there were two candidates; but why did not the Chief Secretary for Ireland offer himself as a third candidate, in order that the people whom he had emancipated might have an opportunity of voting for the man who had restored them to freedom? Even the First Lord of the Treasury, who for 24 hours was Secretary for Ireland, and who to-night gallantly came forward to explain a case about which he had no information—his courage would not fail him. Why did not he go and present himself as a candidate for Tipperary? If he would do so now I have no doubt that a vacancy would be made for him, and he might go and present himself to a grateful people as one of the men who had restored to them that freedom for which they were longing. Do you suppose this feeling exists in Ireland only? England also laughs at your pretences, at this freedom of yours of which you are so proud, which you carry out by the illegal violence of the police and by packed Benches of Magistrates. You may depend upon it that freedom of that kind is as alien to the sentiments of the English as to those of the Irish people. I can assure right hon. Gentlemen opposite that we shall be very willing at the General Election to submit to the electors the charges which the Government have not dared, and which you have not been able, to meet to-night.

*(12.19.) MR. J. McCARTHY (Londonderry): I shall not stand long between the House and the Division. In the first instance, I will endorse the suggestion just made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and I will undertake with great satisfaction to find a place for a contest in Ireland if any gentleman on the Treasury Bench proud of having delivered Ireland from the toils of the Nationalists will go over to Ireland to meet his reward. The hon. Member for Dover, in a speech which I listened to with interest and even admiration, has vindicated the appointment of Mr. Shannon on the ground that he obtained a gold medal for rhetoric—a curious qualification for a Police Magistrate, and a stranger reason why he should act as such against a personal opponent. If the Chief Secretary has not obtained a gold medal for rhetoric his speech of this evening entitles him to a bronze medal, because more than any preceding speech of the right hon. Gentleman the speech consisted of rhetoric which had nothing to do with the question. There was not a single word in that long speech of denunciation and prophecy which touched the plain, bare facts brought forward by the right hon. Member for Newcastle. The Chief Secretary could only give us that form of rhetoric known as the tu quoque argument—a form of argument which, often as it has been used before, has never been used so ineffectively as when adopted to justify the contention “What a bad man the prisoner was! It does not matter how the Court be constituted or whether the Judge be unjust, we knew beforehand that the accused man was a dangerous person." The Chief Secretary has gone into all kinds of suppositions. He said it was the duty of the police to clear away from the Court-house a drunken mob; and then he added that he did not say the mob was drunk, but admitted it was sober. Well, then, what is the use of speaking of a drunken mob? In the same way, when the right hon. Gentleman fancies that men may be inclined to make some violent speeches, he thinks it is only right to meet them half way. But what surprised me most of all was to hear the right hon. Gentleman find fault with anyone who would deal with cases still awaiting trial. The House has heard the right hon. Gentleman time after time, when cases in which the police are concerned have been coming under judicial investigation, defend everything that the police has done, sustaining it with all the force of his authority and influence. I do not think that a speech of the kind the right hon. Gentleman has made to-night will carry much weight, even with the present House of Commons. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last that it is rather a pity that we have not had some expression of absolutely independent opinion, as it is called, on this question. I would like to have heard an expression of opinion on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman from Members who once belonged to the Liberal Party, and who raged and chafed against coercion at one time. I would like to have heard what one of them thinks of the defence by the right hon. Gentleman of the Removable Magistrates to-night. Even the hon. Member below me, the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham, would be better than nothing. But we have heard not a word from them; they prefer to record their votes for the Government in silence. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary spoke of a certain class of people whose conscience was the creature of a General Election. I am inclined to join with him in the reprobation he cast upon them. I remember certain persons opposite whose conscience in the cause of Ireland was distinctly the creation of a General Election. At that time they shuddered at the idea of coercion; their consciences pricked them until certain eminent Members of their body found themselves goaded so far as to make them willing to go on the Home Rule question all the length desired by certain members of my Party and myself. Now, the right hon. Gentleman indulged largely in prophecy. I do not propose to follow his example. I shall only be prophetic to this extent: that if the time should come when another General Election gives them a small majority—I do not think it will be even so favourable to them—their consciences will once more induce them to put themselves forward as the true and devoted friends of the Irish people.

(12.22.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I quite understand the wish of hon. Members opposite not to be detained long at this hour of the night, but I am anxious to bring their minds back to the exact question upon which we are going to divide. I am driven to do this by the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. Nothing could have given me greater satisfaction than that this Debate should have occurred, but I must say that it reminds me of the sword and buckler fights that used to occur in Alsatia in Queen Elizabeth's reign, when the combatants took care to strike each other's shields and helmets rather than each other's bodies. I could not help reflecting that, as Latin used to be got into the heads of boys by the blood of their backs, so an ex-Cabinet Minister, by coming aux prises with the police, has suddenly become imbued with zeal for the liberty of the public. All this energy, all this passion and fury, all this good argument the House has listened to from the various right hon. Gentlemen has been a little discounted in my opinion—and I know that the House will acquit me of being censorious when I think of so many grand opportunities in this country which have been omitted by those same right hon. Gentlemen of bringing forward similar Motions, when on similar occasions popular leaders, conductors of Trade Unions and others have been treated in this country, in which there is no Coercion Act, in an even worse fashion than those Irish Members and their followers. I fancy that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby had an air of protesting too much in this matter. There came to my mind a similar occasion when precisely similar circumstances arose here in London, when a Member of Parliament was submitted to precisely the same treatment. Hon. Members will acquit me of whining against that treatment—I knew what I had to expect, and I got it. But an hon. Member of this House was subjected to precisely the same treatment when, in my opinion, the police acted in as illegal, and perhaps more illegal fashion, and when the right hon. Member for Newcastle, that tribune of the Irish people, sat glued to his seat, when no persuasion, no hecklings, no sneers in the newspapers or lack of confidence by the public had the effect of drawing him out to say one word, because there was a great middle-class shopkeeper vote running the chance of being lost or imperilled here in London. Perhaps I do the right hon. Gentleman an injustice. He was perusing, or peradventure sleeping, or engaged in compiling duodecimo editions of the lives of those great men which have instructed us so much. Within the period of the last 18 months, in Liverpool, in Glasgow, in Cardiff, and various other places, labour leaders have been assailed by the police, meetings have been charged and broken up by them, and not one word of protest, as far as I am aware—I hope that I do the right hon. Gentleman an injustice—has been raised by right hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, because I suppose they were running to the tape to learn the latest news of the Tipperary or Kilkenny elections. I assure the Irish Members that in speaking thus I do not speak in a manner hostile to either of their causes. I am assured by an hon. Member near me that he does not want my assurance. It is by the votes of the English working classes that Home Rule will be won, and I certainly speak for a section of that class. I believe the Opposition have brought this question forward merely as a stalking horse, which they hope will shield them from those social questions which are arising in England, and which they try to ignore by amusing themselves with Tipperary and Kilkenny.

Mr. Cunningham Graham

(12.52.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The Government majority are so much pleased with their success in regard to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman that they will be most happy to devote some more time to debate with the object of affirming the congratulatory Motion of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). It seems to me most important and essential that further time should be allowed for its discussion. As far as I can remember, the only gentlemen connected with Ireland who have spoken in this Debate have been two or three. I do not think an hour has been occupied in presenting the Irish view of this question, and the Government really cannot expect us to allow the Resolution, which is one of first-class importance, to be affirmed without further Debate. They cannot expect us, who regard this matter as more than a mere formula to sit still with muzzled mouths as if we had been subjected to the rule of the Closure, when a Motion affirming that we are delighted with your proceedings is before the House. We are not delighted with them, and if you want to mark up in chalk numbers satisfaction with your proceedings you must pay for it in coin consisting of the time of this House. The Motion of the hon. Member for Newcastle was a distinct Motion limited to a particular subject. You chose to enlarge the ambit of the Debate, to put embroidery on it, and to do that, not by the medium of one of your own Members, but by one of the sling-behind-your-back. Three of these gentlemen are always behind your back. You get one of these back-a-behind gentlemen to move a Motion which not one of the Tory Party had the courage to move for himself. We have not even had the Liberal Unionist view of the question. I did not think the hon. Member for South Tyrone could do anything without his wires being pulled by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale, but the noble Lord has been silent. Where, too, is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham? Are we to understand the Member for South Tyrone can act, can dance without his strings being pulled by the Member for West Birmingham? As yet not a word has been said upon the principle of the Motion of the hon. Member for South Tyrone except what he has said himself. I am sure that not only will the House not feel surprised, but will be satisfied and delighted at the Motion which I have now the honour to make, which I see the First Lord anticipates with a smile, and under which the Chief Secretary looks absolutely happy. I think that, under all the circumstances of the case, the proper way to meet the Motion of the hon. Member for South Tyrone is to move that the Debate be now adjourned, and I have the honour to make that Motion.

(12.59.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I rise to second the Motion. In my opinion, it is not only a most reasonable, but a most necessary, Motion. If the Government, having been challenged upon a Vote of Censure, had had the courage to meet it face to face frankly they would have negatived the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle; but, instead of that, they have gone and skulked under the gabardine of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. What is the Amendment we are asked to vote without discussion? This Amendment has absolutely nothing to do with the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. It says: "True; it may be that all you have said is perfectly well founded, but because we admire the Government, and for other reasons, therefore we will not censure them." But, if so, let us discuss this claim to admiration for the Government, which is raised as a perfectly new issue by the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. There has been no Debate on the Amendment which is not germane to the Resolution. Both Irish and English Members have a right to debate that Resolution before it is put on the Journals of the House. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite may, if they choose, try the Closure on a question of confidence. If they do, they will achieve a position which no responsible Government has ever occupied in this House. If my hon. Friend goes to a Division I shall support him.

*(1.2.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The position taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby is a little surprising. His leader complained that we were discussing the Amendment, and his charge against the Government was that they supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone in order to draw a red herring across the scent of the discussion upon the Motion of Censure of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle gave notice; but then comes the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and says that Amendment has not been discussed at all, and that it would be a monstrous thing for the House to pass a Vote of Confidence in the Government when the only question discussed has been one on which the House, by a majority of 75, declined to pass a Vote of Want of Confidence in the Government. The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that the Amendment had been on the Paper for a week, and every Member who spoke knew what it was he was speaking upon, as did the right hon. Gentleman himself.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I never said a word on the Amendment.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman addressed himself to the Debate as it had gone forward, and early in the Debate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian referred specially to the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. What was the understanding? That we should come to a decision to-night on the Vote of Censure proposed by the right hon. Member for Newcastle, which was to be met by the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. That was a distinct understanding. It is a new thing for hon. Gentlemen who have been met by a majority such as has been displayed to refuse to make further progress in the ratification of the judgment of the House, and say they must have more time. The hon. Member for Longford has invited me to walk into his parlour, but I am sure the hon. Member would not be surprised if I decline to follow him. I must ask the House to ratify the judgment it has just expressed, and to add the words to the fragment of the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle which now remains on the Journals of the House.

(1.5.) SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): The Leader of the House is quite justified in saying that the House has refused, by a majority of 75, to pass a Vote of Censure on the Government, but the House has not said it is prepared to offer a universal benediction to all the proceedings of the Government. I think the Leader of the House is in error in the suggestion he made as to the view of the argument of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian. It is true my right hon. Friend did refer to the Amendment, but only for the express purpose of pointing out that it was no answer to the original Motion.

(1.6.) MR. J. REDMOND: I join in pressing upon the Government the advisability of permitting a continuance of this Debate. I have heard from the Leader of the House a statement about an understanding, but I may say that for my part I know of no understanding entered into which would preclude Irish Members from debating the matter fully. The Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle raised a clear, definite and limited issue, and he did not by the terms of his Resolution raise any issue as to the merits of the transactions out of which the Tipperary prosecutions sprang. As I understood the Motion, it simply raised the question of certain proceedings of the Executive in connection with those prosecutions. But the hon. Member for South Tyrone has dragged in by his Amendment the extra matter out of which these prosecutions sprang; he has given his version of the facts and it would be a monstrous thing if we, who have a better knowledge of the facts, should be compelled to assent to this Amendment without further Debate. This Amendment opens far wider issues than the original Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. I sincerely trust the Motion for adjournment will be pressed and I think the Leader of the House would be consulting the general convenience and would be only acting fairly towards those who are best acquainted with the proceedings referred to in the Amendment and desire to take part in the Debate, to agree to the adjournment of the discussion upon a Motion for which the Government are really responsible.

(1.9.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As reference has been made to an understanding arrived at, it is well that it should be made clear that none of the Members in this part of the House are responsible for any arrangement as to the time to be occupied in this Debate. I need only remind the House of what took place at question time to-day, when the Leader of the House was pressed to say if he would yield to a substantial desire that the Debate should not close to-night but be allowed to go over to Thursday. I think it must be admitted there is just cogency in the argument that the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone raises a much broader issue than that of the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, and it would be most unfair to ask the House to accept it without further discussion. It will be observed that the Amendment departs entirely from the terms of the original Motion, and though the right hon. Gentleman has amiably declined to accept the invitation to walk into the parlour of my hon. Friend, a little reflection will show that the invitation is of such a pressing nature he can scarcely refuse it. It will be observed that as the result of the last Division the House has decided to leave out certain words, and before us now is the question whether certain words proposed by the hon. Member for South Tyrone shall be added. It will be apparent that it is open to us to move to amend the proposed words by insertions in any part, or additions at the end; and though I do not wish now to introduce such matters of controversy, it will be seen that the words proposed by the hon. Member are happily adapted to various and extensive Amendments. Under the circumstances, I think the right hon. Gentleman, unless he is prepared to apply the Closure on the first night of a Debate upon a Vote of Censure, will accede to the reasonable demand made by my hon. Friend.

(1.14.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I suppose if the Government are anxious to make an all-night sitting of it the only objections will arise from among their own supporters. Such is likely to be the result if the right hon. Gentleman persists in his refusal to accept the reasonable proposition made, and it is for him to consider whether such a proceeding will best conduce to expediting public business. I wish to endorse what has been said by my hon. Friend behind me as to there being an undertaking that Debate should close to-night. I protest against this undertaking being cast in our teeth. We recognise no such time bargains below the Gangway, and I distinctly decline to be bound by any engagement entered into by the Whips on the two Front Benches. The right hon. Gentleman must be prepared to meet Amendment after Amendment to the Motion in its new form. There is no reason why the question should be disposed of in a hurry, and the original intention was that the Debate should not close until Thursday. It was only to meet some supposed exigencies of Members on this side that there was any idea of closing the Debate to-night, and as those exigencies have passed away, there is no longer a sufficient motive for closing the Debate to-night. We cannot be justly charged with any disinclination to forward public business, for we stand in an almost unprecedented position as regards public business, and the Government have deliberately wasted time, partly by allowing the House to be counted out and partly by placing before us trivial and unimportant matters. It is ridiculous to pretend there is any pressing urgency for this Debate to close to-night. Whatever may be the result of this Motion for adjournment, I hope hon. Members on this side will make up their minds to the enjoyment of an all-night sitting in resistance to the attempt to thrust this Amendment upon the House. Few Members on this side have taken part in the Debate, most of the time having been occupied in lengthy speeches from the hon. Member for South Tyrone, the Chief Secretary and others; and considering that only three Irish Members have spoken and no English Radical Member from below the Gangway, it is obvious that there is ample material for further Debate.

(1.20.) MR. J. MORLEY: On this occasion, as on many others, there are three courses that may be taken. The Debate may be adjourned or it may be continued, or it may be closed. To continue the Debate at this hour would be extremely inconvenient. To closure it would be almost impossible. The Resolution before the House is practically a new Motion. It is a new question submitted to the House, and that question ought clearly to be susceptible of Amendment. If hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway should think fit to move an Amendment, rightly or wrongly, it is surely their right to do so. It seems clear, therefore, that to resort to the Closure would be without precedent and could not reasonably be defended. The only remaining course then is to adjourn the Debate.

(1.21.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Motion now before the House relates more particularly to myself than to other Members of the Government. May I, then, remind the House of that which appears to be systematically ignored, that the arrangement that we should divide to-night upon the whole matter was arrived at by those well recognised means of communication between parties in this House? I do not know how far the ordinary channels of communication with the Irish Members have been dislocated: there may have been some mistake as far as the Irish Members are concerned; but undoubtedly there was a distinct understanding with the Front Opposition Bench. I cannot see how the Parliamentary Business of the future is to be conducted if understandings of this kind are to be abandoned upon any flimsy pretext. If the House will be at all guided by me, I would say that the matter is not worth wrangling about. The Vote of Censure having been negatived by an overwhelming majority, it is a matter of perfect indifference to me whether the House passes an Amendment eulogising the conduct of the Government. The point is not worth wrangling about, and the sooner we go home to bed the better; but I would earnestly suggest to those who are responsible for the conduct of the business of the House outside the Government Benches that this kind of procedure—I will not call it sharp practice—this departure from honourable understanding, is a bad precedent, and will certainly lead to inconvenience in the future.

*(1.24.) MR. ARNOLD MORLEY (Nottingham, E.): I must apologise for intervening in this discussion, because Members of the House occupying the position I do are not usually called upon to address the House upon these topics; and I only depart from the usual custom out of respect to hon. Members, to state what happened on this occasion. For five years I have been accustomed to meet the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury, and make arrangements with him; and I do not believe that he will suggest there has ever been any breach of good faith between us. The original intention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle was to raise a Debate of a far more extended character than that indicated by his Motion, and hon. Members will remember that at that time two days were allotted to the Debate; but when the Motion was limited in its scope, I did inform the hon. Gentleman the Patronage Secretary that the right hon. Member for Newcastle intended to confine himself to the Tipperary incidents, and, so far as the Front Opposition Bench was concerned, it was believed one night would be sufficient for the Debate. But I stated that, of course, events might happen in the course of the Debate which would render an extension of time necessary, although, as far as the Motion itself was concerned, one night would be sufficient. As the House is well aware, upon that Motion an Amendment has been moved. The arrangement was that a Division on the Motion of my right hon. Friend should be taken at the end of the first night's Debate, and it has been taken a few minutes ago.

(1.26.) MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's): I was not in the House when my hon. Friend rose, and I did not hear his opening remarks, but I certainly understood that the arrangement was to be applied to the whole of the Debate, both on the Motion and on the Amendment which was then on the Paper. I certainly should have demurred to any understanding which would have divided the two. I certainly understood my hon. Friend to mean that the whole question was to be decided to-night, and that is borne out by the fact that the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone was on the Paper at the time the arrangement was made.

(1.27.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I suppose we are now to understand from the remarks of the Chief Secretary that the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, having served its purpose, is to be thrown overboard? But for the tortuous policy pursued this difficulty would not have arisen. But I suppose we may be now satisfied as well as the hon. Member for South Tyrone.

(1.28.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I can only speak with the leave of the House, but may I say that I thought the Motion for Adjournment was agreed to by the Government. I am ready to withdraw my Motion if I understand the hon. Member for South Tyrone withdraws his Amendment.

(1.28.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I can only say my Amendment is before the House; the House can do what it likes with it, but I shall certainly not withdraw it.

(1.30.) Question put, and agreed to.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.—(No. 182.)

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

(1.37.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The hon. and learned Attorney General has brought in this Bill for four years in succession, and he has never succeeded in carrying it, because he has not tried to meet the views of hon. Members from Ireland. We are all most anxious that some Bill of this kind should be passed. In Ireland there is a series of decisions such as is utterly unknown and I believe is abhorrent to the English law. If this Bill is pressed forward in its present shape we will move Amendment after Amendment of capital importance, so that it will again become impossible for the hon. and learned Gentleman to pass it. I will therefore ask him and the Attorney General for Ireland to be good enough to study the extraordinary decisions that have been given in Ireland, and to endeavour to make the law in that country conformable with good sense.

(1.38.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am not aware that there are any decisions in Ireland conflicting with the scope of this Bill. Of course if there are such decisions I will look into the matter.

(1.39.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): This Bill—as I mentioned to the House the other night—will do a great deal more in the way of disenfranchisement than it will do in the way of enfranchisement, and it will be my duty to put down Amendments. I have put down some to-night, and I hope to put down others later on. In view of the statement now made by the hon. Member for Longford that the Bill does not meet with unanimous approval, we must object to its being rushed through, and must claim time to consider important Amendments.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL.

[H.L.]—(No. 177.)

Order for Committee read.

(1.42.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to move that this House do now adjourn.

MR. SPEAKER: It is impossible to move the adjournment of the House before the Orders are disposed of, unless the Government make the Motion,

MR. H. H. FOWLER (who spoke amid cries of "Order!"): I desire to raise a question of principle. There is a distinct understanding that our proceedings shall terminate at 1 o'clock. The Standing Orders have been suspended in order to allow the Debate on the Vote of Censure to conclude, but it is now nearly 2 o'clock. I know it is for the convenience of the Officials of the House that the Orders of the day should be disposed of, but it is now 20 minutes to 2 o'clock, and the House, in passing the Standing Order with regard to the 12 o'clock Rule, has not intended that the sitting shall be prolonged beyond 1 o'clock. To sit later is breaking faith with the House as to this Order. I differ, and always have done, from the construction placed on the Standing Order. I have maintained—though I know I am wrong—that the House should adjourn at 1 o'clock, and that it ought to be impossible for us to be sitting here at nearly 2 o'clock giving hon. Members an opportunity for advancing Bills which are opposed by hon. Members who are absent. Unless you take the strong course, Sir, of ruling me out of order—

*(1.45.) MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to talk about my taking a "strong course" in my interpretation of the Standing Orders. The Standing Order that guides me is that which provides that after any business exempted from the Standing Order "Sittings of the House" is disposed of, the business remaining on the Paper shall be dealt with under rules applicable to the ordinary proceedings of the House after 12 o'clock. That is to say, business will proceed unless objection is taken, such objection being sufficient to arrest further progress. When an Order of the Day stands for Committee I am bound to leave the Chair without putting any question, therefore, in a certain sense, a Bill which goes into Committee for the first time is advanced a stage.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I did not mean, Sir, to place the same construction on the words "strong course" which you have very justly put upon them, and I at once withdraw them. But what I want to ask is whether it is not competent for any Member after 12 o'clock to move that the House do now adjourn.

MR. SPEAKER: It is competent, no doubt, to make that Motion between two orders of the day.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): We are all indebted to you, Sir, for the wisdom of your rulings. I would point out that when the House goes into Committee and Mr. Courtney is in the Chair the Motion to bring business to a termination is that the Chairman report Progress, and I would ask whether, if a Member were to move that the Chairman leave the Chair, that would not have the effect of setting up the Order in its old place? But then comes the point; how can a Member move that if it is objected to? Should not objection be taken before the Committee stage is reached?

*MR. SPEAKER: The first question would be to report Progress, and on that the Bill would be deferred, if objection were taken.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): The next Order on the Paper is the Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill. Should I not be in order in moving that the House do now adjourn?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member can take the opinion of the House on that question.

MR. CONYBEARE: Then I make the Motion, that the House do now adjourn. [Cries of "No."]

*MR. SPEAKER: The Motion is objected to. I cannot put it.

Committee deferred till Thursday.

COMMONS.

Ordered (Feb. 13)—

That a Select Committee be appointed to consider every Report made by the Board of Agriculture, certifying the expediency of any Provisional Order for the enclosure or regulation of a Common, and presented to the House during the last or present Sessions, before a Bill be brought in for the confirmation of such Order.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power, in respect of each such Provisional Order, to inquire and Report to the House whether the same should be confirmed by Parliament; and, if so, whether with or without modification, and, in the event of their being of opinion that the same should not be confirmed, except subject to modifications, to report such modifications accordingly with a view to such Provisional Order being remitted to the Board of Agriculture.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Twelve Members, Seven to be nominated by the House, and Five by the Committee of Selection.

Sir Walter Barttelot, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Walter James, Mr. Jeffreys, Mr. Roche, Mr. Story-Maskelyne, and Mr. Wroughton were accordingly nominated Members of the said Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN BILL [LORDS.]

Bill read the first time; to be read a second time upon Thursday next, and to be printed. [Bill 216.]

CHARITABLE TRUSTS BILL.—(No 129.)

Order for Second Reading upon Tuesday, 17th March, read and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

It being after One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Tuesday, 17th February, 1891.*INTERMEDIATE SCHOOLS, &c., SITES BILL (H.L.).—(No. 3.)Committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE BILL (H.L.).
(No. 37.)Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, it seems somewhat superfluous in me, after now some years of disappointment, to raise this question again. The noble Marquess at the head of the Government gave me two days at the time of the introduction of the Representation of the People Bill, so that I was enabled to introduce an Amendment which would have made all other Bills on the subject unnecessary. In 1886 I ventured to trouble the House on the subject. I was most courteously treated by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and I wished that nothing but his Lordship's speech should appear in the Report, but Mr. Hansard insisted upon reporting the whole of my speech, whether I wished it or not. I would remind your Lordships of the way in which this question has been dealt with in India. On one occasion I laid on the Table of the House a measure upon which M. Bignon had made a speech in the French Chamber of Deputies as to the persecution of women, and I know that that was extensively circulated. On this occasion I shall lay upon the Table of the House the report of an address to the Under-graduates of the Madras University by the Principal of the College there. The words which he uses are most impressive. He says: "To educate men you must also educate women." This, my Lords, is a very comprehensive Bill, and it would do away with the necessity for another which I introduced with regard to the power of women to vote at Municipal elections in Ireland, because it embodies that power. In reference to that measure, I could only get an answer two years in succession, from the

VOL. CCCL. [THIRD SERIES.]

Lord Privy Seal that it was intended to introduce a very extensive measure of local government for Ireland. That measure has not yet appeared. The late Duke of Buckingham said that it was a step in advance towards women's suffrage, but it appears to me that was a very great mistake, because no woman with a £10 ownership could have the privilege of voting. But I have not been careless of the effect of this measure, because I do not forget that in the Local Government Act there will be a triennial election for all County Councils. It was a very great evil that the hasty way in which the former Bill was passed prevented all due consideration by your Lordships' House of that measure. A speech was made for me by the reporters, not one word of which did I utter. However, the opinion of the majority of the House was in favour of the measure. I am not going into that question again. The system adopted in reference to the Grand Committees impairs the usefulness of every Member of this House, and your Lordships have not the same control as if you were satisfied in Committee of the whole House. It is open now, through the great and useful change in the Standing Orders, for noble Lords to say whether matters shall be so dealt with or not. It is a very narrow system to have these elections to Grand Committees; you do not know what they are doing, and it is impossible for business to be conducted on a sound basis unless every Member of the House has an opportunity of seeing what is done. I humbly venture to differ from the objection of the noble Marquess that measures affecting the interests of the other House of Parliament should not originate in this House. What was the Septennial Bill, which was originated by the ancestor of the Duke of Devonshire, in this House? That was a most useful measure, and if it were not that it exists we should have a General Election this year. Sometimes there is a difficulty with the Clerk of the Table about money Bills, but it is really not at all in accordance with the principles of the Constitution. I may remind your Lordships that one most important measure was a money Bill, because it gave a salary to six paid members of the Judicial Committee. I trust that if Mr. Haldane's Bill comes to this House it will have due consideration.

2 H

I think that every Bill should have the fullest consideration from this House by whomsoever it may be introduced. I am at very great disadvantage in bringing forward this question. I have been always blamed for doing so; but at the same time I thought I obtained the great support of Lord Carnarvon and Lord Wentworth, and I certainly was not without a teller. But I am not one to be discouraged by being alone in any measure that I venture to advocate. The abrogation of Standing Orders by Resolution has been an evil in this House since the year 1856. Both sides of the House agreed in passing measures which afterwards fell to the ground. But it is not known at the time what noble Lords are present in the House, that can only be ascertained from the Journals of the House on the occasion of a Bill being carried to a division. I am really anxious that there should be reciprocity between the two Houses, and I believe it to be possible that we may by communication with each other very much shorten the duration of Sessions of Parliament. I am sorry again that this question will benefit nothing from the feeble advocacy by which I have endeavoured to support it. I may say in reference to the present Bill that I have ceased to receive petitions from duly qualified women, but I know that Miss Becker was particularly anxious that there should be agitation in the House of Commons in order to carry out this measure. Why should it be said that your Lordships are unwilling to allow women householders to vote if you admit ladies into the Gallery and treat them with courtesy? And surely they are better judges of the qualities of candidates for membership of Parliament than many who now have votes. We have given votes to our servants who occupy their own houses. In 1869 there was a change made as to the right of women to vote at Municipal elections, and more power was given them in unincorporate than in corporate towns. I humbly beg your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this measure, and I hope it is not presumptuous in me to suppose that you will carry it. I know from my correspondence with the noble Marquess that he would be desirous to equalise the Municipal franchise for all women. The lodger franchise is possessed by those who do not pay rates, but women are often householders paying rates and taxes. There is a question also as to married women voting. Certainly if women pay rates and taxes there should be no objection to their having votes. They have many duties in which they are associated with men. I believe also that they are strong political partisans. There would be much less difficulty in getting Irish enthusiasts to cease agitation if they could see that we know how to get rid of agitation ourselves. I am a very old man and I hope that nothing I have done will affect your decision in this matter. I feel that I have done my duty with impartiality in this respect. I have often heard Mrs. McLaren, the sister of John Bright, in Edinburgh, and Mrs. Fawcett in London, and I am sure that their counsels can always be acted upon although they do not wish to appear in Parliament themselves. In the old times the abbesses were represented in Parliament by proxies, and I am very sorry that proxies are no longer used in this House, because I think the opinion of the best men in the country is in favour of voting by proxy. However, that is past. I have introduced a measure against lengthened speeches and I hope I have not occupied your Lordships' time much beyond the hour when Debates formally begin. I beg to move that this Bill be now read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Lord Denman.)

*THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, there are very few subjects which the noble Lord has not touched upon in the course of his speech. I shall not imitate him in its discursive scope, but will confine myself to repeating the reason which I have previously had the honour of laying before your Lordships, for rejecting this Bill, that it is against the comity of Parliament for one House to undertake the reconstruction of the constitution of the other House. I should think it very unwise, and very unbecoming for us to set the example of departure from so wholesome a rule. Without expressing any opinion on the main question involved in the Bill. I beg to move that it be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now,") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On question, whether the word ("now") shall stand part of the motion, resolved in the negative; and Bill to be read 2^a this day six months.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT, 1888.
(MEDICAL OFFICERS OF HEALTH.)

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government as to the powers and duties of a Medical Officer of Health appointed by a County Council under Section 17 of the Local Government Act, 1888; and to move for a Return of the medical officers appointed, and the Councils appointing them; and also for a Return showing the representations, if any, made to the Local Government Board under Section 19 of the Act, and the results of such representations, said: My Lords, I rise to ask the noble Lord who represents the Local Government Board whether he can give me some definite information as to the powers and duties of Medical Officers of Health appointed by County Councils; and I should be glad if, at the same time, he could also give me some information as to the powers of the County Councils in the matter. We may be preternaturally stupid in requiring any information on the subject, but it appears to me it is very difficult to gather from the Local Government Act what the powers of medical officers appointed by the County Councils are, or what powers the County Councils themselves have. That Act states that the County Councils can appoint Medical Officers of Health, and it is provided that by arrangement with the District Councils their services can be rendered available; and pending the institution of District Councils they could make, I presume, some arrangements with the Urban or Rural Sanitary Authorities. But what those arrangements were, the Act does not specify, and it is impossible to find out. As far as I can gather from the Act, the only action the County Council can take on a Report of a Medical Officer of Health appointed by it would be similar to the action it can take in reference to the report of an ordinary district Medical Officer of Health; that is to say, it can make a representation to the Local Government Board. Of course, any other body or individual can make a representation to the Local Government Board. If an individual does so, the result I fancy generally is that he obtains a large amount of explanation to a minimum of action—the minimum amount of results which can be obtained from the maximum amount of correspondence. I do not mean to challenge the action of the Local Government Board in all cases, because if the Board were to exercise practical supervision over all bodies in all matters which may be brought before it, it would have an amount of work to do which it could not possibly perform. But if that is the only power which the County Councils have in the matter, I do not think they have the power they should possess. The County Councils should have the means of rendering their opinions effective, and it does not appear to me that what the powers of Medical Officers of Health are is at all apparent from the Act. I wish also to move for a Return of the medical officers appointed and the Councils appointing them; and also for a Return showing the representations, if any, made to the Local Government Board under Section 19 of the Act, and the results of such representations. I do not imagine the Return would be very voluminous, and I hope the noble Lord who represents the Local Government Board in this House will have no objection to granting it. If the noble Lord can give me, now, the information I want, I shall be very glad to receive it in that shape, instead of in the form of a Parliamentary Return.

*EARL STANHOPE: My Lords, this question of my noble Friend's seems to be a very practical one, and I trust that the Government will give the Return that he asks for. As far as I am aware, Section 17 of the Act has never been acted upon, and remains a dead letter. Living in a populous county, the County of Kent, I am able to state what is done there. The Medical Officer of Health is appointed by and for groups of Unions; he reports to those Unions separately, and they take action in the matter if they think fit; but, as far as I am aware neither in Kent nor in any other county has action been taken under Section 17. And, indeed, if action had been so taken, and medical officers had been appointed by each County Council in England, I am very doubtful whether any Report under Section 19 would have any effect whatever, because, as my noble Friend has pointed out, under Section 19 of the Act, only "a representation" can be made to the Local Government Board; but it does not say that any action can be taken by the Council. Being myself a member of the County Council of my county, I am anxious to know how far this clause has been acted upon, and I trust, therefore, that the Motion of the noble Lord for a Return on the subject will be assented to.

LORD THRING: I can state that in the case of our County Council, in the County of Surrey, at all events, a Medical Officer of Health has been appointed. I agree that the section requires amendment, and that the powers possessed by the medical officers must be put in proper form, and, as far as necessary, increased.

LORD HENNIKER: My Lords, in answer to the question of my noble Friend, asking what has been done under Sections 17 and 19 of the Local Government Act of 1888, it is quite true that under the 17th section of the Act, the County Councils have the power to appoint one or more Medical Officers of Health within their jurisdiction. The Local Government Board are aware that such appointments have been made by some of the County Councils, but there is no obligation whatever on the part of any of the Councils to report to the Local Government Board as to any appointments they make. We have, therefore, no complete list at the offices of the Local Government Board of the cases in which Medical Officers of Health have been appointed. The statute, too, does not in any way prescribe the duties which are to be performed by these officers; nor has the Local Government Board any power whatever to define their duties. In each case the duties must be such as the County Council may choose to lay down when making the appointment. I have no objection to offer on the part of Her Majesty's Government to the Motion of the noble Earl for the Return he asks for of the medical officers appointed, and of the County Councils appointing them under Section 17. Then as regards the question respecting Clause 19, as to representations that have been made to the Local Government Board under this section. Such representations by County Councils have been made from the West Riding of Yorkshire, and by the County Councils of Wiltshire, Surrey, West Suffolk and Durham. These representations have had reference in every case to the sanitary defects which have been specified in reports of the Local Medical Officers of Health. With respect to four of those districts, the Local Government Board have directed an inspection to be made by one of their Medical Inspectors. In other cases, they have been in correspondence with the Sanitary Authorities and with the County Councils. This correspondence is still proceeding in the majority of cases, with regard to the districts concerned. If the noble Earl wishes to move for a Return of these representations, as he suggests, I, on the part of the Local Government Board, will consent to their being granted; but while I give that consent, I must remind the noble Earl what I have said already, that the correspondence upon the subject is still very incomplete.

Earl Stanhope

LORD THRING: I would also ask the noble Lord whether the Government are not prepared to amend the section of the Local Government Act of 1888 relating to the duties of County Medical Officers of Health. At the present moment several counties—as I have said before, for example, the County of Surrey—have appointed these medical officers because they think it their duty in the interests of their counties to take a step towards improving the sanitary condition of the districts under their jurisdiction. But it is, I think, the duty of the Government to supply a manifest defect in the powers of the medical officers. No proper powers are conferred upon them. They ought to have jurisdiction given them over various sanitary matters. The extent of that jurisdiction is a question for Her Majesty's Government, and what I desire to ask the noble Lord is whether the Government are or are not prepared to amend the Act of 1888 for the purpose of extending and defining the duties of Medical Officers of Health.

LORD HENNIKER: I must ask my noble Friend the noble Lord opposite to give me notice of this question. I can hardly take upon myself to give him an answer to it without notice.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I should be glad to have the second of the Returns I desired as there is no objection made, because I think the correspondence which has been going on with the Local Government Board has been terminated for some time. I did not quite clearly understand the noble Lord as to whether he could give the Return which I first asked for as to the Medical Officers of Health that have been appointed by the County Councils, and of the County Councils who have appointed them. I understood him in the first instance to say that the Local Government Board had of necessity no cognisance of those appointments. Am I right in understanding that?

*LORD HENNIKER: Yes.

Ordered to be laid before the House,

"Return of the Medical Officers of Health appointed by County Councils under Section 17 of the Local Government Act, 1888, and the Councils appointing them; and Return showing the representations, if any, made to the Local Government Board under Section 19 of the Act, and the results of such representations."—(The Lord Kenry, E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERY QUESTION.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN in rising to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies when it is proposed to lay upon the Table of the House Papers relating to the fishery question in Newfoundland, said: I must apologise to your Lordships for intruding so much upon the golden silence which generally pervades this House, but I think this matter (which I will allude to very briefly) is of some importance. I will not for a moment go into the general question, more than a century old, of the difficulties with regard to French fishery rights in Newfoundland, and I will not touch upon the fascinating theme of the modus vivendi, or even indulge in a few remarks upon interesting questions in Natural History as to whether lobsters are fish or birds or wild beasts, or anything of that kind. Your Lordships will be aware that in Parliament, and I think throughout the country generally, or at any rate among those Members of Parliament and other individuals in the country who are aware of the existence of our Colonies, there has been considerable interest excited of late by accounts of a somewhat sensational character which have appeared in the newspapers. A great deal of excitement appears lately to have been raised in the Island of Newfoundland on the subject. I have seen extracts from the local papers, and from Canadian papers, stating, for instance, that it was proposed by Her Majesty's Government to cede absolutely to France a large portion of territory, a considerable peninsula in the Island of Newfoundland; and according to the newspapers the legislature in Newfoundland has quite recently passed Resolutions strongly condemning the whole action of Her Majesty's Government in refusing assent to a Bill to make operative certain provisions entered into by Newfoundland and the United States with the consent of Her Majesty's Government, and which were satisfying to Newfoundland. Those are matters important of themselves, and with which obviously great principles of local self-government and freedom are connected; and I think it would be well that some definite information upon the subject should be given—that Parliament and the nation should be put in the way of obtaining some information upon these points. If the noble Lord who represents the colonies can give information on these points, I shall be very glad. If on the other hand he considers it inadvisable, pending the production of Papers, to give information to the House, I can only say that I hope the correspondence upon this subject will be laid upon the Table of this House as soon as may be convenient. I would only add that in asking the question I wish to be clearly understood in saying that I should be the last man in the world to ask for any information the statement of which would be in the slightest degree premature, or that could in any way add the slightest difficulty to the very complicated matters, which have arisen out of this Newfoundland Fisheries question. If the Papers can be laid on the Table without any detriment to the public interest I trust that Her Majesty's Government will take the present opportunity of doing so.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): My Lords, I am not surprised at the noble

Earl's bringing this question before your Lordships. There can be no doubt of the importance of it. I think it hardly necessary to refute the rumours to which the noble Earl alluded with respect to Her Majesty's Government proposing cession of any part of the colony to France. I may inform him, in reply to his question, that Papers on the general questions affecting Newfoundland are in preparation, and will be laid on the Table, I hope, in a few days, in continuation of the Paper which was presented in June last with respect to these questions. I think the number was C, 6,044. As to the other point, the draft Convention between Newfoundland and the United States, I may also inform the noble Earl that we are preparing Papers to be laid before Parliament. But perhaps your Lordships will allow me to state that considerable misapprehension has arisen in Newfoundland as to the exact position of Her Majesty's Government with respect to that Convention, and that the misapprehension which prevails accounts for the Resolutions which I dare say your Lordships have seen in the newspapers, couched in very strong language and condemning Her Majesty's Government for having broken solemn engagements and obligations to sanction the convention. Let me say that there can be no breach of any solemn engagement or obligation, inasmuch as no such engagement or obligation has been entered into by Her Majesty's Government. I will explain to your Lordships how this misapprehension has arisen. There is no objection in principle to a separate negotiation between a foreign Power and an individual colony with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government. It may be quite possible in some cases to be able to secure to the colony the advantages which it desires, by an arrangement without interfering prejudicially with the interests of other parts of the Empire which are not parties to that arrangement. But the mere fact of consent being given by Her Majesty's Government for the time being to a colony to negotiate a separate arrangement is always subject to a well-understood and well-recognised principle, condition, and reservation, that when draft terms have been settled between the Representative of the colony and a foreign State, then Her Majesty's Government must consider those terms, and see how far they affect other interests, British or Colonial—that is to say, the leave given to negotiate does not carry with it an obligation or an engagement to sanction the arrangement when made. Now, it was subject to this well-understood condition that Her Majesty's Government, at the request of the Newfoundland Government, readily assented to Mr. Bond, who was one of the colonial delegates here, and who is also one of the Government of Newfoundland, going to Washington. The visit was unofficial. Mr. Bond had no instructions from Her Majesty's Government, but it was made for the purpose of communicating with Her Majesty's Minister at Washington to see what terms and what arrangement could be entered into which would be acceptable to the United States as well as to the colony. Certain terms were agreed upon and drafted, and then, as I have pointed out, it became the duty of Her Majesty's Government to consider those terms, and to see how far, if at all, they conflicted with the interests of other British colonies. Accordingly, the Government communicated with Canada, and the Dominion Government very strongly protested against that Convention being concluded. I will not now dwell upon the nature of that protest, or on the reasons which the Dominion Government advanced, because they will be found in the Papers which we shall very soon present to Parliament. But Her Majesty's Government, after full consideration, have arrived at the decision that the Convention, as to the feasibility of which Mr. Bond was permitted to consult informally with Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, cannot at the present time be concluded. In arriving at this decision Her Majesty's Government have broken no engagement or obligation; and I trust I have satisfied your Lordships on this point, and made it clear that it is a misapprehension as to the position of Her Majesty's Government that has brought down these very strong Resolutions of the Newfoundland Legislature condemning Her Majesty's Government.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I should like to ask the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies whether the correspondence with regard to this Convention is to be included in the Papers to be laid before us, because it would, of course, be very wrong and indeed impossible to form a judgment upon the matter without knowing precisely what form the negotiations took. I quite comprehend the position laid down by the noble Lord—namely, that all these agreements must be subject to the sanction and approval of Her Majesty's Government. At the same time, I am sure the noble Lord will agree with me that in order to prevent friction in negotiations which must always be very delicate in their nature, it is desirable to ascertain as far as possible beforehand, whether it is likely that the Convention which may be proposed is one which could be sanctioned. Of course points may arise afterwards which could not be anticipated or considered at first, but in these cases there is always very great danger of the colony, if they find that Government ultimately disapproves of what has been done, being very dissatisfied, and saying that it ought to be assented to. I quite agree with the principle which the noble Lord lays down, that Government could not beforehand pledge itself to accept any terms which may be arrived at in such circumstances; but I am sure the noble Lord will be of my opinion that it is necessary to avoid friction as far as possible. I entirely abstain from offering any opinion upon what has taken place except to regret that the Legislature of Newfoundland should have felt offended at what has occurred, but I shall be quite prepared to find that the noble Lord has done everything in the matter. My object in rising really was to ask the noble Lord whether those Papers can be included in those which will be presented to your Lordships.

LORD KNUTSFORD: I am afraid I did not quite make myself understood. I answered the Question put that the Papers on the general subject will be presented, and then also that the Papers relating to this Convention for which the noble Earl asks will be presented in a separate Paper. I fully recognise the importance of the remarks he has made, and I regret that there should have been any friction in this instance between ourselves and the colony, but I deny that we were in the wrong.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 17th February, 1891.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

WOLVERHAMPTON CORPORATION

BILL—(by Order).

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I do not rise now for the purpose of opposing the Second Reading of the Bill; but after the Bill has been read a second time, I propose to move the Instruction which stood in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt).

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

(3.15.) MR. S. HILL: I beg now to move that it be an Instruction to the Committee "to omit Clauses 5 and 6." In making this Motion I wish to say that I represent the interests of the Riparian Proprietors, the Conservators of the River Trent, and the Staffordshire County Council. The object of the Instruction is to restrain the Corporation of Wolverhampton from becoming independent of the public law, as to the discharge of the effluent of their sewage into the Pendeford Brook. The Corporation, in 1865, sought to acquire land at Dunstall, but this scheme having been opposed by the then owner, Mr. Hoodson, on public grounds, they obtained with his assistance their present sewage farm at the Barnhurst. Unfortunately, for 10 or 15 years, things went from bad to worse, no real attempt was made to remedy it, until the whole of the arrangements of the Corporation in regard to their disposal of the sewage of Wolverhampton became an abominable nuisance, not only to the inhabitants of the immediate locality, but for a distance of from 80 to 100 miles down the streams into which the sewage is directed. Steps were then taken to put a stop to the nuisance, and after the lapse of many years, and every consideration had been shown to them. In November last, Lord Justice Fry, held that there had been negligence on the part of the Corporation, that their action was wilful and illegal, and ordered an injunction and a sequestration against the Corporation. They propose now to take further land. With that we have nothing to do, because we feel that if they want further land they must have it. But the Corporation are now endeavouring by Clause 5 of their Bill to repeal in their favour certain provisions of the Public Health Act and the Rivers Pollution Act. By Clause 6 they seek to set aside the decision of the Courts of Law. I am told that Clause 6 has been withdrawn. I am not astonished at it, as I should have been surprised if anyone could have been found to defend it; but Clause 5 still remains, and although it professes only to repeal certain provisions of the Rivers Pollution Bill in effect it says that they are to be allowed to do what is permitted to no one else, and that a certificate granted by the Local Government Board is to be an answer in all Courts and in all cases against any action which may be brought against the Corporation. It is utterly impossible to suppose a greater interference with the law in favour of a public Corporation. When an injunction was granted against the Corporation, and sequestration was threatened, they saw, as they ought to have seen 15 years before, that they must amend their ways, and they set to work to correct the evil. Accordingly, when Dr. Frankland was sent down to make an investigation he found that to a certain extent matters were going on satisfactorily, which shows that there could be no difficulty in observing the existing provisions of the law and preventing a nuisance. The question really turns upon this: Can the Corporation or can they not comply with the provisions of the existing law, or have they a right to claim exemption from them because they are unwilling to comply with them? But although Dr. Frankland declared that there was no absolute nuisance at the time of his visit, he stated in distinct terms that what was being done approached very closely upon that which would be called an unsanitary state of matters, and therefore ought not to be allowed. The Rivers Pollution Act was passed in 1876 for the purpose of dealing with this very state of things. The County Council of Staffordshire claim that the Act shall be enforced; but the Corporation of Wolverhampton say, "Repeal those clauses, and do not allow the County Council to interfere at all." Such a position is monstrous. It simply amounts to an assertion that what is good against the rest of the world is not good against those who are bent upon breaking the law. I hope the House will support the Staffordshire County Council, and will lay down that if the law is to be altered, it must not be done by a private, but by a public, measure. At a meeting in Wolverhampton convened for the purpose of considering this Bill, the Mayor of the borough said that unfortunately Wolverhampton is situated on the top of a water shed, and consequently, as there is no large stream into which to turn the sewage, it must be turned into two small streams. And the Town Clerk added that what the borough wanted was relief against all persons who were likely to be litigants—that is to say, all persons who are likely to be injured, and he added that the object of the Bill was to give them "a right to do that which was at present wrong." I sincerely trust that the House of Commons will refuse to enable the Corporation of Wolverhampton or anybody else to do that which is at present wrong, and which will inflict a serious injury on their neighbours.

(3.30.) COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport): I beg to second the Motion. I have not the slightest personal feeling in this matter, and I am glad to think that I am on terms of personal friendship with many members of the Corporation of Wolverhampton. But I recollect on one occasion having to consult the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. H. Fowler) in reference to the Corporation, and he asked me to remember the old saying that a Corporation had neither a soul to be saved nor a body to be kicked. Therefore, if I make allusions that are unpleasant, I hope it will be borne in mind that I am not making them individually, but only against the Corporation in its bodiless and soulless capacity. From my knowledge of the merits of the case I cordially support the Instruction moved by my hon. Friend, and in opposing the 5th clause of the Bill, the 6th clause having been withdrawn, I wish to say that I am only actuated by the earnest belief that if that clause is not amended, a very grievous injustice will be done. I had originally put down an Amendment for the total rejection of the Bill, but I have not moved it on account of the withdrawal of Clause 6, which practically set aside the injunction of the High Court. I considered that that was a piece of audacity on the part of the promoters of the Bill, and that it fully justified me in moving the rejection of the measure. As Clause 6 has been withdrawn, in lieu of bringing forward my own Motion, I beg to support that of my hon. Friend, who proposes that it shall be an Instruction to the Committee to leave out Clause 5. I know that it is unusual to stand between the promoters of a Private Bill, and the Committee to which it is proposed to be referred in its entirety, and that, as a rule, it is considered better to send a measure of this kind to a Committee, and trust to them to exercise their common sense in dealing with it. But this is a peculiar case; and I feel that if the Corporation of Wolverhampton are to have their way, this stream will not only be polluted, but become absolutely poisonous, that out-lying lands may be flooded in all directions, and the stream, instead of fulfilling its proper functions, will be the means of rendering every residence on its banks uninhabitable. In 1885 action was taken against the pollution of this stream; in 1886 an injunction was granted against the Corporation, and three years after the granting of the injunction an application for sequestration was made. An order was made that it should issue, and Lord Justice Fry, in delivering judgment, bore testimony to the unwillingness of the Corporation to incur the necessary expenditure for carrying out the necessary works. His Lordship came, further, to the conclusion that the disobedience to the injunction had been wilful, and that it was necessary to proceed to sequestration. There has been no disposition since manifested on the part of the Corporation to meet willingly those who had a right to consider themselves injured, but there has been a desire to continue to turn this stream into a sewer. I do not deny that in some cases it may be desirable, bearing in view the necessities of a large town, to come to a compromise, but this Bill rejects all compromise. Any land they may require the Corporation of Wolverhampton can get without this clause, and there are means by filtration and otherwise by which the purity of the water can be secured. All that we who oppose the Bill seek is to prevent the granting of unusual and unreasonable powers that may be dangerous to the principles of justice and equity. The immediate effect of the Bill as it stands will be to suspend the operation of the Common Statute Law of the land in favour of the Corporation of Wolverhampton. I think the House ought to hesitate before it sanctions a suspension of the general law which bears upon the health of any portion of the community. Perhaps I may be allowed to point out that this very Corporation is seeking in another district to enforce the very law which in this case it is anxious to evade. I refer to a case in which, having a personal interest in preserving the purity of the water, the Corporation of Wolverhampton is now endeavouring to put in force the provisions of the Pollution of Rivers Act, whereas in this instance it is seeking to evade them. The word "reasonable" is used in the Bill more than once, and I suppose it implies a certain amount of equity and moderation, but I cannot forget that we have had the experience of other Corporations who have succeeded in depriving the whole of a rural district of every single drop of drinkable water, and have refused to make any compensation whatever. Therefore, I decline to accept the term "reasonable." My only object is to secure that another and smaller community shall have the same justice and fair play which the Corporation of Wolverhampton are seeking to obtain for themselves.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Wolverhampton Corporation Bill, to omit Clauses 5 and 6."—(Mr. Staveley Hill.)

*(3.45.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I am sorry that I am compelled to trouble the House with a few remarks, because I quite appreciate the feeling which is in the minds of the hon. Gentlemen who have brought forward this Motion. But I feel it is due to the Corporation of Wolverhampton, who have been subjected to much terrific censure, that I should state what really are the circumstances under which they come to the House to-day to ask that this Bill shall be read a second time, not with a view of securing a definite opinion upon the measure or of legislating upon it, but simply with a view of securing that it shall be investigated by an independent Committee who will hear evidence, thresh the whole subject out, and come, I have no doubt, to a right conclusion in regard to it. The Corporation of Wolverhampton have no private interests to serve in the matter, but, like this House, they are a body of public men appointed to discharge a public duty. As they have been subjected to such severe censure, I must ask the indulgence of the House while I tell the simple story of the reasons which have induced them to come here and ask the House to relieve them from a costly and harassing course of litigation which I venture to say no Public Body whatever has been subjected to. The Member for West Staffordshire told the House that this question had been before the locality since 1865. I was going to say that prior to that, from 1854 to 1865 the Corporation of Wolverhampton had devoted a great portion of its time and attention to dealing with this very complicated and very difficult question of the sewage of a large town. If Wolverhampton had been fortunately situated on the banks of the Thames, or of some other great river, this difficulty would not have arisen; but it stands at the head of a water-shed, and some portion of the drainage finds its way into the Severn, and the rest into the Trent. Not having the outfall of a great river it is necessarily exposed to difficulties from which a great many other towns are exempt. In 1867 the Corporation came to the conclusion that it was desirable to establish a great sewage farm for the purpose of enabling the sewage of the town to be satisfactorily dealt with. They purchased an estate which has by subsequent additions cost them £36,200. In 1870 they commenced their sewage works, and in 1873 they were able to bring those works into operation. In that year 10 different actions were commenced against them for the injury they were said to have done to this particular stream, and those actions were referred to arbitration. The arbitration took place in 1875, when the arbitrator awarded to the whole of the 10 litigants the enormous sum of £1,880 as representing in full the damage which had been done to their estates during that number of years. In addition, the arbitrator called on the Corporation to construct works which cost £10,000, and thus recognised the moral right of the Corporation to the use of this stream for its effluent water. No sooner were they completed than litigation again commenced. The litigant who is the litigant carrying his controversy to a successful issue in the Courts is the son of the tenant for life who was proceeding against the Corporation in 1876. The son found out that he was not bound by his father's agreement, and that is one of the grounds upon which I ask the House to deal with the case, because in this case it is impossible to get a binding agreement between the Corporation and the tenant for life which will prevent the Corporation being sued again by the succeeding tenant for life. This litigation lasted from 1878 to 1886, and the amount of damages claimed was £3,049, and the amount awarded was £1,050; but in addition to that the Corporation had to pay £850 for the claimant's costs, and about £1,000 for their own. After this award an application was made for an injunction, damages to the extent of £3,757 being claimed. The action was tried at Birmingham, and, after Mr. Justice Wills had visited the locus in quo, inspected the stream, and seen all the alleged abominations, the damages were fixed at £400. A large sum had again to be paid in costs, the plaintiff's costs as delivered being £2,688, and as allowed £1,084, and the Corporation costs £1,000. Complaint has been made that the Corporation works were not completed until 1890. The answer to that is that it was simply impossible to complete them sooner, and nearly £50,000 have been spent upon them since 1886. Last year the High Court of Justice appointed an officer to report as to what the Corporation had done. That independent expert, in his Report, says—

“In reply I have to say that no excrementitious or filthy matter or sewage, or any water contaminated or mixed therewith, was passing into the Pendeford Brook on the 1st of November last, neither do I think it probable or even possible for such matters to gain access to the brook in future, so long as the defendants' works are maintained in their present efficient condition. With regard to noxious matter, the defendants were discharging nothing into the brook which was noxious, unless the water was used for dietetic purposes. There was nothing noxious to the senses in the effluents or any of them, but the water was not, in my opinion, fit for human consumption as a beverage.”

This is the whole gist and point in this case. The Corporation have at present no right to put any water in the stream unless such water is perfectly pure, and this Bill seeks to empower the Corporation to put water in the stream which, though not absolutely pure, will in no way detract from the beauty of the stream or its amenities. He had recently travelled down it and found it quite clear.

*MR. STAVELEY HILL: I did not say that the river has been in an improper state since the Corporation completed their works. I am quite prepared to admit that since last summer the stream has been in a proper condition.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am glad to have obtained that admission. And that is the case that I present, that having spent this money and having done this work, having accomplished this improvement, I say that the Corporation are not to be exposed to litigation day by day and week by week, and spend thousands and thousands in costly and useless litigation because it has undertaken to carry out the law of the land. What the town of Wolverhampton has done has been that the Corporation have, at an enormous cost, separated the rain water from the sewage. Now, what do we ask? We ask you to stop this litigation, and if we do any damage—we do not interfere with private rights, we do not deprive any man of his property—we are willing to pay the last farthing, and we ask the House to let us have a cheap and effective tribunal on the spot, and not let us be subject to these injunctions, and trials, and arbitrations to which we have been subjected for years. And we ask that this Bill be sent in to a Committee upstairs in order that they may investigate it there and decide it on its merits. My hon. Friend says that “this is unprecedented, that nothing of this sort has been done before, that this is a new application brought before the House.” Well, Sir, it has been done before. The House of Commons has passed a similar clause to this, and passed it in the River Lea Conservancy Act, and in this Act it may be almost said they have taken the very words used in the River Lea Act. These are the words of the River Lea Conservancy Act—

“Nothing in this Act shall operate and extend to prevent the Local Board of Health for the district of Luton and the inhabitants of Luton for the time being, maintaining and continuing their present sewerage and drainage works, or discharging into the River Lea the sewage water or matter formed from such sewers or drains, after such sewage matter has been subject to the process of purification known as Higgs' process,” and then it describes the mode in which that is to be carried out. The Corporation has spent nearly £200,000 in endeavouring to carry out the sewerage. The rating of Wolverhampton this year, I think, is 3s. 9d. in the £1, and the sewerage rate that we have to pay is 1s. 2½d. in the £1, and I ask gentlemen who are now on County Councils what a rate of 1s. 2½d. in the £1 means? At present they are crippled and forced to incur enormous costs of litigation because of committing what is, after all, a mere technical wrong. There is no desire to avoid paying compensation to all those entitled to it, but it is desired to have a cheap and effective tribunal on the spot to deal with the matter. The House is not now being asked to pass the Bill, but only to allow it to be referred to the Police and Sanitary Committee, after which it will again come before the House for Third Reading. This is an attempt, without any precedent, to arrest the action of the Corporation, at a critical moment in its history, in its endeavour to discharge a public duty, and I ask the House to do justice, irrespective of Party or any other consideration, to allow the Bill to go before one of its own Committees, where the opponents can make out their case, for we cannot well dispose of this clause in the House; and I hope we will hear no more of it. If the Committee misconceives its duty or trenches upon principles of the general law, the House will have the Bill in its own hands on a Third Reading. You may rest assured that there is nothing in this Bill which in any way trenches upon the rights of property.

*(4.10.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I do not think there can be any opposition to that part of the Bill which gives power to the Wolverhampton Corporation to acquire additional land for the purpose of their sewage scheme. But the Bill contains some clauses which are of an objectionable character. The 5th clause proposes something quite new and exceptional. It proposes that the Corporation should not be compelled to comply with Section 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875; and that if they obtain a certificate from an Inspector of the Local Government Board that they are employing the best practical means for carrying off the sewage, such certificate, which shall last for two years, shall be a bar against any person who may consider himself injured. That is an entirely novel power to confer on the Local Government Board, and, even if desirable, it would be extremely difficult to exercise. To confer upon the Local Government Board power to issue certificates which should be an absolute bar to all actions that may be brought in the High Court by persons who may feel aggrieved or injured would be going very far indeed. If, however, the Corporation of Wolverhampton should be able to show to the Committee that exceptional provisions are desirable in their case, the Committee, I think, ought to have power to consider the matter. Therefore, I should propose to move an instruction in lieu of that which has been moved, empowering the Committee to consider whether, under the special circumstances of the case, any special provisions are necessary for the protection of the Corporation of Wolverhampton until additional sewage works can be completed. If the Committee should decide that such provisions are necessary, the Local Government Board could be empowered to give a certificate which could be produced in any action before the High Court, and which would be taken into consideration, although it might not be an absolute bar to the proceedings. The Instruction which I am prepared to move will enable the Committee to make such provisions as would protect the Corporation from any arbitrary proceedings.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the words "Clauses 5 and 6," in order to insert the words "Clause 6; and with regard to Clause 5, to consider whether, under the special circumstances of the case, any, and, if any, what, provisions are necessary for the protection of the Corporation, until additional sewage disposal works can be completed. That any provision for this purpose should be such as will not affect the present proceedings against the Corporation, and as will be in conformity with the provisions of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, with regard to the conditions on which certificates are to be granted,"—(Mr. Ritchie),

—instead thereof.

*(4.20.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Corporation have no desire in any way to prejudice existing litigation. I would therefore propose that we should rest content to-day with providing for the omission of Clause 6. The Instruction to be moved by the President of the Local Government Board could be considered on a future occasion.

*(4.22.) MR. RITCHIE: I think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly fair.

*MR. S. HILL: Would it not be the better plan to postpone the whole matter?

*MR. RITCHIE: An Instruction similar in terms to the one which I have handed in can be placed on the Paper to-morrow.

*MR. SPEAKER: The proper course will be to withdraw the Instruction now and bring it up again.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Wolverhampton Corporation Bill to omit Clause 6.

QUESTIONS.

THE ARBIB BROTHERS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the case of the British steamer, Arbib Brothers, recently arrested in Algiers on a claim for salvage; whether it is true, as stated in the Moniteur de l'Algerie, of the 27th ultimo, that the Compagnie Transatlantique, the plaintiff in the salvage suit, anchored one of their vessels with an armed crew alongside the Arbib Brothers, with the avowed intention of forcibly preventing her from escaping, in case of her attempting to do so; and, if so, whether this step was taken under the authority of any French Law Court or Government Department; and, if not, whether any remonstrances have been addressed to the French Government against a proceeding calculated to provoke violence, and lead to International difficulties?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FER-GUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The circumstances as stated in the question are substantially correct. The British vessel was disabled not far from Algiers, and was brought into that port by a steamer belonging to the "Compagnie Transatlantique," the agent of which company then made a claim for salvage. The agent alleged that the Arbib Brothers was about to proceed to sea and to escape payment; a seizure was laid upon the vessel, and on a tug steamer arriving from London the other steps mentioned were taken. The owners would have their remedy at law for any illegal procedure. The only apparent ground of complaint on the part of Her Majesty's Government was in the omission to inform the British Consul General of the procedure against the ship; but, as we have no Consular Convention, this involved no more than a breach of courtesy, and we have no ground for formal representation.

DR. CAMERON: In Committee of Supply I shall call attention to this case.

THE CASE OF ANDREW REID.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, since August last, any further inquiry has been made by the Secretary for Scotland into the mental condition of Andrew Reid, of Glasgow, sentenced in February, 1887, to be confined during Her Majesty's pleasure for firing at a policeman, whilst labouring under a fit of insanity, and at present confined in Perth Criminal Lunatic Asylum; and whether, considering that Reid has now been three years in confinement, if it be ascertained that for a long time past he has shown no sign of insanity, he will take steps to procure his release?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The man referred to in this question was sentenced in February, 1889, and not in 1887 as erroneously stated. He will complete two years' confinement on the 26th of this month; and, following on the satisfactory Report of a recent inquiry as to his mental condition, he will be liberated on that day, subject to the requisite guarantees being given by guardians, who, I understand, are prepared to grant them.

BANGOR TRAINING COLLEGE.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that, in consequence of the Report of the Inspector sent down by the Education Department to inquire into the causes of the recent outbreak of students at Bangor Training College, that the discipline of the Institution is unsatisfactory, the College Committee is now engaged in re-constituting the staff of the College; can he explain why the Education Department has refused to sanction the re-admission of one of the students for his second year's course of training, notwithstanding the fact that the College General Committee and the special Sub-Committee unanimously recommended his re-admission; whether the student was given any opportunity of defending himself before the Inspector; and whether, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, he will recommend the Department to reconsider the matter?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Education Department has refused to sanction the re-admission of the student at the Bangor Training College whose impertinence is stated by the Inspector to have been the immediate cause of the outbreak to which the hon. Member refers. The facts were, unfortunately, too well attested to permit of explanation so far as that student was concerned, and it is as well to bear in mind that the Inspector's recommendation in regard to him sought nothing more than to give effect to what had been the first resolution of the authorities of the College. The student has already been treated with indulgence, to the extent of being allowed to qualify himself for a certificate by concluding his first year's course; and, looking to the paramount importance of maintaining the discipline of the College, I am not prepared on the part of the Department to re-consider a decision which has been arrived at with the aid of the fullest information and after the most careful and deliberate inquiry. The statement that the College General Committee recommended the re-admission of the student is quite incorrect.

THE DISTRICT OF GURGAON.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the revised settlement of the district of Gurgaon, Panjab, and all other Papers connected therewith until Orders were passed, and including the Orders passed, by the Panjab Government; whether he is aware that remissions of rent were refused by the Government of India to the people in a time of crop loss through drought, and that between 1877 and 1882, 150,000 head of cattle were found to have died, 80,000 of the agricultural population had disappeared, and a debt of Rs.200,000 incurred; and whether the Secretary of State will inquire into these facts, and take such steps as will put a stop to their recurrence?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Report and Papers asked for make a volume of 500 pages. I shall be glad to lend the hon. Member a copy; but the Secretary of State does not think it necessary to lay it on the Table. The Secretary of State is aware that a mistake was made by the officer, since dead, who refused to suspend a part of the land revenue in Gurgaon in 1877. But since then substantial benefit has been conferred on the district by remissions of arrears, by reductions of the demand, and by loans for the purchase of cattle. The cultivated area of the district is returning to the old level, and the number of cattle has been fully recovered. The Secretary of State is satisfied that the suggestions of the Famine Commission of 1880, the Orders of the Government of India issued in 1885, and the provisions of the Punjab Famine Code issued in 1888, will, if carefully observed, prevent the commission of similar mistakes in the future.

OOLOGICAL EXPEDITION TO THE SHETLAND ISLES.

MR. WALTER JAMES (Gateshead): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to a Circular issued from Birmingham and published in Monday's Times, by a company entitled "The Naturalists' Publishing Company," and projecting "an oological expedition to the land of the Great Auk," meaning the district of the Shetland Isles, set forth in the Circular as one of the best collecting grounds for the marine birds of the United Kingdom; and whether he will introduce some amendment of the Wild Birds Protection Act to avert the destruction of the eggs of rare birds?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: My attention has been called to the letters in the Times of Lord Lilford and my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings. I observe that a Bill to amend the Wild Birds Protection Act was read a first time last night on the Motion of the hon. Member for York; it has not yet been circulated, but it may afford an opportunity for extending to the eggs of wild birds the protection at present given to wild birds themselves. In the meantime, it is well that it should be known that, under the law as it stands, the Shetland Islands are not completely at the mercy of the Naturalists' Publishing Company of Birmingham, for oologists are not yet exempt from the general law of trespass; and the proprietors of the threatened islands will probably consider whether they should not apply for Interdict against acts of illegal trespass, the intention to commit which has been publicly announced.

COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N.R., Thirsk): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will give facilities to the hon. Member for York to proceed with his Bill to amend the Act for the protection of wild birds?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government can hardly give facilities for such a measure, much as I desire that such a measure should pass. The general feeling of the House, however, will no doubt be in favour of passing such a Bill, and in that case the hon. Gentleman will not be under the necessity of asking for special facilities to push it forward.

ALLOTMENTS IN SUFFOLK.

SIR WAITER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the high assessment of allotments in Suffolk and other parts of the country; whether the statement is true that in South-West Suffolk the assessor's valuation for the purpose of rating allotments averages 40s. an acre, though farm land in the same locality is assessed at from 5s. to 10s. an acre; and whether he can take any steps to alter this disproportionate rating?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention was called some days ago by my hon. Friend the Member for the Sudbury Division (Mr. Quilter) to the high assessment of allotments in Suffolk and elsewhere, and he undertook to furnish me with particulars of the assessments. I have not yet received these particulars; but I may say that it is not in the power of the Local Government Board to interfere with the discretion of the Local Authorities in matters of rating. The rateable value of an allotment depends on the rent at which it may reasonably be expected to let from year to year; but I should regret to learn that allotments were unduly rated as compared with the ordinary basis of assessment in force in the union.

ABDUL RASOUL.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India under what Article of the Indian Penal Code have the Government of India power to arrest any person on landing at an Indian port, to examine his wearing apparel, cutting open his boots and other articles of clothing, to imprison him in an inland gaol, and detain him there for nine months at a time without preferring against him any charge or bringing him before any tribunal; what ground of suspicion had the authorities in India against Sheikh Abdul Rasoul; whether he is aware that Sheikh Abdul Rasoul himself called at the India Office and asked to see Lord Cross, who, after keeping him waiting for three hours, refused to see him; whether a registered letter has been received at the India Office from Rasoul, why no acknowledgment of such letter has been returned to him, and whether he will undertake that some reply shall be sent to him; whether, as the Government have brought Rasoul back to this country, and landed him destitute without means of subsistence and without friends in London, they will take steps to provide some support for him pending the reply which he may receive from the Indian Government; and whether it is the intention of the Government to detain Rasoul in this country and to prohibit him from returning to his own country; and, if so, on what grounds and under what statutory or other powers they are in such case acting?

*SIR J. GORST: I informed the hon. Gentleman yesterday that the Secretary of State was awaiting information on this subject from India, and pending the receipt of that information I am afraid that I cannot answer many of the questions which he has put. But in answer to paragraph 3 I am aware that Abdul Rasoul did call at the India Office on one of the days when my noble Friend was out of London, and therefore he was not able to see him. In answer to the fourth paragraph, I stated yesterday that a letter had been received at the India Office, and I regret that no acknowledgment had been sent. In answer to the last question, the Secretary of State has neither the power nor the intention of detaining Rasoul in this country.

MR. CONYBEARE: There are two points on which the right hon. Gentleman has given no answer, and which I think he could reply to without awaiting letters from India. I want to know whether he will see that an answer is sent to this unfortunate man as to what decision the authorities have come to; and I also wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, as the unfortunate man has been brought to this country against his will, and has been landed in this Metropolis destitute and without friends or means of support, he will consider the propriety of making some provision for him?

*SIR J. GORST: The hon. Gentleman begs the whole question. We are awaiting information from India as to whether this man was sent here; and until the Secretary of State receives that information it is impossible for me to reply to the question.

MR. CONYBEARE: Will the right hon. Gentleman make any provision for this man's subsistence? I understand that he does not contradict that he was arrested in India and sent to gaol and kept there for nine months without trial; and I wish to know whether he will recommend that some allowance shall be made to him to enable him to subsist in England?

*SIR J. GORST: I have never heard that the man was in a state of destitution. He certainly has made no such statement to me.

THE CASE OF HARRY WYNDHAM CARTER.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, in the trial of Harry Wyndham Carter, at Maidstone Assizes, in January, 1887, the indictment laid before the common jury was for the shooting at and wounding with the felonious intents to maim, disfigure, disable, or do some other grievous bodily harm; has his attention been drawn to a statement published in the Kentish Gazette, under date 23rd February, 1887, by Mr. Samuel J. West, one of the jury, stating that "The unanimous verdict we presented through our foreman was 'that we found the prisoner guilty of unlawful shooting,' and expressing surprise at the sentence which was inflicted;"

was the verdict, as entered in the Record, the same as that found by the jury; and, if not, can he explain why it differs therefrom; is he aware that, at the trial, Carter repeatedly begged that counsel would call his witnesses, who were in Court, but that for some unexplained reason they were not allowed to give evidence; is it the fact that while in prison, in 1889, H. W. Carter was offered his release on condition of his executing a disentailing deed; through what medium, by whom, and by whose authority was this offer held out to the prisoner; and whether he will inquire into the legality of Carter's imprisonment?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I understand that the indictment was for wounding with the felonious intents mentioned. I have not seen the statement in the Kentish Gazette, but an affidavit to a similar effect was sent to me, which I forwarded to the learned Judge. He reported to me that it was founded on a complete mistake as to the effect of the indictment. The question for the jury was whether the wounds, which had been inflicted by shooting, were inflicted with any of the felonious intents charged in the indictment, or were merely unlawful wounds, i.e., wounds inflicted by an unlawful purposed act; and he states that the jury found the prisoner guilty of unlawful wounding. After reading the Judge's Report, I have no reason to suppose that the verdict entered on the Record was not the verdict found by the jury. The prisoners were defended by most able counsel, who, in the exercise of his discretion, declined to call witnesses. It is not the fact that any offer of conditional release has been made to the convict on the authority of the Home Office. I am satisfied, after full inquiry, that the convict's sentence was legal.

THE LLANERCH COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. PICKARD (York, W.R., Normananton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will, according to promise last Session, place upon the Table of the

Sir J. Gorst

House verbatim copies of the notes taken at the inquiry into the causes of the deaths of large numbers of miners at the Llanerch Colliery explosion?

MR. MATTHEWS: What I said last Session was that I would place these notes upon the Table if there was any general desire on the part of hon. Members to see them. I have not found that any such general desire exists, and have therefore given no instructions. The transcript is quite at the service of the hon. Member, or of any hon. Member who desires to see it.

LAND PURCHASE IN CORK.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that, under the provisions of the Land Purchase Bill as it now stands, the barony of Cork, being the portion of the county of the City of Cork outside the borough boundary, is excluded from the scope of all land purchase transactions; whether he is aware that this extensive area, consisting of the old liberties of Cork, and extending in some directions over seven miles from the city, is a purely agricultural one, and, though within the county of the city, is, for all fiscal purposes, cut off by statute from the borough and united with the County of Cork; and whether the Bill is drawn in this manner through inadvertence or by design?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am obliged to the hon. Member for calling attention to the position of the old liberties of Cork. It is the desire of the Government to extend the benefits of the Land Purchase Bill to all districts in Ireland which are of an agricultural character. Inquiries will be made before the Committee stage of the Bill as to the possibility, consistently with fiscal arrangements, of including the district in question within the County of Cork.

TELEGRAPH DELIVERY.

MR. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the statement on the back of telegraph forms, that the charge for transmission will cover the cost of delivery if the address is within the limits of the town postal delivery of any Head Post Office, is in many cases not correct under the existing Postal Regulations; whether persons living within the limits mentioned, but within the delivery of a local telegraphic sub-office, are compelled to pay portorage on telegrams delivered during the hours when the sub-office is closed, though portorage would not be payable if such sub-office did not exist; and whether he will put an end to this anomaly?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The hon. Member has not quite accurately stated the terms of the notice on the back of telegraph forms. It is as follows:—

"The charge for transmission will cover the cost of delivery.

"(a) If the address is within one mile from the Terminal Telegraph Office, or within the limits of the Town Postal delivery of that office when it is a Head Post Office."

The terminal offices in the cases to which he refers are probably not Head Post Offices. But, if he will be good enough to send me particulars of the cases which he has in view, I shall be glad to have inquiry made and let him know the result.

THE IRISH BANKRUPTCY LAW.

MR. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the recent Report of the Cork Chamber of Shipping and Commerce, in which complaint is made that insolvent traders are enabled by the present state of the Bankruptcy Laws to prevent any effectual investigation of their affairs by petitioning the Bankruptcy Court in Dublin, and thus preventing proceedings in the Local Court of Bankruptcy; and whether the Government will facilitate legislation, making it necessary in the case of all traders within the jurisdiction of Local Courts of Bankruptcy to initiate legislation within such Courts?

MR. MADDEN: I have not yet seen the Report referred to, but the suggestion which it contains is receiving the close consideration of the Government. I cannot undertake to facilitate legislation of the character suggested in the question, and I do not think that such legislation could be undertaken without further experience of the working of the local Bankruptcy Court.

MR. M. HEALY: Do I understand the Government intend to offer opposition to legislation on this point initiated by private Members?

MR. MADDEN: Yes, Sir; as at present advised.

SEVERE SENTENCE.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has seen the report in the Essex Weekly News of the sentences passed by the Chelmsford Magistrates upon three prisoners, one of whom was a girl, who were all charged with robbing their employers, and were recommended to mercy, none of them having been previously convicted; upon what grounds was the girl sentenced without option of fine to two terms of one month's hard labour each for what was practically one offence, while the men were let off with a fine of 40s.; and whether he will inquire into the circumstances with a view to mitigating her sentence?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not seen the report, and I have no information as to the case, but am making inquiry, and will inform the hon. Member of the result in due course.

ENNISKILLEN BARRACKS.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it has been determined by the authorities to erect new buildings for additional military accommodation at Enniskillen; if the ground plans have been prepared and approved by the Royal Engineer Department; if the probable estimate was roughly stated at £18,000; and if it be the intention of the Government to proceed with the erection of this projected additional barrack accommodation; and, if not, will he state on what ground the scheme has been abandoned, or at whose suggestion?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): For military reasons it has been decided to locate more troops at Londonderry and less at Enniskillen. In these circumstances, it will not be necessary to increase the barrack accommodation at the latter town.

MEETING AT BANDON.

MR. MORROGH (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received resolutions passed by a large and representative meeting held in Bandon on the 10th instant, which meeting was presided over by the Chairman of the Town Commissioners, and attended by the Dean of Cork and several clergymen of different denominations; and whether, in view of the present and further apprehended distress, as set forth in the resolutions, he will give immediate attention to the requests contained in the said resolutions?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The resolutions referred to in the question do not appear to have been received, but the state of the locality is having careful consideration at the hands of the Government.

LABOUR IN INDIAN FACTORIES.

MR. J. MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give the House assurances that the Government of India will pass into law a Bill to amend the Indian Factory Act before the Viceroy leaves Calcutta for Simla, and that the provisions of this Bill will include as a minimum the rules adopted at the International Labour Conference of Berlin regarding age, hours of labour, and hours of rest and refreshment?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have to inform my hon. Friend that the Secretary of State in Council for India has been in communication with the Viceroy, and he is informed that legislation will be proceeded with immediately to amend the Indian Factory Act. The provisions of the Bill will follow, speaking generally, the recommendations of the International Labour Conference at Berlin, with this limitation—that it is proposed to raise the age for the employment of young children from seven (at which age they are now employed) to nine. The employment of women and children at night is to be prohibited, and the Secretary of State in Council has urged that the limits of work for children shall be in accordance with the provisions of the Berlin Conference.

*MR. MACLEAN: With reference to one point in the right hon. Gentleman's answer. May I ask him whether, as the minimum age of employment of children in some European countries was fixed at 10 years by the Conference at Berlin, and as Indian children are of a weaker and more delicate frame than children in European countries, the right hon. Gentleman will press upon the Indian Government the importance of fixing the minimum at 10 years instead of 9?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no hesitation in saying that the Secretary of State is impressing that view upon the Government of India, and will continue to do so.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: May I ask whether the recommendations of the Berlin Conference were stated by that Conference not to be applicable to the case of a tropical country, and whether they are consistent with the people of India, or whether they are only urged upon the Government by a few Lancashire Members?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware of the limitation to which the hon. Member refers; but I am under the impression that the sole object the Government of India and the Secretary of State have in view is that the regulations of labour in factories in India is consonant with humanity and in the interests of the Indian people themselves.

SMOKE ANNIHILATION.

LORD ERNEST HAMILTON (Tyrone, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to Mr. Elliott's invention for the annihilation of smoke, now on view on the Thames Embankment; and whether it is the intention of the Government to give the invention a trial, with a view to the possibility of taking some steps to abate the smoke nuisance in the Metropolis?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not personally acquainted with the apparatus in question; but I am informed by the Metropolitan Police, whose duty it is to enforce the Acts relating to the smoke nuisance in the Metropolis, that smoke has been observed to issue from the chimney on the Thames Embankment, from which it may be inferred that the apparatus is not at all times successful.

ACCESS TO MOUNTAINS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now name a day to be given for the purpose of debating the Resolution regarding the right of the public to access to uncultivated mountains and moorlands, which stood on the Paper last Tuesday, in the place of that day which the Government took for the purpose of Government business, having regard to the widespread interest felt in that Resolution in Scotland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to fix a day for the Debate on the Resolution as to access to mountains.

THE ALABAMA INDEMNITY.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he is aware that there is remaining in the hands of the Government of the United States of America a large sum out of the so-called Alabama indemnity, paid by this country to meet claims then to be made upon the Treasury of the United States; and if any request has been made on behalf of this country for the return of the sum thus admittedly ascertained to have been overpaid; if not, whether Her Majesty's Government will communicate with the Government of the United States on the subject?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is believed, from accounts which have been published in the United States, that a certain portion of the sum paid by Great Britain to the United States under the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva still remains in the hands of the United States Government. It would be contrary to the engagements taken by this country in the Treaty of Washington of 1871 that Her Majesty's Government should request the return of this sum.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

MR. ATKINSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can arrange for Questions to be printed with the replies to them, and awaiting the arrival of Members at the House each day, so saving the time of the Members for other business?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: However desirable it may be that the time occupied by Questions and Answers in the House should be economised I am not prepared to propose to the House that the Standing Orders should be altered, as any proposal of the kind suggested would involve a discussion leading to a considerable expenditure of time.

DISTRICT COUNCILS.

MR. DAVID THOMAS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if it is now the intention of the Government to introduce this Session Bills for the establishment of District Councils, and for amending and consolidating the laws relating to the public health; and, if so, can he say when?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government hope to introduce within the next few days Bills to amend and consolidate the laws relating to the public health in the Metropolis, and they do not anticipate that the time at their disposal will enable them to deal this Session with these laws outside the Metropolis. The Government will be glad if they are able, by the progress of other business, to propose legislation this Session in connection with District Councils, but it entirely depends on the progress of Public Business.

A QUEENSTOWN MEMORIAL. TO THE ADMIRALTY.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if his attention has been called to a report of a meeting of the Town Commissioners of Queenstown, which appeared in the Cork Examiner of the 12th instant, in which it is stated by the Town Clerk

"That a Memorial had been prepared by a Joint Committee of the Commissioners, clergymen, magistrates, local gentlemen, and traders of the town and district, and duly signed by them, and submitted by a deputation to Admiral Erskine to be forwarded to the Admiralty. He (the Town Clerk) could not account for the non-receipt of the document at the Admiralty;"

and has he, as yet, received the Memorial; and, if not, can he state why Admiral Erskine has not presented the document?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): My attention has been called to the report alluded to by the hon. Member. A Memorial was presented by a deputation to Admiral Erskine, and after some discussion the Deputation announced their intention to amend the terms of their Memorial. Admiral Erskine understood that the Memorial would be amended by its authors, but they understood that the Admiral would make the amendments. It was owing to this misunderstanding that the Memorial was not forwarded at once. It has now been received at the Admiralty, and will be carefully considered.

THE ORDER OF BUSINESS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the fragmentary portion of the Motion of the right hon. Member for Newcastle dealing with the administration of the law in Ireland affirms nothing, and that no part of the Amendment has yet found its way on the Records of the House; whether the right hon. Gentleman will fix a day for the discussion of the subject; or whether the Government wish to allow the question to remain in the condition in which it stands?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are perfectly satisfied with the Debate. If the hon. Member and his friends desire another Debate in which they can exercise their right of speaking, considering that they were shut out of it last night, it will be a subject for the consideration of the Government whether they shall proceed further in the matter.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what business will be taken on Thursday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We shall ask the House to consider the Army Estimates.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): When does the right hon. Gentleman propose to begin the Committee stage of the Land Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman is aware that the first necessity of the House at present is Supply. A certain amount of Supply has to be obtained before Easter, and until we obtain this Supply we cannot proceed with business of importance. There will be small matters introduced between Supply; but the progress of Supply will be the main business next week.

on which, during the 10 years preceding 1890, there has been any discussion whatever on Indian topics in this House. The change occurred in 1888, and, going back to the seven years before 1888, when it was within the competency of the Members of the House to discuss any topic of general interest in connection with India on the Motion that you do leave the Chair, I find that in the seven years there were two occasions when no advantage whatever was taken of the Rule. In five other years advantage was taken of the Rule. But what was the effect upon the time of the House? In 1887 there was only one speech made on the question. In 1886 no discussion took place; in 1885 no discussion took place. In the four earlier years there was a discussion; but it will be found, if you look into the facts of the case, that the discussion on the occasions when there was a Debate on the question that you do leave the Chair was not very prolonged. In 1890 we spent 5 hours and 19 minutes in Committee on the East Indian Accounts. In 1889 we spent something less than six hours, and in 1888 a little more than seven hours. The longest discussion was in 1885, when we spent very nearly nine hours in discussing Indian affairs. But when one comes to take into consideration the great importance of the affairs of the Dependency, there can be no reason for any action on the part of the responsible officers or leader of this House for shortening the time for the discussion of Indian affairs. In the last 10 years we have not devoted 15 hours in each Session to a discussion of Indian affairs. There are a number of topics which are of far less importance to this great country than those connected with India which are debated at much greater length, and it seems to me altogether improper and irregular that a change of this nature should have been allowed to affect the consideration of Indian subjects. I said the change was entirely useless, and I will show why. Under the Standing Orders of the House it is quite possible for every Member who chooses to incur the displeasure of the House to make a Motion respecting India on the question that the House resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means, and thus interpose himself between the House and the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget Statement.

Then, I say, the change creates an invidious distinction, because the position of India, as regards this House, is altogether different to that of other Dependencies. We have assumed the entire responsibility of determining what shall be the expenditure of that great country, and, therefore, it is not right and proper that we should treat the matters connected with the expenditure of India in a different manner to that in which we treat our own matters. I think it has a very unfortunate effect upon the people of India when, first of all, it is noticed how little time is allotted to the discussion of Indian subjects, and, secondly, how we treat the question of the Indian Budget. I am not now going to discuss the propriety or otherwise of our Indian Debates being taken at the fag end of the Session; it seems hardly necessary that they should be so taken; but whether that is necessary or not, it is quite obvious that the change which has occurred in the Standing Order is not one of which we can approve. I hope the House will see the desirability and propriety of going back to the old state of things. I hope I shall have the assent of the right hon. Gentleman who now leads the House and the assent of all hon. Members. This is no Party question at all. No question connected with India can be a Party question. We are all deeply interested in doing our duty by that country, whose resources we are so proud of, and whose position is so affected by our discussions.

EAST INDIA (FINANCIAL STATEMENT).

RESOLUTION.

*(5.2.) SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton): Mr. Speaker, in moving

"That Standing Order No. LI., be amended by inserting after the words 'Ways and Means,' the words 'or the Committee on the Indian Financial Statement,'"

I do not think it will be necessary for me to trespass very long upon the attention of the House. The object of the Motion is very simple: it is to replace the House in the position in regard to debate on matters of general interest, in connection with India, it was in previous to the passing of the Standing Order No. 51 on the 28th of February, 1888. Standing Order No. LI., which was passed with very little debate and without any opposition, runs thus:—

"That whenever an Order of the Day is read for the House to resolve itself into Committee (not being a Committee to consider a message from the Crown, or the Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means) Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any Question."

Sir John Mowbray

I propose to insert certain words which will save from this clause the discussion on the Indian Budget. I shall be able to show, first of all, that this alteration in the procedure of this House which took place on the 28th of February, 1888, was altogether unwarranted and uncalled for; secondly, that it is useless; and, lastly, that it is invidious. In regard to the first point, it may be satisfactory if I turn for a moment to the Debate upon the Rules of Procedure to find what were the objects with which the change in the Standing Order was effected. The objects were briefly stated by the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"The object of the change is to prevent a repetition of discussion on the principles of a Bill on the Motion that you, Sir, do leave the Chair. It has been found," he added, "that the Motion that you leave the Chair is greatly abused, and there is a general agreement that a Second Reading Debate should not occur twice over."

I think there are very few Members in the House—if, indeed, there is one—who will take exception to the doctrine laid down by the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion. I certainly do not take exception to it; but I think it can very easily be shown that that argument has no application whatever to the alteration of the Rule in so far as it regards the discussion of Indian subjects. That can very easily be shown by reference to the history of past years. I also wish to note, it would seem, from the course of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, that it was not specially intended to cover the Debate on Indian topics by this change in the Standing Order. Certainly, at a subsequent period, when it was found that this change had that effect, the leader of the House showed distinctly he was of opinion that the discussion of general topics in connection with India should not fall within the scope of the change. What is the condition of things now that this change has been effected, and how does it contrast with the state of things which existed before the change was effected? I have ascertained from the Debates of the House all the occasions on which, during the 10 years preceding 1890, there has been any discussion whatever on Indian topics in this House. The change occurred in 1888, and, going back to the seven years before 1888, when it was within the competency of the Members of the House to discuss any topic of general interest in connection with India on the Motion that you do leave the Chair, I find that in the seven years there were two occasions when no advantage whatever was taken of the Rule. In five other years advantage was taken of the Rule. But what was the effect upon the time of the House? In 1887 there was only one speech made on the question. In 1886 no discussion took place; in 1885 no discussion took place. In the four earlier years there was a discussion; but it will be found, if you look into the facts of the case, that the discussion on the occasions when there was a Debate on the question that you do leave the Chair was not very prolonged. The longest discussion was in 1885, when we spent very nearly nine hours in discussing Indian affairs. But when one comes to take into consideration the great importance of the affairs of the Dependency, there can be no reason for any action on the part of the responsible officers or leader of this House for shortening the time for the discussion of Indian affairs. In the last 10 years we have not devoted 15 hours in each Session to a discussion of Indian affairs. There are a number of topics which are of far less importance to this great country than those connected with India which are debated at much greater length, and it seems to me altogether improper and irregular that a change of this nature should have been allowed to affect the consideration of Indian subjects. Then, I say, the change creates an invidious distinction, because the position of India, as regards this House, is altogether different to that of other Dependencies. We have assumed the entire responsibility of determining what shall be the expenditure of that great country, and, therefore, it is not right and proper that we should treat the matters connected with the expenditure of India in a different manner to that in which we treat our own matters. Motion made, and Question proposed,

 "That Standing Order No. LI., be amended by inserting after the words 'Ways and Means,' the words 'or the Committee on the Indian Financial Statement.'"—(Sir William Plowden.)

(5.14.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I rise to second the Motion, and I appeal to Her Majesty's Ministers to give it a favourable consideration. There is no doubt whatever that the Motion is in absolute accord with the opinions and the earnest wishes of every class of Her Majesty's subjects in India, whether native or European, official or non-official. Everyone in India wishes to see more, rather than less, attention given in the House of Commons to Indian matters, for in the long run the House of Commons really rules the destinies of the Indian Empire. The wishes of all classes in India have been freely expressed in Petitions, and those who follow, as I do, from week to week the Indian Press, will know that there is no subject which excites the interest of the public in India more than the desire that Indian subjects should be taken up in the House of Commons more generally than is now the case. I have had a Motion on the Paper almost identical with that which the hon. Gentleman has moved ever since the day that I discovered the real effect of the change in the Standing Order. At first, in common, I believe, with almost all the Members of the House, except those who are very well versed in its procedure, I was absolutely ignorant of the effect of the change. In 1888 I never realised the effect of the change. Every other part of the British Empire has a right to have its affairs discussed at least on one occasion during the year. The grievances of the Mauritius, or the Falkland Islands, or any other island in the Empire, can be discussed, for instance, on the Vote for the Salary of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. Surely, when we compare the importance of India with that of any other part of the British Dominions, it is right that an opportunity should be afforded of discussing any grievances that may exist in India. Hon. Members will remember that no Indian salaries, as such, are voted in this House. We vote the whole of the Indian expenditure en bloc, as it were. That, however, ought not to be given as a reason why we should not have an opportunity of entering into Indian grievances and discussing them. The only argument I have ever heard advanced in support of the existing rule is, that the discussion of Indian affairs in this House is generally based on a certain amount of ignorance and sometimes of prejudice. I do not agree at all with that view. I am quite aware that a large number of the Members of this House are not as entirely familiar with the affairs of India as they are with affairs at home, or perhaps with the affairs of some of the colonies; but I maintain that with the good sound judgment and common sense which is at all times brought to bear in the House of Commons on Indian subjects, especially when Anglo-Indian Members venture to submit them to the consideration of the House, the people of India are quite satisfied, and usually find they derive very great and real benefits therefrom. It has been pointed out that from time immemorial up to 1888 the right for which we are asking was possessed. It is perfectly evident to anyone who reads the Debate on the Motion for the change of the rule that it was not realised that the change would affect the Indian Budget. No one seemed to realise that this would practically preclude the House from taking notice of Indian affairs. I well remember that the very year when the Indian Budget came on I came down to the House with my pocket full of letters and extracts received from friends in many parts of India. I am not sufficiently egotistical to believe that any good would have resulted from what I might have said, but, still, there were many people in India who thought that their views and their grievances ought to be submitted to the House. What happened? I was called to order very rightly by the Chairman of Committees. I stumbled and stumbled on, not knowing exactly why I was out of order, and was called to order a second time. Finally, I had to give up the attempt to call attention to the subjects which had been intrusted to me, and to devote myself to the consideration of the Financial Statement alone. The Indian Financial Statement is not one of a kind that lends itself to very free discussion. It deals with immense figures, relating to subjects of the greatest importance I admit, but it is impossible to devote to it that amount of discussion that would properly attach to every other topic in connection with India. The financial details have been already settled, and there is little to be said upon them. It is on the other details of administration that the common sense and good judgment of this House should be exercised, and for that reason I think the Government will be well advised if they give a favourable hearing to the proposition of my hon. Friend opposite, and allow a reversion to the old and immemorial usages of this House to take place with reference to Indian questions.

*(5.22.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, CHATHAM): This is a question on which the Government would like to consult the general opinion of the House. If the general opinion of Members is in favour of the change proposed, it would scarcely be seemly for the Government to make any strong objection. It is rather the duty of the Executive Government to invite criticism on its action, and it is not for the Government to lay down in what particular form or circumstances the House can best criticise its conduct. I think the hon. Member who moved this Motion took rather a gloomy view of the possibilities of Indian discussion when he limited them to the Budget night. Since I have had a seat in this House I know that Indian questions have not only been discussed on the Indian Budget night, but, according to the fortune of the ballot, have found a place on many other evenings throughout the Session. Here we are to-night discussing Indian questions on one of the earliest and best opportunities in the Session. But it is true that the Indian Budget night is the only night on which discussion can be absolutely ensured by any Member who has an Indian question to discuss, and it is for those independent Members who wish to bring Indian questions under Parliamentary discussion to consider how the Indian Budget night can be best utilised for their purposes. It is generally a night towards the end of the Session. The effect of the 51st Standing Order is that the night is devoted to one subject to the exclusion of all others, and that is the discussion of the finances of India. I do not know whether it is the opinion of Members generally that it is essential that the finances of India shall be discussed in this House. If they are to be discussed, the Indian Budget is certainly the occasion on which they can be debated, as the Standing Order ensures that the sole business of that night, to the exclusion of all others, shall be the discussion of the finances. There are, no doubt, a great many subjects relative to India that are not connected with finance. Any discussion upon them has been very properly ruled out of order by the Chairman, and no doubt during the last few years Members have been confined to the consideration of the finances with such rigour as the duty of the Chairman has compelled him to apply. If Members who take part in the discussion would rather have a wider field for their utterances, and would wish to discuss every question connected with Indian administration, the adoption of the alteration of the Standing Order proposed by the hon. Gentleman will give them a chance, but a chance only, of their raising such discussion, because the House must remember that if Amendments are allowed to the Motion that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair, the cream of the evening may be taken up by the Member who is so lucky as to get his name first down on the Notice Paper. That Member will be able, if he wishes, to take the sense of the House at a time when the Government forces are unusually strong, and when the sense of the House is likely to be against him. But we must also remember that this question which absorbs the whole evening may be a question which affects only half a dozen Indian officials or a question concerning a handful of Indian capitalists, whom I suppose the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) would call the people of India.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I?

*SIR J. GORST: Or it may be a question which really affects the welfare of the 270,000,000 or 280,000,000 of people whom the Government represent; but whether it is a large question or a small question it may take up the whole of the time of the House to the exclusion of whatever discussion of the finances may be desired on the Budget. It is really for the House to consider whether it will confine the discussion on the Indian Budget to the Budget itself, or allow the wider scope which the hon. Gentlemen who moved and seconded the Motion advocate, but which may result in an unpractical and desultory conversation on a variety of unconnected Indian topics occupying that time which the Standing Order at present devotes exclusively to finance.

(5.29.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I wish the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary had rendered the House a little more assistance by advising us what should be done. It seems to me that, considering that there are 270,000,000 or 280,000,000 of the Queen's subjects in India, we devote uncommonly little attention to them, and I think some more attention should be given to their interests. This matter is becoming every day more urgent, because the people of India are feeling more and more the necessity of having their interests safeguarded. The people of India see that the House of Commons is capable of applying almost as many hours to preventing the people of Dublin moving a pillar as they devote in a Session to the interests of the 270,000,000 of the Queen's subjects in India, and they desire that the House of Commons should discover some manner in which Indian grievances shall be considered in this House. The figures brought forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Sir W. Plowden) are very striking. They are not creditable to the manner in which India is dealt with by the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary has said that if we were to allow Members to bring forward Indian grievances they might occupy much time, and the Under Secretary might not be able to begin his Budget speech until the dinner hour.

*SIR J. GORST: No, I make my Statements in print now.

SIR W. HARCOURT: At all events the right hon. Gentleman said it might throw the financial discussion back. Well, but is it absolutely impossible that in the course of the Session two days should be devoted to India? I think India is worth two days of the time of the House of Commons, and therefore I do not think that is a subject which ought necessarily to stand in our way. I am not speaking from the point of view of one who desires that Indian subjects should become a constant battlefield of discussion in this House. I do not think that is desirable from any point of view. We do not here undertake particular administrations in India in the same way as we undertake particular administrations in the United Kingdom, but, on the other hand, what opportunities now arise of dealing with Indian questions? We all know that on the Colonial Votes that come on under the Estimates, there are constant opportunities of discussion, but of course Indian expenditure does not come under the consideration of the House of Commons in the same manner. I will not myself attempt to propose any method of dealing with this matter. I think it is one highly deserving the attention of the House, but I express no strong opinion on it. As far as I can see there is no objection to the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, which at all events would give a definite opportunity of bringing forward any question of this kind. There may be gentlemen here who understand the matter better than I do, who may think that something else might be done. At all events I think it is a matter extremely deserving of the attention of the House.

*(5.34.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): Though I give credit to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Sir W. Plowden), and to the hon. Member for North Kensington, for having brought this subject forward, nevertheless as a practical man I submit to the House that the present plan is far and away the best, because by it one first-rate discussion is secured and devoted to a practical purpose from the first, and to a Debate which relates to the whole of India. Whereas, under the plan of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton the whole evening might be devoted to miscellaneous matters which might or might not be important, and some of which might interest only particular persons who put them forward. Instead of discussing the large matter of Imperial finance, we should be discussing all sorts of grievances which might or might not be fit to occupy the attention of this House. Of course if, as suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), two evenings could be devoted to Indian affairs so much the better. But even then the better plan is to say that the discussions should be devoted to definite matters of Imperial concern. In reference to all this I submit that there is no good whatever in our following the old English method of disparaging ourselves, and I should be very sorry that the natives of India should suppose from to-day's discussion that this House of Commons, or this Parliament, has at all neglected or been inattentive to the interests of India. Quite irrespective of the Indian Budget Debates and the hours of discussion to which my hon. Friend opposite has referred, it will be found that this Parliament has every Session devoted part of many evenings to vivid and forceful discussions of Indian affairs. I venture to say that the subjects so discussed have been of the very greatest importance to many of our fellow-subjects. We can no longer Debate Indian topics on the Address to the Throne, but we can still day by day put questions to the responsible Minister at Question time in the House, and very often this questioning is an effective way of bringing forward Indian subjects. Besides that, we can ballot for a position on the Notice Paper. There are many Members of the House who take an interest in Indian subjects, and if they all ballot they will secure an evening. Besides those who like myself have lived in India, there is a large and increasing number of Members who take an interest in that country, though they have never been there. Under these circumstances there is no danger of the interests of the great Dependency being neglected.

*(5.38.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: Except that I was sitting opposite the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary, I have not the slightest idea why he fixed a dart in me. I was listening with interest and appreciation to his argument when I understood him to suggest that the Member for Kirkcaldy called small knots of capitalists the people of India. The Member for Kirkcaldy is the very last person to do such a thing. On the contrary, any efforts I have been able to make in this House on the subject have been devoted to the purpose of protecting the people of India against knots of capitalists. I generally agree very much with the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Sir W. Plowden) on most topics, and especially on Indian topics, but I must say that on the present topic I am not much with him, and on this broad ground: that I am inclined to think that the less the House of Commons interferes with Indian affairs the better. An hon. Friend of mine opposite said that some people who took an interest in India were apt to be influenced by ignorance or prejudice. I will not say much about ignorance; what I am most afraid of is prejudice. I have noticed in this House that the strongest influences which are brought to bear on India are those exercised by prejudice, and those of a personal character. I do not think I need go further in illustration of this view than the subject of the Indian Factories Act. Who are those who take the greatest interest in the question of the Indian Factories Act? They are the rivals of the Indian manufacturers—the manufacturers of Lancashire. The questions which are put on this subject are almost invariably put by Lancashire Members. The First Lord of the Treasury told us that to some extent he accepted the views of these hon. Members, and that he had pressed their views on the Government of India; and he told us that the Secretary of State had urged on the Government of India the desirability of prohibiting night work for women and children. We know that work of that kind was a disputable question in this country; but those who are acquainted with tropical climates are aware that night is often the best time for work, and that work is done at night, the day being devoted to rest. I am quite sure that the First Lord of the Treasury, humane man as he is, would never have advocated such a course except under the influence of ignorance and pressure from hon. Members. Therefore it is that I am not anxious that great facilities should be afforded for the discussion of Indian matters in this House. Feeling that such matters would be discussed to a certain extent to the exclusion of other subjects which we already have too little time to discuss, Parliament in its wisdom has thought fit to delegate great powers to a body sitting not far from here, and the principal duty imposed by law on them is that of controlling the expenditure of money by the Secretary of State. I certainly feel the force of that which has been urged on the House by other Members, namely, that if you go into all sorts of discussions on all sorts of subjects—all sorts of personal grievances which will crop up—on the Budget night it will be impossible to discuss Indian finance in the future as you have discussed it in the past. It is clear to my mind that if you accept this Motion it must be on the understanding suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that instead of having one night you must have two for Indian questions—one for grievances and the other for the Indian Budget. If we delegated our duties to local bodies—as I hope one day to see them delegated—and could afford to give one or two additional nights to Indian subjects then, I hope, Members in this House would become better informed as to Indian subjects, and the number of Members who really do desire the welfare of India would preponderate over those who act on prejudice. Under such circumstances, if great good is not done to India, at any rate no great harm will be done. Therefore, I await the decision of the House merely submitting my own view, that I do not think it desirable that the House should have too much control over India, or that too much time should be devoted to the discussion of Indian subjects, until we have sufficiently delegated our duties in the matter.

(5.45.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): This Debate has recalled to my mind the recollection of the late Mr. Fawcett, and I think my hon. Friends near me will testify that he had as much knowledge of Indian affairs as could be gained without residence in India. Hon. Members will recollect that it was his habit to bring forward Indian matters in connection with the Indian Budget, and on those occasions he addressed the House in speeches of length and fulness, such as would have been remarkable in any man, and suffering as he did from his physical infirmity perfectly marvellous. I heard these then, and look back upon them now with astonishment. At that time the discussions were taken on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair. I know there is one argument against this course—that towards the end of the Session the labours of the occupant of the Chair are very great, and that these discussions involve an additional strain upon the Speaker as distinguished from the Chairman of Ways and Means, but at the same time I must admit there are great advantages in the proposal of the hon. Gentleman opposite. My hon. Friend has said he has found himself unable to enter upon certain subjects in connection with India, because the Chairman of Ways and Means has ruled that he could only refer to matters connected with the financial question, and I think there are a good many questions which might be discussed with advantage on such occasions if a rather more liberal interpretation were accorded. There is the question of irrigation, for instance, which might be supposed to have an indirect connection with finance, and there are many cognate subjects which might be better discussed on the general Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair; and recognising the great advantage there was in this respect when such was the practice 15 or 16 years ago, in Mr. Fawcett's time, and feeling that there has been less advantage in the system pursued in later years, I have much pleasure in supporting the Motion of my hon. Friend.

(5.50.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham has expressed an apprehension lest the effect of Debates in this House read in India should give natives of India the impression that the House is becoming less and less interested in their affairs than the House ought to be. Now, I am bound to say in reply to that remark that it will not be from these Debates that the natives of India will have their attention called to this matter, because any hon. Member who has travelled in India, like myself, will confirm what I am going to say, that there is no topic which an Englishman, and especially if he happens to be a Member of Parliament, has more frequently brought to his attention than this discontent, this regret on the part of the people of India that the House of Commons takes so little interest in their affairs. I never remember having a conversation with an intelligent native in which this subject did not come up, and you find them saying, "You must be far from sensible of the great responsibility which rests upon you, and of the great honour you claim it is to be the holders of such an Empire, judging from the small amount of time you find for the discussion of Indian affairs." It is a matter of very great concern, and there are not a few Members here who do feel the greatness of their responsibility—and who would willingly take whatever opportunity the proceedings of the House afford to bring Indian affairs to the knowledge of the British public. I am far from wishing to see the House of Commons interfering more actively in the duties of Indian Government than now. I do not think that any of us differ from my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir

G. Campbell), that it is undesirable that the House of Commons should endeavour to supersede the Government of India or interfere actively with the duties of the Indian Government. It is not at all on that ground that my hon. Friend has made his Motion. His view is that what is wanted is not that this House should interfere directly, but that the House should give mandatory directions to the Indian Government that it should give more attention to, and be more tolerant of, Indian grievances than it is now, and provide better means for bringing the complaints of the Indian people before the British people, not necessarily with a view to action by this House, but in order that the people of India may feel that the facts of their condition are fairly known and studied. Now, the question is, whether this is best effected by having a power of general discussion before the House goes into Committee on the Indian Budget. It has been very fairly stated, Sir, that a discussion with you in the Chair might have a tendency to wander, but there are two or three points connected with our procedure which have a bearing on this question. It is not possible late in the Session for Private Members to secure an opportunity for raising a discussion, and, indeed, even at the commencement of the Session, as some of us from recent experience have found, the rights of Private Members are very uncertain. But towards the close of the Session, after the middle of May, it is extremely difficult for Private Members to obtain any opportunity of bringing questions forward in the House, and not only so, but in regard to Indian questions it is very difficult to keep a House together. As the House knows, towards the period of the year I have mentioned it is the practice of the Government to take Morning Sittings, and it is not easy to bring 40 Members back to the House at 9 o'clock to make a House for an Indian Debate. It is a misfortune, for there are many Indian questions that well deserve Debate; but Members, disappointed of their opportunity in May, June, or July find their only chance upon the Indian Budget. That is a strong reason for allowing this greater latitude for which the Motion pleads. It seems to me that even more material than the particular technical question as to the width of the discussion upon the Indian Budget is the bringing the Budget forward earlier in the Session. The suggestion has been thrown out that the Government ought to give two days for the discussion, and I hope that that expresses the general view. If that suggestion be adopted, it certainly will be an argument in favour of the Motion of my hon. Friend, because the Government will no doubt feel that it is desirable to give the two days at the earliest possible period in the Session. Of course in the last days of the Session the discussion has to be crowded into one night, but if taken earlier then two days might fairly be occupied. On the whole, I think the balance of argument, looking to the fact that we have to satisfy public opinion in India and to show that we are sensible of our responsibilities towards India, is in favour of the Motion.

(5.55.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): When I heard the remarks of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy I was inclined to exclaim "Is Saul, also, among the prophets?" The Anglo-Indian official view is not one I feel inclined to adopt. The usual Anglo-Indian official view is that India is governed in the best of all possible ways, and that it is difficult or impossible to discover any means of bettering the condition of the Indian people. Now we cannot all speak with practical experience and knowledge of India, but I am perfectly certain that the great majority of Members who do attend in any degree whatever to the statements and facts they may gather from all sources as to the condition of the people of India must come to this conclusion, that however proud we may be of the great system of administration our forefathers have built up in India, and I in no way wish to depreciate it, yet it falls far short of what it might be expected to be if we relied on the optimistic Anglo-Saxon official view. It is not merely the financial condition of India we wish to bring before the House; that is done adequately enough by the few specialists capable of dealing with the figures in an Indian Budget. We cannot leave out of view the social condition of the people of India, and it is to this we want to call the attention of the people of this country and to enlighten them, through the medium of Debate, upon the condition of our fellow subjects in India. I am inclined to think that few of our people realise what a terrible condition of poverty is that of the greater part of the 270,000,000 of our fellow subjects in India. The average earnings of each inhabitant of these islands is £41 per annum, but the average earnings of an Indian subject of Her Majesty is £2 a year. There are many other facts which might be adduced in proof of the terribly poverty-stricken condition of the people, which suggests that something should be done to stem the constant drain of wealth out of India at present going on. If this were a time to go into details it would be possible to show by accumulated instances the enormous suffering caused by the constantly recurring famines—I will not say the result of our government, but which surely our government has not done enough to prevent. I do not say we are at fault in relieving distress when famine occurs, but we have not been successful in rooting out the causes of these famines, and it is well the light of public opinion should be directed to the subject. So far as I am able to gather, though I confess my statistics are not altogether reliable or complete, the condition of the people in the native-governed portions of India is far more satisfactory than the condition of the people in those parts immediately under British administration. That surely shows that the causes of the poverty of which we complain and the terribly depressed social condition of the people are not to be found in the inherent qualities of the people or conditions of climate, but may be traced to maladministration or defects in our system. But the question before us is whether we shall return to what was the old Constitutional practice in regard to Indian affairs. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy is anxious that this House should not have too much control over Indian affairs, and he fears the ignorance and prejudice that exist on the subject. We do not, however, as has been said by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, want to take away the responsibility and power exercised by the India Office, but so far as the system of Government emanating from the India Office is concerned, I say the proceedings ought to be subjected to the light of public opinion. Everything is done in a hole-and-corner manner. We ought to know what the Indian Council is doing, how it conducts the affairs of this great Empire, and I hope the time for this publicity is coming. As to ignorance and prejudice, we know how prejudice has been excited by the rivalry that the Indian cotton manufacturers have established with our home manufacturers, and how, by the development of the cotton industry, Bombay has become a manufacturing city equal to many in this country. We can understand the selfish interests brought to bear against formidable rivals in India, and these influences being exercised in an underhand, backstairs sort of way, we cannot cope with them so long as we are unable to bring the facts before the House. The effect of free discussion in this House would be to stamp with a sense of responsibility those who otherwise might conduct administration to the prejudice of our Indian fellow subjects. I am quite sure that public opinion in this country would be against the exercise of any influence from these selfish trade motives. An excessively small amount of time is devoted here to Indian affairs. I think it has been estimated at 14 hours in a Session for all subjects affecting India. Now, I do not think it is too much to insist upon, that two regular days should be devoted to Indian affairs, one day for the discussion of general questions on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair, and the other day to the specific subjects connected with finance. The Ballot for private Members interested in Indian subjects is an uncertain process, and even when the day is secured the Government steps in frequently and confiscates the opportunity. We know, too, that in the latter part of the Session it is well-nigh impossible, by the influence of a private Member, to keep a House together for an Indian Debate. I do not want to elaborate the various suggestions made, but there is one suggestion I offer. There is a complaint of ignorance of Indian matters in the House, that Members do not make themselves acquainted with the geography, language, and social conditions of the people, and there is a desire for more information on Indian affairs. It is not possible for many Members to avail themselves of the oppor-

tainty of travelling in India during the Recess; but I throw out the suggestion that if the Government would place at the disposal of Members berths in some of Her Majesty's ships, there would thus be afforded a ready means of acquiring knowledge, by personal visits, of our great Indian Dependency. I am prepared to have this suggestion met with a laugh; but have we not at this present moment notices in different parts of the House offering facilities to Members to view the launch at Portsmouth, and in the Jubilee Year were not other facilities offered of this nature? I am not in the least alarmed by the fear expressed that important Indian questions may be dragged through the mire of partisan debate. What is required is the ampler discussion of Indian affairs generally, so that free ventilation may be given for all real or supposed grievances. I am certain that much good will result to India from the confidence inspired by the knowledge that an increasing number of people in this country take a lively and sympathetic interest in Indian affairs.

(6.13.) MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I have always taken an interest in Indian matters, for I represent a country which, like India, is under British rule, but outside the pale of the British Constitution. We always hear from Anglo-Indian officers that the natives of India are contented and happy; but they are nothing of the kind, and would be foolish if they were. The Government of India is in the hands of a few officials, and Debate in this House was restricted in 1888, just about the time when Mr. Bradlaugh got his mandate from the people of India to take up their cause. Debate is restricted by being taken in Committee on the Budget, and I well remember how this operated when the hon. Member for Shore-ditch wished to draw attention to proceedings in India for the authorisation of vice. That had nothing to do with the Budget question, and was accordingly ruled out of order. Similarly, when the hon. Member who seconded the Motion and who has taken great interest in educational matters in India, and has done a great deal to solve the problem as to how far we are able to bring western education and ideas into harmony with eastern life—when this hon. Gentleman thought he was quite within his rights in giving the House some idea from his special knowledge on that subject, he was at once ruled out of order. And a Member of the Government opposite who is a deputy Chairman, I remember, on the Budget of 1889, exercised his legitimate rights, as he thought, and endeavoured to give expression to his views on Indian Government and the Indian National Congress, but he had hardly uttered half a dozen words when he was called to order. I wish to show how Debate is stifled in this House not only by irresponsible Members like myself being ruled out of order, but by even Members of the Government being treated in the same way. I think that what took place on the last Budget was the most emphatic condemnation of discussion of all. I have here a speech by Mr. Bradlaugh—whose presence here we all of us, no matter on what side we sit, were always glad to see, and who was an upright and honourable man, and a great acquisition to the House. I am sure that, of all Members of the House, the First Lord of the Treasury will pay attention to what Mr. Bradlaugh had to say on the subject, for we all recollect with pleasure that in Mr. Bradlaugh's closing hours the right hon. Gentleman forgot all the enmity of party, and wished to tender to the dying man all sympathy and regard. The Chairman of Ways and Means will remember calling Mr. Bradlaugh to order, with great pain. He would have liked to have heard what Mr. Bradlaugh had to say on this most interesting topic, if his speech could have come into consonance with the ruling of the Chair. We all know that, of all matters, the one which has affected Indian trade most materially was the answer of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 24th March, when he proposed to abolish the silver plate duty. Mr. Bradlaugh wished to direct attention to the probable consequences to Indian finance of that abolition, and at once the Chairman said "I do not know how this concerns the finance of India." And then, further, we have a still more important point. Mr. Bradlaugh wished to direct attention to the operation of the salt syndicate in still further increasing the Salt Tax in India, which is one of the worst and vilest taxes of the Indian Government, and a tax which we alone, of all people, impose upon a native race, and one which was referred to only the other day as a specimen of our rule in India. Again the Chairman said, "I cannot see how that is relevant to the subject before the House." Referring to the point that all matters connected with the salt syndicate were outside the scope of the discussion, Mr. Bradlaugh said—

"The moment you say that, it is my duty to accept, as I always do with profound respect, the ruling you give, but it then becomes my duty to appeal to this Committee, when it is sitting as a House, to give at least once a year as, by the old custom, always was given, some opportunity during which the representatives of a defenceless nation may put before Parliament their criticism of the official statement made and some reasons for the grievances pointed out."

Those words are more eloquent coming from a man in the grave than they would have been if we had still his kindly presence amongst us. I do not see how the Under Secretary for India can at all, even by implication, limit to one night the discussion of questions affecting the interests of 270,000,000 people who themselves have no voice whatever in this House. So far back as 1873, when Indian subjects did not excite the amount of interest they do at present, the Indian Budget took three nights. I am sure the First Lord of the Treasury would be glad to consult public opinion in India, and would be glad to show to the natives that he takes some interest in their welfare. I hope that when the right hon. Gentleman comes to speak—as I see he will immediately—he will take note of and consider the opinions of Gentlemen on all sides of the House, and those of Mr. Bradlaugh, to which I have directed attention. On all these grounds I respectfully hope, having regard to the magnitude of the question, and to the scant attention given to Indian matters, that the right hon. Gentleman will at once say that the Government will accede, and gracefully accede, to this Motion.

* (6.20.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have listened with great interest to the conversation—it cannot be called a Debate—which has been taking place during the past hour and a half. I find that there is almost a universal consensus of opinion on the part of those who have been responsible for the government of India in any sense, and that there is no desire, whatever, to interfere with the actual administration of affairs in India. The only difference of opinion which has been expressed has been by gentlemen who have hitherto had no responsibility for that Government. The desire we have had in limiting the Debate on the Indian Budget has been to insure the discussion of Indian Finance. It appears now to be generally the opinion of hon. Gentlemen in this House that it is even more important to secure an opportunity for dealing with the grievances of India than to discuss Indian finance. At the same time we do not desire to escape from the discussion of these Indian grievances although we disavow all intention of interfering with Indian administration. If the Debate we have had this evening is circulated in India, I am afraid it will not give the people of India generally a very high opinion of the knowledge and information that this House possesses on Indian subjects, or that they are able to suggest any very practical method by which the grievances — if they are grievances — can be remedied. I remark that one hon. Gentleman, who spoke in this Debate, said that discussion in this House would probably tend to uproot the causes of famine in India. I have always understood that those causes were drought, and it struck me as very remarkable in the House that any hon. Gentleman should get up and say that a resolution or discussion here could avert those terrible calamities, which are certainly due to causes far beyond any human control. I observe that an hon. Member opposite shakes his head. I wish he could have the responsibility of governing some district in India and would state for himself how he could avert a drought there by any Resolution like this. I only refer to this remark of an hon. Member to show how thoroughly impracticable are some views on the great questions that affect the Indian people. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby pressed on Her Majesty's Government the expediency of yielding to the views expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. Well, this is not a matter on which the Government desire to oppose the appeal of hon. Gentlemen if they wish to discuss questions other than those of finance on the annual occasion when the Indian Budget is presented to the House. There would be no desire on the part of Her Majesty's Government to shut out these questions. The arrangement now in force is the one which best secures the consideration of the finances of India, for which undoubtedly the Government of India is responsible. If, however, in the opinion of hon. Members and of the House, there are questions which should precede the consideration of the finances of India it is certainly not for the Government to interpose any obstacle. I notice that one hon. Member desired that those matters should be discussed at an earlier period than we are accustomed to take, but the House is aware that the actual figures on which the Indian Budget is framed do not arrive from India until the month of June is far advanced, and in the month of June the condition of public business is such that it is almost impossible to interpose a Debate of one or two days in the Debate on some Bill which is before the House, and which it is necessary to press for the consideration of. It is not in our option to present the Indian Budget for consideration at a very much earlier period than at present, and if it is relegated to a late period of the Session it is a circumstance which we regret but which we are unable to prevent. My desire is that hon. Gentlemen who are acquainted with and have an interest in this subject, should have a full opportunity of dealing with it when the occasion arises, because there is no doubt that questions of very great importance to their fellow subjects in India frequently occur—questions upon which they undoubtedly ought to have the means of expressing not only their own views and opinions but those which they know to be entertained in India.

Question put, and agreed to.

EAST INDIA (PRESIDENTIAL GOVERNMENT.)

(6.33.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I rise, Sir, to call attention to the Presidential system of Government in India; and to move—

VOL. CCCL. [THIRD SERIES.]

"That, in accordance with the recommendation of four successive Governments of India, the system of separate Presidential commands in Madras and Bombay should be abolished, and that the entire administration of all the Indian Armies should be made over to the Commander-in-Chief in India, acting in direct communication with the commanders of the local Armies and under the direct orders of the Government of India."

The question which I have undertaken to bring before the House to-night is one which I do not urge on my own authority as important, but which is looked upon as of the greatest importance by the Government of India. It is one that has formed the subject of continued representations made from time to time to the Secretary for India, ever since the year 1879. I would, in the first place, remind the House that the words I have used in this Resolution are not words of my own, but that they are words which have been employed in despatches that have been addressed to the Government of India; and it is a question in which I am supported by the weight of Indian official opinion and the authority of Indian experts, both civil and military. This authority I may say is overwhelmingly on one side, and the words in my Resolution that the entire administration of all the Indian armies should be made over to a Commander-in-Chief in India, acting in direct communication with the commanders of the local armies of India, and under the direct orders of the Government of India, are those of Lord Dufferin, the earlier words referring to the recommendation of four successive Governments of India being those of Lord Lansdowne—in fact we have the declared opinions of four successive Governments of India in favour of my proposals—namely, of that of the present Viceroy, Lord Lansdowne, that also of the previous Governments of Lord Dufferin and Lord Ripon, and in addition to these we have the opinion of several members of the Government of Lord Lytton, and of Lord Lytton himself. The House will recognise that these four Viceroys were men of different Parties, and who would approach such a subject from different points of view. In addition to these noble Lords who held the office of Viceroy of India, you have also a long list of distinguished men, occupying high civil and military positions in India thoroughly in favour of this proposal. I will not trouble the House with the names, but will only ask hon. Gentlemen who are interested in this matter to look at the list of individuals who have formed part of the Government of Lord Lytton and the successive Governments of Lord Ripon, Lord Dufferin, and Lord Lansdowne, to enable them to see that I am fully borne out in my statement. Not only have the Governments of all these Viceroy's expressed the views I have referred to, but that of Lord Dufferin's, on two separate occasions, made earnest representations in favour of the principle embodied in my Resolution. With regard to military opinion in India I will only refer to it for one moment in order to put before the House the fact that we have more than once had the opinion of the present Commander-in-Chief in India. Sir Frederick Roberts, expressed in favour of my view. We have also the strong support of the late Commander-in-Chief, Sir Donald Stewart, and amongst others, who may be said to represent home military opinion in India, the opinions of General Chesney and General Wilson, military members of the Viceroy's Council. The materials before the House, by which it may be guided in forming its opinion on this subject, are to be found in three different Blue Books that have been issued at different times—in 1884 and in 1887, and again last year, in the correspondence which has been issued to the other House of Parliament. I may also refer to the slight discussion which took place in this House upon the subject in the Budget of 1883-84, as well as the further discussion which took place in the House of Lords last Session. I shall endeavour to state the case I have to put before the House as briefly as possibly, and I shall also endeavour to put facts I have to advance as clearly as I can for the judgment of hon. Gentlemen. I do not propose to go back to the ancient history of this question. Practically it all dates from the year 1879, when, coincident with the discussion which took place in this House on Indian expenditure, Lord Lytton, who was then Viceroy of India, appointed the Simla Army Commission to consider the whole subject of Indian Army administration and expenditure. Now what is the present system? I presume it is within the knowledge of Members of this House that as far as the Army is concerned it comes to this—that the Madras and Bombay Army have separate Commanders-in-Chief, and are administered by separate military Departments attached to the local Governments. The Commander-in-Chief is also Commander-in-Chief of the Bengal Army. The Commander-in-Chief in India undoubtedly has a certain general control over all the armies in India, but all questions of discipline and administration of the armies in the Madras and Bombay Presidencies are decided by the Presidential Commanders-in-Chief and the Military Departments connected with the Governments of each of these Presidencies. This may be taken as a very general statement of the position which, as I understand it, is occupied by these two armies. Now, as far as the local service of these two armies is concerned, the grievances that have arisen would not, I think, have been so great as urgently to demand a remedy, but it was owing to the fact that the command of the North-west frontier of Southern Afghanistan was under the Bombay command, and that of Lower Burma, before it was annexed to Upper Burma, was under Madras—it was owing to these two facts and the military operations on these two frontiers that difficulties and confusion has arisen which has given rise to continually pressing demands by the Government of India to the Home Authorities for the abolition of the Presidential system of command. The Presidential system, as it continues to exist, in civil and military matters in Madras and Bombay, is not an administration carefully built up in accordance with the results of long experience, but may be said to be the survival of past history and tradition. Undoubtedly that state of things is due to the fact that our conquest of India started from three bases, namely, that of the West coast, that from the mouth of the Ganges, and that of Madras, and in consequence we had three separate armies for what were three separate dependencies. But the new India, with a Governor General as the central authority solely responsible to the Home Government, is constituted under a totally different system; and the political theory of Government now is that there should be in the Viceroy in Council one individual responsible to Parliament and the British people for the whole administration of that great Dependency. Now, I should like to say that, as I read the papers and correspondence that has taken place between the Government of India and the Home Government, there is no intention whatever of doing away with the armies of Bombay and Madras as local forces, and, as far as mere terminology is concerned, if the commanders of these forces desire to retain titles of Commanders-in-Chief, no objection could be made to their doing so. Those who look at those Papers will see that if the principle I am indicating is carried out, in all probability these forces of Bombay and Madras will be better able to discharge their duties as local forces. Then there is another point to which I desire to call the attention of the House. This proposal, as set forth in the correspondence of the Government of India, is not one for mere centralisation, but for carrying out a system of unity of command, unity of responsibility in the Government of India, and in regard to everything that concerns the Army administration of India. This point is particularly dwelt upon by successive Governments of India, who have urged the matter upon the attention of the India Office. Lord Lytton put it in this way: He said he considered the Government of India should be based on a water-tight compartment system, and the Governments of Lord Ripon and Lord Dufferin favour the views I have put forward, neither of them desiring centralisation, but a proper organisation of the forces. Hon. Members who look at the General Order drawn up by Lord Dufferin's Government will be able to see how the Government of India is prepared to carry out its scheme in detail without actually centralising, but rather by the providing for greater localisation of the forces in the civil and military arrangements of India. Something of a practical nature was done many years ago when the Military Accounts Department was amalgamated, the principle of amalgamation was then conceded, and from that time forward the Governments of Madras and Bombay have been unable to make any alteration which involves the slightest increase of expenditure without consulting the Government of India. The system of amalgamation, as the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary is well aware, has been further carried out during the last 10 years. The Government of India and the Secretary of State for India have already marched a very considerable way in the direction of carrying out the abolition of Presidential commands. What we urge upon them at the present time is that they should go a single step further and really do away with them as liable to cause very considerable danger in time of war, as well as serious inconvenience. Now, Sir, as I stated, the Simla Army Commission was appointed by Lord Lytton in 1879, and it reported in the same year. But the Government of Lord Ripon had no opportunity as Government of considering the Report. Lord Lytton himself wrote a very strong Minute in favour of the recommendations of the Commission, and particularly of this proposal. Then came the General Election. Lord Ripon's Government did not take up the subject at all spontaneously. They were especially instructed to do so by the India Office in a telegram from the Secretary for India, the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale. Getting those instructions, Lord Ripon took up the matter thoroughly, and in a series of despatches during the year 1881 they dealt with all matters contained in the Army Commission Report, and they recommend the adoption of the bulk of the proposals, including the main proposal of the abolition of the Presidential commands. Lord Kimberley, after long delay in July, 1883, was willing to carry certain minor recommendations of the Government of India, but he refused to abolish the Presidential commands, basing his refusal principally on financial grounds. The Government of India had not been able to show that the financial saving would be quite as much as he had been led to expect and believe by the Government of India. But taking part in the Debate which took place in the House of Lords last Session, Lord Kimberley showed that his view in this respect was very considerably modified. No doubt from that time continuous representations have been made by the Government of India, and by every Viceroy since the year 1883. In the year 1885 a change was made in our Indian military policy owing to the Russian advance upon Afghanistan. Then measures were passed for increasing the Army of India, and also for fortifications, especially on the frontier of Southern Afghanistan. The matter was taken up by Lord Dufferin in a despatch which he wrote, and which appears in the Blue Book of 1887. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington in October, 1885, agreed to some of Lord Dufferin's recommendations, but he declined to sanction the measure for the abolition of Presidential commands, on the ground that the change could not be carried out without legislation. In 1888 we got the second representation of Lord Dufferin's Government on the subject. They had experienced the difficulties of the situation at Quettah, and in the intervening years they had further experienced the difficulties in Burma. Lord Dufferin wrote a most admirable despatch on the 1st June, 1888, urging this as an eminently necessary reform to be sanctioned by the Secretary of State for India. Immediately, or almost immediately, on the receipt of it, the Secretary of State for India telegraphed for particulars of the mode in which this scheme could be carried out, if it was to be carried out. The Government of India set themselves to work to do this, with the result that we have in this Blue Book the draft general order, and other draft orders. Hon. Members will have an opportunity of considering how thoroughly practical those proposals are, and into what detail the Government of India were prepared to go. Hon. Members who have read the despatches are entitled to assume, as most men would assume, after the Secretary of State had instructed the Government of India to go into this detail, that the principle was already conceded. I am perfectly certain that anyone who reads the despatches will conclude that the principle had been conceded. It was a very great disappointment—a disappointment forcibly expressed by the Government of India themselves when, in the middle of 1889, Lord Cross, the Secretary of State for India, wrote to the Government of India that while he was prepared to sanction several other reforms he was unable to give his assent to the proposal for the abolition of Presidential commands, basing his refusal on the ground that legislation would be required. Now, the question I should like hon. Members to consider is, how is it that the Government of India have so continuously during the last 10 years been pressing this subject on the attention of the India Office? It will be seen from the official correspondence that the Government of India is still as eager in insisting upon this fundamental recommendation being carried out as it was before. The reason is as much a political as an administrative one. In times of peace things get along; there is confusion, but there is no great harm done. But in time of war the Government of India, when active operations are entered upon, has to put the whole military control under the Commander-in-Chief. We find that what took place in Southern Afghanistan had its effect upon the various individuals and authorities who are in favour of this proposal, more particularly upon Lord Lytton. It also had its effect upon the present Secretary of State for War, who in discussing the Indian Budget in 1882, said—

"All he could say was that at the time of the Afghan War it was proved to him conclusively that the system as it stood was unsatisfactory. He believed there was great truth in the remark made by a distinguished General at that time when they were employing troops both from the Bengal Army and from the Bombay Army, that the result was that they were not operating against Afghanistan with one Army, but that they were exactly in the same position as if they were employing two allied Armies. There could be no doubt that such a system as that caused very great inconvenience and was eminently unsatisfactory."

But in October, 1881, Lord Ripon's Government used even stronger language—

"We believe that to any impartial mind it will be manifest with respect to the operations in Lower Afghanistan the war was carried out with all the disadvantages and with none of the advantages attendant upon the operations of allied armies. Appointments to high command were made by one authority, while the sole responsibility for the result rested upon another. There were all the jealousies, all the delays, all the recriminations which are incidental to war carried out under such unfortunate conditions."

I do not think any statement coming from a responsible Government like that of India could possibly be stronger than that. It has been confirmed by speeches delivered since in the House of Lords by Lord Ripon. That was the effect of the operations in Afghanistan. The same effect was produced upon the mind of Lord Dufferin and his advisers by their experience in Quetta and Beloochistan. They say—

“With this experience on record, we regard with apprehension the possibility of our being called upon at any future time to undertake more extensive military operations while hampered by so faulty a system, which violates all the recognised principles of sound military administration; and we feel that we shall be incurring a grave responsibility if we did not once more place on record the sense of the danger to India of allowing the reform so strongly advocated by our predecessors to be postponed any longer.”

That I think is equally forcible and equally impressive with the statement of Lord Ripon's Government as regards their experience in Afghanistan. I could further strengthen it by what has been said by Lord Lansdowne's Government, in the year 1889, and by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India himself. In a despatch which he wrote to the Indian Government he speaks of these Presidential commands as an evil. I think we may fairly conclude from his despatch that he looks forward to the time when the evil will be not only mitigated, but done away with. On what ground, then, has the India Office hitherto declined to sanction the proposal made so forcibly and frequently by the various Governments of India? The argument with regard to finance was laid great stress upon by Lord Kimberley, though his Lordship no longer appears to entertain that view so strongly. The ostensible reason of the noble Lord (Churchill) at the time he was Secretary for India, when he refused the reform, was that legislation would be required. I quite allow that at the time of the noble Lord's despatch, October 1885, there was a General Election in prospect, and that legislation on this subject at an early date was hardly possible. I also agree that to some extent, in the summer of 1888, Lord Cross was justified in pointing out this difficulty of legislation. But now no such difficulties exist. I quite recognise that the India Office is justified in not bringing forward legislation such as this of a technical character until it can fully depend upon an overwhelming consensus of military opinion in its favour. But what I say is, that they have already shown us they have an overwhelming consensus of opinion in their favour, and they would not meet with any substantial opposition to such proposals if they brought them forward. I admit that undoubtedly there may be circumstances which might render difficult such proposals. In a speech delivered in 1882 by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (Lord Hartington)—a very remarkable speech delivered on the Indian Budget—he told us that at that time there was a distinct difference of opinion amongst the members of the Indian Council upon the subject, and that the large majority of them were adverse to the proposal of the Simla Army Commission. He went on to state—

“It is natural that the Council should be opposed to any large and sweeping changes. The Council of India does not represent the prevailing opinion of the Indian Administration. It represents the opinion of 5 or 10 years ago or even longer, and the Council of India will always be of a Conservative character, and will very rarely go to the length which the actual Government of India are prepared to go.”

That is the statement made by the noble Lord in 1882. But it must be remembered that the personnel of the Council has been largely changed since that time, and I venture to hope that they are no longer in a position of utter hostility to this proposal of the Indian Government. But there is another Department at home, which has something to say upon this subject, and that is the War Office. In a Debate in the House of Lords we have had the Commander-in-Chief himself stating his opposition to this proposal, and as hon. Members are aware very often the War Office, under various Governments, and not this Government only, is very apt in considering matters relating to the Indian Army—to consider them from the point of view of the British Army, and not look at Indian interests. What we want to insist upon in this Debate is that these eminently exclusively Indian questions should be considered from the point of view of whether they are good or bad for India, and decided accordingly. I can quite understand there may be interests connected with our home army which might militate against the abolition of these Presidential commands. They are posts of high dignity, and are often bestowed upon officers who have distinguished themselves at home, and have no Indian military experience. There are other considerations which no doubt induce the Army Authorities at home to retain these offices, but the interests of India should be made absolutely superior to all professional interests at home. I hope I have been able to show that this proposal has been urged by people in high authority in India and by successive Governments of that country. We have had statements from Lord Ripon that he would not like the responsibility of undertaking another war outside the frontiers. We have had statements from Lord Dufferin that there is great danger in not carrying this immediately, and from Lord Lansdowne that the carrying out of this reform is essential to the efficient defence of the country. Lastly, we have the statement of the Secretary of State for India himself that the present system is an evil; therefore, I think, we are justified in urging that no other interests, professional or departmental, should stand in the way. We desire that Her Majesty's Government, should give a fair consideration and a renewed consideration to these representations of the Government of India, and endeavour to put a little pressure, if necessary, upon their colleagues for a speedy carrying out of this reform. We should urge upon them, therefore, that if they have not already done so to take further steps to have the Army in India in the state in which all those responsible for Indian Government say it is necessary it should be if it is to adequately discharge its duty of the defence of that country against external foes. I beg, Sir, to move the Resolution that stands in my name.

*SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to second the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in accordance with the recommendation of four successive Governments of India, the system of separate Presidential commands in Madras and Bombay should be abolished, and that the entire administration of all the Indian Armies should be made over to the Commander-in-Chief in India, acting in direct communication with the Commanders of the local Armies and under the direct orders of the Government of India."

Mr. Buchanan

*(7.8.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): Mr. Speaker, this question, as the House has ascertained from the speech of the hon. Member, is an extremely technical one, and though nothing could exceed the lucidity with which the hon. Gentleman explained it, I think it must after all be left to the technical advisers of the Secretary of State for India to suggest the proper solution of the difficulty. The hon. Member did not quite do justice in his speech to the Report of the Simla Commission of 1879, which has been the foundation of all subsequent procedure in this matter. When the Simla Commission was appointed in 1879, there were very real dangers and disadvantages in the then existing system of Indian Military organisation. That Commission proceeded in a most careful and exhaustive manner to examine branch by branch into the whole of the military organisation. They made a great number of practical recommendations which affected every branch of the military service in India. They pointed out where there were duplicate offices, where there was division of control, and they showed that, as the organisation then existed, the Commander-in-Chief was unable in time of war, to rely with confidence on receiving proper support from the local Armies, and that, on the other hand, the local Commanders-in-Chief possessing an imperfect knowledge of the objects and nature of the military operations undertaken at headquarters, were unable to give proper assistance. This Commission recommended the abolition of the Presidential system as one among a great number of practical suggestions which they made. This recommendation was forwarded in due time to Lord Kimberley, at that time Secretary of State for India, and was carefully considered by him.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale): At that time Lord Ripon was in office.

*SIR J. GORST: Before the consideration of that Report had been concluded at the India Office, the Earl of Kimberley had become Secretary of State. In 1883, after full consideration of the proposals of the Government of India, the proposal for the abolition of the Presidency Armies was rejected by Lord Kimberley and rejected by him on its merits. It was not alleged that there was any difficulty in obtaining time for legislation in Parliament, or that military difficulties existed, but the proposal was rejected on its merits; and I do not think the hon. Member has quite sufficiently indicated to the House the reasons that induced Lord Kimberley to reject it. They are given in a Despatch of the 26th July, 1886. He says—

“Looking at the differences of military opinion upon the subject”—

So far from there being an overwhelming consensus of military opinion there was a difference. He says—

“Looking at the differences of military opinion on the subjects, and to the political objections which may be urged against the proposed reconstruction of the Madras and Bombay Armies, and the absence of proof of financial saving, I do not feel justified in recommending the abolition of the Presidential Armies.”

But instead of beginning by abolishing the Presidential Armies, the Secretary of State of that day commenced the work of Army reform, which has been continued by successive Secretaries of State down to the present hour, by dealing, one by one, with all the other suggestions made by the Simla Commission in 1879, and by gradually removing every one of the dangers brought to the notice of the Government. There again, the hon. Member has scarcely done justice to the reforms in the military administration of India, which have been carried out by successive Governments of India and successive Secretaries of State. The British troops have always been under the command of the Commander-in-Chief, and so far from the British troops in this country having a strong motive in resisting the abolition of the Presidential Armies, they have very little personal interest in the matter. Since the date of Lord Kimberley's Despatch refusing to abolish the Presidential Armies, the following reforms have been carried out:—The Punjab Frontier Force has been entirely placed under the Commander-in-Chief in India, the Military Account Department has been centralised, the separate Commissariat has been abolished. We have now only one Commissariat Service, the change being made by the present Secretary of State only a short time ago. The whole Transport Service has been placed under one head; the Ordnance has been placed under one head; Clothes, Military Works, Military Education, and the Judge Advocate General's offices have been centralised. There is now one single department under the Government of India for all these offices for the whole of India, and the financial powers of the Commander-in-Chief have been very greatly extended. The effect of these various reforms is that at the present day the objections which could have been justly made in 1879, and which were justly made by the Commission, have been met and done away with, and there is really at the present time, as the Government of India pointed out, very little left to be done in the way of reform. There is now no strong ground why the House or the Government should proceed immediately to make any further change. And, in deciding as to further changes, what, perhaps, is the most important consideration of all is the political aspect of the question. The political considerations involved in the question of abolishing the control over the Native Armies of Madras and Bombay, at present exercised by the Presidential Commander-in-Chief, are the considerations which should weigh most with the House in making them hesitate to interfere in this matter between the Secretary of State and his technical advisers. In all the circumstances of the case I can say that when the proper moment has arrived at which the question of the connection at present existing between the Provincial Governments and the Provincial Armies is ripe for consideration, the reform recommended by the Simla Commission in 1879 will be finally carried out. In the meanwhile, it is said that great difficulties may arise in time of war. I believe hon. Members of the House can be perfectly easy on that score. The changes that have been made have entirely precluded any risk whatever in time of war. In the case of Burma, reference to which was made by Lord Dufferin in a Despatch, there was no marked difficulty in carrying out the actual military operations in Upper Burma. The difficulty which was experienced was a difficulty as to commissariat and transport, because while the troops employed in Upper Burma were under the command of the Commander-in-Chief in India the Commissariat and Transport Departments were, according to the regulations, under the command of the Commander-in-Chief in Madras. There was thus a certain inconvenience in Burma owing to divided control, but that has since been done away with. The Commissariat and Transport Departments are now centralised in the office of the Commander-in-Chief in India, and if the operations in Upper Burma had to be conducted now, there would be no cause for difficulty in those Departments. I think the hon. Member and the House may feel quite safe on that score. Now, why should the Secretary of State decline to make the further change which the hon. Member suggests? I think I have shown the House that no strong reason for that change has been advanced. There has been no proof of danger or difficulty, and no necessity for the reform has been made out. What may be advanced against the change? In the first place, there is a difference of opinion among military authorities. So far from their being unanimous on that point I may say that, undoubtedly, they are divided. My hon. Friend spoke of the military advisers of the Indian Council being unanimous upon this subject. I may tell him that they are by no means unanimous, but that there is a marked difference of opinion between them on the matter. The hon. Member has called attention to the fact that the Commander-in-Chief is opposed to this proposal, and if it comes to be discussed in detail in this House, or in another place, there would probably be a great difference of opinion expressed. Then, again, another reason which I may advance against the adoption of my hon. Friend's Motion is, that there is no financial advantage to be gained from it. Indeed, the financial advisers of the Government of India have come to the conclusion that the change would be the reverse of economical. The third reason is a practical one. It is, that this change cannot be carried out without legislation, and everyone must admit the difficulties of carrying through Indian legislation in the course of the present year. Since I have held the office of Under Secretary for India, I have tried year after year to carry Indian legislation through, but among the Bills which my right hon.

Sir J. Gorst

Friend the First Lord of the Treasury has massacred each year there have always been two or three of my bantlings, and I should be very sorry to undertake any further Indian legislation under these circumstances, unless a very great demand should be shown to exist for it. I do not think the Government would be justified in introducing a Bill which is not urgently required, and the discussion of which would undoubtedly take up a considerable portion of the time of the House. The fourth reason that I have to advance is, that surely it would be better to wait and see the effect of the reforms which have already been introduced, before endeavouring to carry out these further proposals. I hope that the House will see that these are sound argument in favour of not adopting the Motion of my hon. Friend; and without wishing to undervalue the efforts he has made, I trust the House will admit the desirability of leaving the decision of these highly technical and difficult subjects to the advisers of the Crown.

*(7.29.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I must acknowledge the fairness with which the right hon. Gentleman has dealt with the question before the House, but I wish to demur at once to one sentiment which he expressed at the commencement of his observations. It was to the effect that, because this was a highly technical matter it ought, therefore, to be left entirely for the decision of the technical advisers of the Government. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be presumptuous on the part of any ordinary person, such as the right hon. Gentleman or myself, to attempt to override by the mere weight of our authority the technical opinion given by the more competent advisers of Her Majesty. But the business of the political administrator is to distinguish between the technical and other opinions he receives. You have many persons who give you technical advice, and surely the administrator is not to stand helpless in the presence of those different gentlemen with their technical advice, but he is bound to exercise his common sense and judgment in determining the nature and character of the advice that should be adopted. What strikes me—approaching this subject, as I confess, with very imperfect knowledge of the details —what strikes me as strongly in favour of the course advocated by my hon. Friend behind me, is that we have Government after Government in India coming back to the charge upon the Secretary of State at home and always urging the necessity of this great change. I am quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that much has been done in the way of reforming the system of Army organisation in India; many of the reforms recommended by the Simla Commission have been adopted, but this question is still not settled to the satisfaction of the Government in India, and the right hon. Gentleman, when he says that almost every grievance and difficulty has been removed by the steps taken by the Government, omits to observe the fact that the last Despatch we have from the Government of India—and couched in terms so strong that the words deserve to be read to the House—was written after they were informed that these changes were to be introduced. I am right, I think, in this, that the Despatch of the 5th July, 1889, was written with the full knowledge that it was the intention of the Government to carry out all the reforms indicated. The Despatch from the Secretary of State for India, to which it was a reply, had enumerated the different measures which the Government had determined to carry out;—that the Commissariat and Transport Department should be placed entirely under the Government of India, and so with the Clothing Department and other branches. And I should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman, as I do not wish to treat the matter in the least degree controversially—I should like to know whether any other alterations of that nature have been introduced in addition to those specified in that Despatch! With the knowledge that the reforms were to be made, which the right hon. Gentleman has enumerated, the Government of India say this—

“We agree with your Lordship that although these measures fall short of the larger scheme of reorganisation which has been submitted to you and to your predecessors, they will, when carried out, accomplish an improvement in the military system which cannot but be advantageous to the efficiency of Her Majesty’s Army in India.”

They go on to urge the reform, with regard to Presidential commands, which they had urgently pressed on the Government at home, and they use these very strong expressions—

“Four successive Governments of India have thus supported the proposals which were put forward by the Army Organisation Commissioners ten years ago. The alterations proposed in [the administration of the Army are not merely for the purpose of remedying inconvenience, but to impart a practical and working form to an accidental organisation which, in the course of time, developed into a cumbersome and complicated machinery. We desire, therefore, once again to place before Her Majesty’s Government our conviction that it would be a misfortune of the greatest moment if this amendment of the military administration which we consider to be essential to the efficiency of the Army in this country should not be carried out in the breathing time of peace which we fortunately now possess, and if the desired change so persistently and so impartially advocated, by the Government of India were to be postponed until the disastrous experience of war should force upon Her Majesty’s Government the necessity for effecting this most necessary reform of the Indian Army system.”

I am well accustomed to the consideration of various army schemes at home, and I never knew any proposal that was not both supported and opposed by a great weight of military opinion; but let it be remembered this is no mere political or theoretical reform which is urged by some persons interested in the question in a speculative way; here are the men who are actually responsible for the safety of our Indian Empire, the Viceroy and his Council, including Sir Frederick Roberts, the Commander-in-Chief, and General Chesney, signing this Despatch, which speaks of it as “A misfortune of the greatest moment if this amendment of the military administration, which we consider to be essential to the efficiency of the Army in this country, should not be carried out,” and who speak of it

“As this most necessary reform of the Indian Army system.”

These expressions were used, not half a dozen years ago, before the other changes referred to, but used in the very Despatch which acknowledges the announcement of the intention on the part of the Secretary of State to introduce those minor changes. What I want to get from the right hon. Gentleman, or someone on the part of the Government, is, has nothing more been done in the interval that has elapsed since that time beyond the changes referred to in the Despatch? I began by saying this is a matter on which possibly few individual Members of this House can express an opinion of much authority. For myself, I base my opinion on the authority of those responsible persons in India who did not take up the matter suddenly, who did not form any speculative view of it, but impressed by the necessities of the case and under a full sense of their responsibility, urged again and again on Her Majesty's Government that this should be done, and have continued to urge them in the terms I have quoted, even after subordinate changes have been made. That, I think, is an ample justification for my hon. Friend behind me having brought forward this Motion. I do not suppose, and, in fact, it was obvious from the tone of his speech that he did not bring it forward in any hostile spirit; we merely wish to impress upon the Government the fact that this strong representation has been made from India in favour of this great reform, and we wish to know how far the Government either have gone or are prepared to go in that direction. There is considerable force in what the Under Secretary of State said, that it is desirable to allow a little time to elapse in order that we may see how these changes that have been introduced work, and how far they may effect the purpose we all have in view. But, in the meantime, I think good has been done by public attention being directed to this matter in this way, and I trust, before the Debate closes, we shall have even more ample assurances from Her Majesty's Government than have yet been given, that the object which my hon. Friend behind me has advocated, if not fully attained has been, at all events, very nearly accomplished.

(7.40.)* SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling, who has just sat down, very properly said where technical authorities differ it is very difficult for a politician to distinguish between them. I think I am a politician in that position, because I, for many of the best years of my life, was a Member of this very Government in India, whose authority has been already quoted this evening, and had the honour of serving in both the minor Presidencies and conducting the Government in one in time of war. Well, Sir, I may endeavour in a few moments, without detaining the House unduly at this late hour, to answer the speech of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan), who introduced this subject. He quoted, and very properly quoted the consensus of opinion, but the consensus of what opinion? The opinion of four successive Governments in India. No one desires to speak with greater respect than I do of the Government of India; all my prejudices and predilections are in its favour, but still, as a Member of this House, I may venture to say that in all Imperial institutions the besetting fault of official men is ambition—the tendency to aggrandise the particular Government or Department; the particular Presidency or Province to which they happen to belong. Even the men about the Government of India are not exempt from this failing. Again, the great danger of modern times in India is excessive centralisation. The first English statesman in India who saw that was the late Lord Mayo. For many years an endeavour has been made by Governments in India to decentralise in all Imperial matters, and I venture to say that, where there has been success it has been in those places in which there has been decentralisation; and where the management of affairs has been placed in the hands of the Provincial Government on the spot, still there is a tendency to the incessant concentration of all authority in all Departments in one great Government at Simla. That is a position the Government of India cannot be qualified to sustain; instead of being an administrative Government itself, it is to be a supervising Government over seven or eight Local Governments in a great Empire—it is to be the duty of the Government of India not to govern itself, but to supervise other Governments. Now, Sir, as regards the consensus of opinion of the Government of India—is there any consensus of opinion on the part of the authorities of Madras or the authorities of Bombay or the authorities in England connected with India? We have heard of the differences of opinion which exist here, but I can assure the House there is still greater difference of opinion in India itself. We only hear one side of the question, but in India there are far greater differences of opinion upon this question. Well, Sir, the hon. Member for Edinburgh stated that India ought to be in water-tight compartments. That is a phrase he has borrowed from a great master of phrases—the late distinguished Viceroy, Lord Lytton. With that phrase I concur; but would the House consider for a moment what is the application of the phrase to the subject before the House? It is that you must have three Native Armies in India, with little or no reference to the European troops. It is solely a question of Native Armies. In the nature of things, owing to the varieties of language, of races, of climatic conditions, there is no other way in conducting the various wars and arranging the Military Service. And there is an additional reason. When these Armies were first constituted there was no difficulty in getting recruits; now there is some difficulty, and that is an additional reason for the Government of the country availing themselves of all the recruiting fields throughout the great Indian Empire. If you must have these three native Armies, they have different wants, different sentiments and prejudices, and, what is more, there are different interests. Therefore, it is essential that the various interests concentrating themselves into three great corps of the Indian Empire, that each corp should be under its own particular head, and that head should be the Commander-in-Chief. It is a matter of the gravest importance to make that Commander-in-Chief as great as possible so that he shall fill the largest space in the eyes of the native troops. Hitherto it has been the policy to maintain that position. Now, apparently desiring to concentrate all authority in itself, the Supreme Government propose to degrade the office of Commander-in-Chief to that of Commander of an Army Corps. The House heard that passage so strongly expressed, as quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). You heard the Governor of India said—

“It would be a misfortune of the greatest moment if this amendment of the military administration, which we consider to be essential to the efficiency of the Army in this country, should not be carried out in the breathing time of peace.”

Now, really, what is this momentous Amendment? Why, the lowering of the office of Commander-in-Chief to that of a Commander of an Army Corps. I desire to speak with the greatest respect of the Government of India, but, after all, it is a human institution, and I appeal to this House whether these expressions have not the tinge, at least, of exaggeration? Will the House believe that the question whether the Commander-in-Chief, either of the Madras or the Bombay Army, shall retain the status and rank of that office, or whether he shall be called Commander of an Army Corps, and whether this change be so carried out or not in a time of peace is such a question that to defer its decision would be a misfortune of the greatest moment? I say, language of that kind carries with it half, at least, of its own refutation. What has been, historically, the effect of the present constitution of the Army—each native Army with its own Commander-in-Chief; each with its own separate interests? Why this: that in the dark days of the mutiny, when the Bengal Army revolted, the Bombay and Madras Armies, though not free from the infection or contagion, nevertheless hesitated to revolt. To any man who knows the history of that time it is patent that had there been but one Army, divided into so many local Army Corps, the danger of the Mutiny extending would have been even greater than it actually was. Undoubtedly, one of the causes of that providential deliverance of ours was the existence of the very system the hon. Member for Edinburgh desires by this Resolution to destroy. It is good, on the whole, for the Army there should be these Presidential commands instead of Commanders of Army Corps. I will not dwell on the financial aspect of the case after what has fallen from my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst), but as an old Finance Minister of India I can assure the House that several times I have considered whether a substantial saving could be effected by abolishing the office of Commander-in-Chief in the two minor Presidencies. But I never was able to make this out. Something has been said about how the system has worked in the time of war, and something also has been remarked about two allied forces, instead of one united force. Well, Sir, I venture to say that that dictum will not stand the test of thorough examination. How does the system operate when war breaks out? The Government of India settles what the military operations shall be, and who the officer shall be who is to command in the field. These questions having been decided the troops from Madras or Bombay are ordered to be sent to the seat of war, where they are entirely and absolutely under the command of the General commanding in the field, and not under the command of their own Presidential Government. There is a perfect system of organisation, no Imperial confusion, to use the hon. Member's term, and the success of the combined operations has been undoubted in all the wars ever conducted in India. I thank the House for listening to these remarks, and I will not prolong them. I have said enough, I think, to show there are high political reasons connected with the discipline and supervision of the men and officers in the Native Army likely to strengthen their loyalty and make them feel confidence in the Presidential Authorities under whom they are to work, keeping their minds, thoughts, and sentiments fixed on their own proper spheres, and preventing them from combining for any purpose that is inconsistent with the safety of our Imperial interests. (7.55.)

(8.30.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(8.32.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): The hon. Member who spoke last was, I suppose, a representative of the divided opinion to which the Under Secretary of State for India referred in his speech. But I do not conceive that the evidence he gave would weigh against the views of the successive Governments of India, whose opinions have prompted this Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for West Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan); and I do not think that up to the present time anything has been advanced which should induce him to withdraw the Motion which stands in his name. If the situation is so perfect as it has been described to us, why have

we had all these reports from successive Governments in India? Why have so many of these Governments been practically unanimous in demanding a change in the present system? The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) seems to advocate the preservation of a kind of triple alliance amongst the Armies of India. He spoke of the Civil Government of India being a supervising Government over the minor administrations, but I venture to think that that supervising system is hardly compatible with efficient military command and organisation. The hon. Gentleman might equally have argued that because we have inaugurated County Councils in this country the command of the Militia should be taken from the War Office and placed in the hands of the Chairmen of the County Councils. But we have assumed an opposite direction in the conduct and control of military affairs, and I venture to think that the whole of the recommendations which have been received from India, from various persons and from various Governments in that country, tend to show that the reform which is now asked for should no longer be postponed. It is not desirable that this subject should be longer treated with anything like silence, even by hon. Members opposite; and I think it would be regarded with much interest by Members on both sides of the House if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Stanhope) would give his opinion upon those military proposals affecting the Army in India. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member who spoke last referred to the subject of centralisation. He said that there had been too much centralisation in India, but that contention was, I think, disposed of in Lord Dufferin's Despatch of 1st June, 1888, in which he says—

"The proposal is one which substitutes unity of general administration of the Indian Armies for the present divided control. It is not a measure of centralisation in the sense of diminishing the authority of those who are immediately entrusted with the command of the different Armies. On the contrary, the effect of the change would be to increase sensibly the functions of the Commanders-in-Chief of Madras and Bombay by restoring to them the direct command of the whole of their Armies, part of which has now, under the progress of events, passed away from their immediate control."

The whole subject is one which I think is eminently suited for discussion in this House. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy, who spoke earlier in the evening, that Indian affairs are not likely to progress more prosperously because they are more frequently the subject of consideration by this House. But I think this is eminently a subject on which the House is qualified to express an opinion, and I hope the present opportunity of doing so will not be lost. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India gave various reasons against the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for West Edinburgh, but the only one which seemed to have anything in it at all was the one in which he said that any legislative proposal he might bring forward would not receive consideration from this House. Well, if the right hon. Gentleman hatches his chickens so late in the season, it is impossible that they will survive. But if he will bring his proposals early in the Session, at any rate if he brings this specific one, it will not, I think, be the subject of very prolonged discussion in this House, at all events, and it is one which we might very easily pass into law. Another of the reasons which the Under Secretary for India gave us was the financial consideration involved. He said it would cost more money. Well, that is the first time I have heard it suggested that the proposed change would cost more money. I have never heard any good authority state that the change of the system would save very much money, but I have heard it on good authority that the change would rather tend to save money than to increase the expense. At all events, that is a very minor consideration. And the contention that it is impossible that legislation can be considered by the House is very conveniently made use of. It has been made use of before by the Secretary of State for India to the present Viceroy, when he refused Lord Lansdowne's representation on the ground that the change would involve legislative discussion and delays. Why should not a Bill dealing with the reorganisation of the Armies of India be brought before this House and passed? That is what we want to know, and what we have a right to ask.

*(8.40.) SIR W. PLOWDEN: It is clear from this Debate that in the first place the Government of India, for the last 10 years located in India, have been of one mind with regard to this matter, and it is also quite clear from the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India, and his supporter, the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple), that they are at daggers drawn in regard to the arguments they are prepared to bring forward in support of the present system. I should like the House to notice how extraordinary is the discordance of argument upon this subject. We have from the Under Secretary of State for India a series of remarks showing what have been the many proposals made. I need not repeat them; but I may make a reference to one which seemed to have escaped the notice of the hon. Baronet. I find that the hon. Baronet stated that the greatest success in the Government of India had been due to decentralisation, and that there was the greatest danger in concentrating all the Departments in one great office. Now, already we have the fact that in 10 important particulars power has been taken away from the Presidential commands and concentrated in the Commander-in-Chief in India. Thus, while the hon. Baronet is all for decentralisation, the Under Secretary here is pluming himself on the centralisation that has been effected in these 10 particulars.

SIR JOHN GORST: I did not commend centralisation, but unity of control.

SIR W. PLOWDEN: I always admire the facility with which the Under Secretary adopts and puts his arguments, and I accept his disclaimer. But I cannot understand how it is possible to get unity of control without at the same time getting a certain amount of centralisation. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham says there is a great danger arising from the desire among statesmen in India to aggrandise their own particular parts of the country. But if that is an argument at all, it cuts the ground from under his own argument; for who are these gentlemen who are desirous of this retention of the Presidency Commanders-in-Chief, but the Provincial Governors and the Provincial Commanders-in-Chief—the very men who, as the hon. Baronet has pointed out, are opposing this change we advocate? He says we must have three native Armies in India. I have not the least objection to that; but I am perfectly certain that the Government of India have no idea of doing away with the three Armies in India, and I cannot understand how the hon. Baronet arrived at the conclusion that we are going to do away with these Armies. He has told us if we do away with these Presidential commands we are doing away with valuable recruiting grounds. I could understand this argument if we only recruited the Presidency Commander-in-Chief. His Adjutant-General, his Quartermaster-General, and his remaining staff do this area. But we do not do this, and whatever happens to these officers, we still retain these recruiting grounds for our native soldiery. There was one other topic which was referred to specially by the Under Secretary of State for India. He spoke, and he took some credit for it, of the British troops—I will not say British troops, but Indian troops—forming the Punjab Frontier Force, having been entirely removed from the Local Government and placed under the orders of the Commander-in-Chief. Now, if there was an instance of the absolute necessity of doing away with the Presidential command it is to be found in this example. The Punjab Frontier Force is one of the finest portions of Her Majesty's Army in any part of the country, whether in Great Britain or anywhere else, and those who are aware of the great feats of arms which that Force has performed take the Punjab Frontier Force as as fine a specimen of our Indian troops as we can find. But that body of troops has been transferred from the Local Government of the Punjab to the Government of India and the Commander-in-Chief. Now, I do not think any hon. Member who is acquainted with the conditions of warfare in India would venture to pit against that Force as superior to it the Armies of Bombay and Madras. If there is a special Force to which may attach greater credit than to any other of our Indian Forces it is this Punjab Frontier Force; yet that Force can safely and properly be removed from the local command of the Punjab Government and placed under the control of the Commander-in-Chief in India. Why cannot that be done in regard to the Forces in Madras and Bombay? We have had certain reasons given to us, but they do not satisfy me. The present proposal has been recommended at the express desire of the Government of India for the last ten years, so that this is not the first time the Indian Government have urged their views upon it. It is a repetition of their claim that their opinions should be acted upon—an opinion which has been held from 1879 to 1890, and that claim is just as strong now as it was in 1879. The fact is that the only real ground for the refusal of the demand is to be found in the patronage which rests in the Military Authorities in this country. It is there that we find the dissentient opinion expressed by Military Authorities at home, for that dissent is not expressed by the Military Authorities in India. You have the Commander-in-Chief in India now, as in 1879, expressing the same views as to the reduction of the Presidential commands. I should like to call the attention of the House to the very strong language in the last letter from the Government of India to the Secretary of State for India. First of all, that letter disposes, I think, of the objection raised by the Under Secretary of State for India in regard to this being a matter which would give us no pecuniary advantage, because on page 200 of the Blue Book they urge this abolition of the Presidential commands in the strongest way, on this very ground of securing thereby a financial advantage. That was the Despatch of the 5th July, 1889, from the Government of India to the Secretary of State, and it decidedly disposes of the argument that we are not to expect from this abolition of the Presidential system any pecuniary advantage. They point out also in that Despatch that it was their earnest desire to have this change, and that it was a misfortune that their desire was not attained; and they ask that this amendment of the military system should be carried out now, while there is peace in the country. They say—

Sir W. Plowden

“We desire, therefore, once again to place before Her Majesty's Government our conviction that it would be a misfortune of the greatest moment if this amendment of the military administration, which we consider to be essential to the efficiency of the Army in this country, should not be carried out in the breathing time of peace, which we, fortunately, now possess."

Now, we have had debates on this topic in this House before, and the last occasion was when we moved a Resolution on the Indian Budget in 1888. We were not able on that occasion to carry our point, but the arguments in favour of it are just as strong now as they were then. I myself have a letter from a gentleman, unfortunately now deceased, who was President of the Simla Commission, and in it he expressed his indignation that the efforts which have been made by the men who composed that Commission over which he presided had met with such unfortunate ill-success, not from the Indian Government in India, but from the Secretary of State for India in this country.

(8.52.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I think that whatever else may be said of this Debate, it clearly shows that the House of Commons, as a whole, is scarcely competent to arrive at a conclusion upon a matter of such detail and of such vast importance to the administration of India. I do not think any hon. Member who has spoken will seriously dispute that proposition. For instance, I find nothing in the speech of the hon. Member who has just spoken which shows that he, or any one of the hon. Members who have addressed the House, draws his illustrations from personal knowledge or from any knowledge attainable in this country, or so as to be able to express a confident opinion either of what has been done in India, or as to the probable effect of the step which it is now proposed should be taken. The one exception is probably my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India, who has watched very closely the various steps which have been taken; who is able to speak with great authority as to the views entertained by the Government of India; and who, probably alone in this House, is able to appreciate the real importance of many of the details brought under our notice. I, myself, am very much in the position of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). He very candidly confessed that he approaches the consideration of this subject without any knowledge of recent details, but only with that general knowledge of military detail which he has acquired in the high position he has formerly filled. I feel myself almost exactly in the same position as the right hon. Gentleman. He has spoken to-night of the differences of military opinion on this subject, and he said that, in his opinion, there is no question of military administration whatever about which vast differences in military opinion are not to be found. Well, I entirely agree with that proposition. I am afraid my own experience in that direction is even wider than his own. But I do not think he has given a fair attention to the other consideration which attaches to this subject, and that is, that we have not only a difference of military opinion, but a difference of opinion amongst all the higher authorities who have had occasion to approach this question. We have had four Viceroy's of India expressing an opinion in one direction. We have had four Secretaries of State for India of different periods, every one of whom objected on different grounds to the proposal that this step should be taken. I think I may go so far as to say this—that, in my opinion, the difference of opinion that has existed between the Viceroy's of India and the Secretaries of State for India has not altogether extended to matters of principle. It has not been altogether difference of opinion on matters of principle that has led to that divergence of view as to the action that should be taken, but it has been because grave doubts have been entertained as to whether the precise time had come for carrying into effect the particular proposals made by the Government of India for the time being. I should like also to say this: This is not a War Office question at all. It is quite true that my connection with the War Office and the connection of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) with the War Office naturally leads people to expect that we should express an opinion upon a very important question of military administration, but I do think that at the War Office we have really very little to do with it indeed. British interests and the interests of British troops are very little concerned in this matter. If any question ever was so, this is essentially a matter of Indian opinion. It is an Indian question from first to last; and I am bound to add also that, for that reason, special attention ought to be paid to those of Indian experience who are qualified to express an opinion on the subject. The hon. Member who introduced this Motion dwelt upon the danger which might exist in time of war if a reform did not take place in the system of military organisation in India, and he referred to the state of things which existed in 1879. Now, so far as regards what existed in 1879, I entirely agree with him. I expressed an opinion at the time, and everything I have heard since has only led me to form a stronger opinion on the subject. I believe our experience at the time of the Afghan War abundantly shows that the military administration at that time in India was by no means a satisfactory one, and that we might have run even greater dangers than those which were proved to have existed at that time. But the hon. Member has frankly admitted that since that time very great changes have been made. My right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India has explained the nature of those changes. I am not qualified to explain them myself, nor have I followed with close attention to detail the alterations that have taken place in Indian military administration. But I am certain from what I have been able to ascertain on the subject that some objections, and grave objections, which existed at that time, have been entirely removed. I am confident that in any matter like this, which involves, we cannot doubt, the gravest questions of military administration, we must proceed by gradual steps. The Blue Book from which hon. Members have quoted to-night, and which showed the opinions of great authorities in India and in this country in respect to this question, amply proves that amongst them all there was this general consensus of opinion that the steps to be taken were grave steps, and ought to be approached with the fullest sense of responsibility; and I believe that is all the more true, because one of the main steps which would have to be taken involves political control over native troops. Now, is there any one man now present in this House who would venture to say that he is competent to express an opinion as to the precise time when political control over native troops in India ought to be transferred from one authority to another? Certainly, having given some attention to the latest knowledge on the subject—I do not think, nor is the Government prepared to say, that the time has come to carry into effect any one of the steps which are included in the general terms of the Resolution that the hon. Member has proposed. But I should not like to deal with it in more detail. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs spoke of it in terms of the greatest moderation; but he showed very clearly that the strong bias of his mind was in favour of the general tenour of the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member, and he advanced arguments to show that we must move in that direction. I admit that I have spoken strongly on this question in this House, and I do not now withdraw a word of what I have said. I believe that the system of military administration in India undoubtedly requires that a considerable modification should be made in it. Some modifications have already been made, and it remains for the Government to see whether any of the changes that have been made have been effectual. It is obvious, I think, that every great change that has been introduced requires that any Government that is wise should watch carefully the effects of the steps that have been taken up to the present time, but which may not even yet have been completely carried into effect. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government think it is their duty to watch and see, at any rate for a short time, what have been the results of those measures that have already been undertaken in the way of change. I am prepared to give this assurance to the House: that while we do not wish to pledge ourselves by a Resolution such as the hon. Gentleman has proposed to carry into effect by legislation changes of a wholesale and widely sweeping character; while we are not prepared to interrupt the work of the House of Commons for the purpose of pushing on such a measure on a subject like this which will require, and which ought to require, very serious attention, and which must necessarily occupy a considerable amount of time, we are at the same time ready and willing to say we will take what further steps we may deem necessary to carry into effect whatever experience may prove to be essential to render complete and efficient the Army organisation of India. Before I conclude my remarks, I should like to say this also: The hon. Gentleman has put before the House a proposal which involves, if it be carried, our arriving at a conclusion of a most drastic character, and which would commit the House and the Government to immediate legislation on this subject. Of course, if the hon. Member insists on taking a Division, we shall be forced to vote; but let me ask the House what would be the effect of such a proceeding? The Resolution proposed by the hon. Gentleman would in all probability be rejected, and this House would thereby be affirming that it is not prepared to accept the proposition of the hon. Gentleman. Now, Sir, that is not the spirit in which I desire to approach this question. On the contrary, I desire to approach it in the spirit of one who, to a great extent, sympathises with the principle enunciated by the hon. Member, but who also desires that the House and the Government should be allowed sufficient time to enable them to judge fully and fairly of the effects produced by the measures that have already been taken, in the belief that the time will then come when we ought to take counsel and consider whether or not any, and what, measures may be necessary to carry out the changes that have been suggested.

*(9.5.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: When I first read the Motion of my hon. Friend I thought it was intended to be much wider in its scope than it has proved to be. It proposes "to call attention to the Presidential system of Government in India," and I thought the hon. Gentleman was going to raise the question of separate Presidencies, in regard to which my own opinion is that separate Presidencies are an inconvenient and expensive survival, which is only justified by those who regard them from the patronage point of view. For my part, I am of opinion that the time has come when they ought to be abolished. But I find that my hon.

Friend has confined himself entirely to the military aspect of the question; and, as he has taken that course, I will endeavour to confine myself solely to the military and financial view which is presented by this subject. With regard to the financial part of the question, I have a very strong opinion. I desire that the Commander-in-Chief—the great officer of the British Army who holds the command of the Armies of Madras and Bombay—should be done away with in the interests of economy and the interests of efficiency. We are told that the whole of the European Army in India is under one Commander-in-Chief, and I think it a very good system which requires that it should be so. I know from personal experience the difficulties that arise from this command of the different divisions of the Army. I think that the arrangement under which the three Armies of India are commanded is a very extravagant and a very undesirable one, and, as far as that point is concerned, I am entirely with my hon. Friend. But, on the other hand, and from a political point of view, I think that the Native Army ought to be divided, and that the policy of such a division is made apparent by the experience we have had of the great Mutiny in India. In my view the success with which we were enabled to meet and overcome that Mutiny in India was very much due to the separation of the Native Armies because, by dividing one Native Army from another, we adopt, as it were, the system of building in compartments, in such a way that if one compartment takes fire the other does not. I hold very strongly the view that while we have in India a general European Army, and perhaps, to some extent, also a General Service Native Army, it is most desirable that this should be kept entirely apart from the Native Armies belonging to the different Governments of India—I will not say, of the Presidencies. It is exceedingly desirable that the Native Armies should at all times be kept under separate control, and that they should not be allowed to come much together. This was a policy which I myself held when occupying the position I held in India, and I believe that in this view, which I hold very strongly, I am in accord with the majority of the Council of the Secretary for India. It has always seemed to me that the peculiar position of the natives in some parts of India is such that it is most desirable that we should not have too much centralisation, but that to some extent we should adopt the principle of Home Rule in these matters. It appears to me that it is an injurious policy to centralise too much, and that it is always safest and best to keep the Native Indian Armies divided. With regard to the civil aspect of these Native Armies, I think that in matters connected with enlistment, the terms of enlistment, and their general relations to the State, there should be a strong element of local government, and not too much centralisation. From a purely practical point of view, I am very desirous indeed of seeing a certain amount of power over the local Armies maintained by the Local Governments of India. I know how expensive it is in the case of a little war to bring to bear all the heavy paraphernalia of a great centralised Army. On the last occasion when I was serving out in India I thought I might have avoided these little wars; but I was not so fortunate. In the East of India we had a good many little wars. When the Commander-in-Chief had to be appealed to, the result was that everything was done on a great scale, two large forces being sent from different points with different Commissariats and different supplies of material. Those two forces were no doubt successfully "marched up the hill" and then equally successfully "marched down again;" and as they, for the time being, quelled the raids of the wild tribes, they were called upon to subdue, the expedition was, upon the whole, regarded as a very successful one. But after a time those wild tribes became as bad as ever, and I believe they are giving a great deal of trouble down to the present moment. Subsequently I had a good many little wars to contend with, and I found that, by avoiding the necessity of appealing to the Commander-in-Chief and carrying on those little wars in my own way, I was enabled to bring them to a successful issue. As I have said, it is in my view most desirable that in these matters there should be certain powers granted to the Local Governments. I am not sure whether the Punjab frontier of India is now under the control and management of the Governor of the Punjab; but if it be so, it is desirable that he should have certain powers enabling him to manage things in his own way, and that the Commander-in-Chief should not be allowed to annex the Frontier Punjab Force. I am not sure whether Madras and Bombay are parts of India which most require a Native Army; but we have a Native Army in Burma, and I am quite sure that there is no necessity for the large paraphernalia the Commander-in-Chief now has in Bombay. I hope that things are not now as bad as they were formerly. If in the future we are enabled to carry out in reality that which is nominally supposed to be carried out, and if we unite the European Force with the General Service Force, at the same time maintaining the local Native Armies under distinct commands, we shall in that way save a large portion of the expense which has now to be incurred without danger to the Native Forces.

* (9.15.) MR. BUCHANAN: Sir, the statements which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War has made were, on the whole, fair. He stated that if further steps were necessary for carrying out the object which the Government of India have in view, the present Government were prepared to take those steps as soon as they found they were necessary or practicable. Under the circumstances, therefore, I beg to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONIAL CONFERENCE.

* (9.18.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I rise to call attention to the growing desire of the great colonies to enter into closer commercial relations with the Mother Country and with one another, and to move

"That, in the opinion of this House, an early opportunity should be taken of inviting the self-governing colonies to confer with the Imperial Government upon the best means of developing the trade of the Empire."

I am mindful that a somewhat similar Motion was brought forward in another place; but from what then took place it is evident that the Prime Minister has an open mind upon the subject, for he said that whenever he perceived that public opinion was favourable thereto he would be willing to take steps to ascertain the feeling of the colonies more definitely upon the subject. In view of that expression on the part of the Prime Minister, I trust I shall not be considered as taking 'up the time of the House unnecessarily on a subject which is second to none in importance to the future welfare and integrity of the Empire. It is perfectly true that the argument might be justifiably advanced with regard to our extraordinary fiscal system; which, while it affords the most extravagant protection to freedom of competition at home, admits to this country not only foreign labour but foreign goods, with the effect of submerging one-tenth of our population and reducing tens of thousands of others to a state bordering on poverty. However, Mr. Speaker, this is a domestic matter in which we need not mix up a colonial question, and especially as we shall have other opportunities of raising it. A large number of hon. Members on both sides of the House are warm sympathisers with the idea of Imperial federation, and many are members of the Imperial Federation League. It is not too much to say that commercial federation is the only road to that Imperial federation of the British race which was so dear to the heart of the late Mr. Forster, and which he hoped to see an accomplished fact. The Colonial Conference, which was the greatest event of the Jubilee year, was a step towards it. But the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, during his too brief sojourn at the Colonial Office, in his Despatch of Invitation expressly excluded this subject from consideration. The fruit of commercial federation has since, however, become far riper. Mr. Hofmeyr, one of the most prominent and loyal of our Dutch fellow-subjects in South Africa, even then presented on behalf of Cape Colony a formal Resolution to the Conference upon the subject of the trade relations between the Mother Country and the colonies and between the colonies themselves. He presented it not as a Protectionist measure, but as an effective measure for the unification of the Empire. The Motion of Mr. Hofmeyr urged "Consideration of the feasibility of promoting closer union between the various parts of the British Empire by means of an Imperial Customs Tariff."

It was submitted in a speech that was enlogised by the other members of the Conference, and the proposal was described by not the least distinguished among them as "the only concrete one that had been brought forward for the unification of the Empire." The present Premier of Queensland, Sir Samuel Griffith, the ex-Premier of Victoria, and many others took part in the discussion, and no one could read the Report without seeing how strong and unanimous was the feeling in favour of closer trade relations between the great self-governing colonies and the Mother Country. Sir William FitzHerbert, whose death New Zealand has lately mourned, spoke with warmth, but not in warmer terms than the circumstances justified. He said—
